Faculty Senate President Marion Gray said he is in favor of the issue, but knows it will be difficult to administer.

"I think it's a tough issue because of the demands on the university calendar," he said. "In principle, I like the idea, though."

Gray said many faculty members like the idea of splitting finals week because they think it would improve the performance of students.

"The faculty wants to give students every possible chance to do well on final exams," he said. "Spreading it out would clearly be advantageous for students."

Some faculty members might object to the changes because it possibly could shorten the summer, Gray said.

"The faculty would be concerned that this would mean starting the semester earlier," he said. "The summer months are very valuable to teachers who do research."

Regardless, the faculty will be supportive of what the students want, Gray said.

"The faculty will respect what the students want," he said. "Especially when they want a better academic environment."

Lissa Brown, sophomore in finance, said she thinks a weekend break between finals would benefit students.

"I would like it, because you would have the weekend to study for the rest of your finals," she said. "Monday and Wednesday, you could study for your finals at the end of the week, and during the weekend you could study for your finals for the next week."

If studies prove that students think splitting finals week would be beneficial, the changes most likely would not be implemented any time soon, Heinrich said.

"It took four years to get a fall break implemented," he said. "If it turns out that students want this, it's not realistic to see it change in the next semester."

Changing finals week would require more than just a vote in Student Senate, Eckert said. After it approves a resolution, Faculty Senate must approve a similar resolution. Then, the proposal goes to K-State President Jon Wefald, and he makes a formal recommendation to the Kansas Board of Regents for it to consider. The process could take up to a couple of years, Eckert said.

Until then, Eckert said Student Senate will continue trying to obtain students' opinions on the matter.

"We're going to increase campaigns so by the early part of next semester we can have an idea of what students want," he said.

Heinrich said Student Senate is only looking into possibilities, and nothing is certain at this time.

"When we ran, we said we would look into this," he said. "That's all we're doing right now."

Student Senate is willing to do whatever students think would serve the university the best, Heinrich said.

"We have to find what students want and what works best at K-State," he said.

ball program, no matter what you or anybody else in the media ... I mean you can criticize it until you're blue in the face, and most everybody has now. I don't know long it can go on.

"If the attempt is to try to convince me to do something else, that's not the direction. There might be an easier way to address it. Terry Bowden is wrong and anyone else that wants to address it that way in regards to the BCS. How do we get get into the BCS?

"You beat Texas A&M, and you're in the BCS, right? Then you're playing for a national championship. It's all up to us. If we win last year and don't lose on the last play of the ball game against Texas A&M, we are playing for a national championship, and if we don't lose to Nebraska we're playing in the BCS. Maybe not in the Sugar Bowl, but we're playing in the BCS.

"It's that simple. It's what we do. It's not your perception, or Terry Bowden's, or anybody else out there that thinks that they have a stronghold on how people should schedule."

hasn't improved."

College students' lack of initiative might be difficult to overcome, David Richardson, junior in political science, said.

"They have to have the initiative to find out about politics," Richardson said. "If they don't have it in the first place, a Web site won't do any good."

Richardson attributed the lack of student initiative to several reasons.

"They have more important things on their minds," Richardson said. "They don't own a lot of property yet, and they don't have a vested interest yet, or so they think."

Interest in the Web site so far, however, has been encouraging, and Voter.com plans to expand its site, Huff said.

"We're not in full launch," Huff said. "The full launch is scheduled sometime in January before the Iowa primary."

"They have to have the intiative to find out about politics. If they don't have it in the first place, a Web site won't do any good."

— David Richardson, junior in political science

The site already gathers news stories from around the nation and places them into appropriate folders. For instance, a story on Gov. Bill Graves' tax plan would be placed in the Kansas folder, the Bill Graves folder and the tax issue folder, Huff said. The next step is to add speech transcripts and real audio and video capabilities, Huff said.

"Several candidates have video clips online already," Huff said. "They would just have to send it to us, which takes about two minutes."

Voter.com's ultimate goal is to provide information on candidates and politics down to the county and city level, Huff said.

"The long-term goal is for students to be able to compare candidates on that level," Huff said.

Voter.com is a for-profit Web site funded primarily through nominal fees by candidates and special interest groups at all levels of government.

tions in case there was a failure of the power amplifier for its "X-band" transmitter — the one intended for Earth communications.

The program required the lander to switch to a non-directional UHF radio if it had not received instructions from Earth by Sunday. The orbiting Mars Global Surveyor was to listen for the UHF broadcast and relay it to Earth immediately.

NASA said that if the communications blackout continued past the weekend, commands would be transmitted to instruct the lander — if it was operational — to begin switching between redundant systems to try to signal Earth.

The lander also was programmed to keep track of how long it has been since it was last contacted by Earth, and after six days to assume there was some type of failure and begin switching between backups on its own.

Polls open at 7 a.m. today for recall election of McCulloh

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Election polls are open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. today for the Karen McCulloh recall election.

Advanced voting ended Monday at noon with the final count at 1,404 voters, Jolen Campbell, deputy county clerk, said. These numbers have been higher than normal, with the Riley County Clerk's Office averaging about 100 advanced voters per day, she said.

Campbell said she thinks numbers are higher because the two interested parties are encouraging people to vote and to vote early.

"They are pushing people to advance vote — advance vote so they can get it over with," Campbell said.

McCULLOH

Election Officer Rich Vargo called the recall election for McCulloh after verifying that a recall petition, filed by three Manhattan residents — Don Rose, Marvin Zentz and Stanley Hoerman — had the required 2,237 names.

The recall committee filed the petition in June, disagreeing with McCulloh's vote to move a Ten Commandments monolith from in front of City Hall. It was removed after a 3-2 City Commission vote.

Rose, chairman of the recall committee, said his group has been encouraging people to vote early, in case of bad weather on election day. He said he was happy with the large turnout so far but said he has no predictions about today's election.

"I hope the voters will turn out, understand the issues, and the voters will speak loud and clear about their position.

"The main thing I'll be doing is praying," he said.

McCulloh said she was the first one to vote on the first day of advanced voting.

She said she hopes everyone who votes will concentrate on the issue — whether her vote was misconduct.

"I don't think anyone can say a vote taken with serious consideration, particularly after taking a constitutional oath, can consider it misconduct," she said. "You have every right to disagree with me, but don't accuse me of misconduct."

Rose said there still are a lot of people calling to encourage people to vote.

"I feel we have done well with the limited resources we have available to make the situation known," he said.

Rose said most of the committee members' expenses have come from this past month, and a lot of it has been coming from their own pockets.

"We're in the red at present time," he said.

Citizens for Sensible Government, McCulloh's support group, has raised a lot of money for her campaign and has spent about $5,000 — a terrible waste of money, she said.

McCulloh said it will be hard to accept if she loses today because she has spent about 20 years working for the community.

"It will be hard to know the honorable things I have done have not been respected," she said.

There will be 27 polling locations open, and if people have questions about their polling location, they can to call 537-6300. One polling location has changed from the Army Reserve Center to the Blue Valley Memorial United Methodist Church, 835 Church Ave. Students who live on campus vote at the K-State Student Union.

It will take a majority vote to remove McCulloh.

If she is voted out of office, she will be removed officially on Friday after Vargo's office certifies the poll books. The commissioners then would appoint a person to fill her position.

Students sick after inhaling toxic vapors

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Rebecca Bryant noticed her headache when the alarm clock sounded at 8:30 a.m. Sunday before church, and she got into the shower.

What happened next was a mystery.

Bryant, junior in biology and pre-veterinary medicine, passed out two times in the shower after being exposed to toxic levels of carbon monoxide. After she awoke, she passed out a third time while walking to her roommate for assistance.

They discovered later the levels of carbon monoxide in the apartment had reached dangerous levels.

"I was scared to death," she said. "I was dizzy and confused and didn't know what to do."

Bryant and her roommate left their apartment at 1524 McCain Lane and walked to their nearby sorority house to call for assistance. After nearly two hours in the emergency room, the culprit was determined to be a crushed valve cap — a remnant of recent roof construction.

Carbon monoxide detectors are being placed in all apartments in the complex as a result of the incident.

"I didn't know what was happening to me," she said. "I was getting dizzy and passed out. It's

Company convicted in plane-crash case

By CATHERINE WILSON
The Associated Press

MIAMI — An aircraft maintenance company was convicted Monday of improperly packaging the oxygen canisters blamed for the cargo hold fire that caused the 1996 ValuJet crash in the Everglades. Two SabreTech employees were acquitted.

The federal case marked the first time that a maintenance company faced criminal charges in connection with an American air disaster.

The plane crashed shortly after takeoff from Miami, killing all 110 people on board.

SabreTech was convicted of eight counts of causing the air transportation of hazardous materials and one count of failing to provide training in handling hazardous materials. The company was acquitted of conspiracy.

Former employees Daniel Gonzalez and Eugene Florence were acquitted of conspiracy and charges they lied on repair records.

The case involved 144 oxygen generators removed by SabreTech from other ValuJet planes and delivered to the ill-fated flight without the required safety caps or any markings indicating the canisters were hazardous.

Crash investigators blamed the generators, which resemble shaving cream cans, for starting a 2,200-degree fire that spread to the jet's cabin and melted aluminum seat tracks and plastic tray tables.

4 injured in Oklahoma school shooting

■ Wounds do not appear life-threatening; 7th-grader arraigned after incident.

By RENEE RUBLE
The Associated Press

FORT GIBSON, Okla. — A seventh-grader walked up to a crowd of youngsters waiting for the morning bell Monday and allegedly opened fire with a gun, wounding four schoolmates before a science teacher pinned him against a wall.

None of the injuries appeared to be life-threatening. A fifth youngster suffered bumps and bruises.

"He doesn't even know who it was he shot," sheriff's Deputy Terry Cragg said. "There was not a hate thing. I asked him why. He said, 'I don't know.'"

The 13-year-old dropped the emptied, 9mm semiautomatic handgun as he was approached by science teacher Ronnie Holuby, who also serves as the safety officer at Fort Gibson Middle School, Superintendent Steve Wilmoth said. Holuby grabbed the boy's arms and pinned him against a brick wall.

The small, slender boy was taken to court for a closed, 15-minute arraignment, walking solemnly between two deputies and keeping his head down.

His name was not released. No details were released on the arraignment or on what charges the boy faces.

Gov. Frank Keating issued a statement saying the shooting "must serve as a call to arms" to address "the root causes of what is happening to our families and young people." He later issued a revised statement, deleting a "call to arms" and substituting the phrase "wake-up call."

President Clinton told reporters in Washington, D.C., that investigators from the FBI and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms were on the scene.

"Our prayers are with each of the children and their families," Clinton said.

Authorities said they were not aware of any previous trouble involving the boy and did not know who owned the gun. The youngster belonged to a teen Christian group and other school organizations, students said.

"He seemed like a really nice person," said Justine Hurst, a 13-year-old eighth-grader. "He had a lot of friends."

Kanjowah Bowley, another eighth-grader, said: "Some people say he's crazy, but he's really not. He comes from a really good family."

Students had gathered outside the middle school and were waiting to enter for the start of classes when the boy walked up at around 7:45 a.m. and started shooting, witnesses said.

School officials, given safety training following the Columbine High School massacre, rushed the students to the safety of the cafeteria.

Some students thought the popping came from fireworks left from a state high school football championship game that Fort Gibson lost 46-0 Saturday.

"We heard one girl screaming. We saw smoke coming from the cement," eighth-grader Greg Pruitt said.

The wounded students were taken to hospitals in nearby Muskogee and Tulsa.

A 12-year-old boy was in fair condition with a bullet wound in each arm, a 12-year-old girl was in fair condition with a cheek wound, a 13-year-old was treated for a wound to his forearm and another 13-year-old underwent surgery for a leg wound.

Wilmoth described Fort Gibson as "a close-knit, very religious community." The blue-collar town of about 3,500 is about 50 miles southeast of Tulsa. About 450 students attend the middle school.

Police obtained search warrants to search school lockers. All of the district's 1,850 students were sent home for the day.

Former student pleads innocent to manslaughter

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A former K-State student pleaded innocent to charges of voluntary manslaughter Monday at the Riley County Courthouse.

Richard Jones, 25, also pleaded innocent to various drug charges, including sale of, conspiracy to distribute and possession of marijuana within 1,000 feet of a school. Jones also is charged with criminal solicitation to commit first-degree murder.

The trial will be at 9 a.m. on Feb. 28.

Stephen Waters was shot in the chest in January after he and two other Junction City residents broke into Jones' home. The masked men allegedly entered Jones' home to obtain nearly 50 pounds of marijuana from Jones. The two other men, Tyler Gruele and Eric DeWayne Wilson, face charges of involuntary manslaughter and attempt to possess marijuana.

Sentencing dates for Gruele and Wilson will be delayed until the conclusion of Jones' case.

Jones was freed on a reduced bond of $50,000, and later was arrested in March for several drug charges.

If found guilty, Jones faces a maximum of 24 years in prison.

Tipper Gore presents cities with All-American awards

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Tipper Gore helped the National Civic League present 10 communities with the 50th annual All-American City Award on Monday, and she congratulated local officials for creating well-connected and caring cities and towns.

The 10 winners chosen from among 30 finalists were: Stockton, Calif.; Union City, Calif.; Tallahassee, Fla.; Wichita; Shreveport, La.; Lowell, Mass.; Tupelo, Miss.; Rocky Mount, N.C.; the tri-city area of Bristol, Va., and Johnson and Kingsport, Tenn.; Greater Green Bay, Wis.

"The greatest tribute we can give you is to follow your example ... and build the kind of strong communities and caring communities that strengthen our democracy," Gore, wife of Vice President Al Gore, said in a ceremony at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building on the White House grounds.

Christopher T. Gates, head of the civic league, said the award went to communities that recognized the challenges they were facing and worked with non-governmental and grassroots groups to overcome them.

"These folks got things together by working together in partnerships," he said.

Cancer, disease victims fly to North Pole over weekend

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — About 150 youngsters took a weekend ride from Kansas City to the North Pole. They're bound to remember it all their lives.

Most of those aboard the Fantasy Flight are seriously ill. The trip on the specially decorated United Airlines Boeing 757 was arranged by the airlines and the Shadow Buddies Foundation of suburban Olathe, Kan.

The plane left a Kansas City International Airport terminal gate Saturday night with its shades down. It trundled about the airport grounds about 30 minutes, while the young passengers sang holiday songs and watched cartoons.

Then the North Pole arrival was announced, several gates away in the United Terminal. Mr. and Mrs. Santa Claus greeted the flight, and high school volunteers handed out gifts.

One of the young passengers called it a good flight, but a little bumpy.

Authorities search for boys who escaped to Utah desert

CEDAR CITY, Utah — One of a group of teen-age boys who fled a camp for troubled youth after allegedly beating a counselor and tying another to a tree turned himself in Monday after apparently trudging 30 miles across the frosty desert.

Six other boys who fled Saturday remained at large in the southern Utah desert, and authorities were concerned about their ability to survive in the rugged wilderness after two nights in the bitter cold.

"We're absolutely worried about them," Iron County Sheriff David "Dude" Benson said. "They've done some stupid things, but they're just kids."

Another boy turned himself in Saturday after he became ill and was abandoned by the others. He was charged with felony aggravated assault, simple assault and theft.

The other boys, between the ages of 14 and 16, had some survival gear, wool coats, blankets and a two-way radio, but only one-day ration packs of food.

"The boys are not outfitted for extended periods in this type of weather and this type of terrain," said Steve Peterson, co-founder of Red Cliff Ascent Inc., which teaches wilderness survival skills to troubled youth.

Two helicopters and an airplane searched from the air while sheriff's deputies with bloodhounds conducted a ground search.

The boy who turned himself in Monday wasn't identified. He showed up at a hog farm in rural Beaver County and was taken to a command post near Lund. His condition wasn't disclosed, and it was not immediately known if he was charged.

One of the camp's founders said authorities told him they had found fresh tracks within 10 miles of the hog farm, indicating progress in the search of the rocky backcountry.

"They think they're closing in the on rest of the kids," said Scott Peterson, Steve's brother and Red Cliffs co-founder.

According to the Utah Department of Human Services, the group included boys from Silverton, Ore.; Plainfield, Ill.; Austin, Texas; Wynnewood, Pa.; Kildeer, Ill.; and Greenwich, Conn.

Two others are from California and New York but Utah officials didn't know their hometowns.

Benson said the teens beat 23-year-old counselor Kirk Stock with sticks, tried to break his legs and then bound him with duct tape. The boys allegedly threatened 22-year-old counselor Sunshine Fuller, tied her to a tree and fled.

The boys escaped near Cedar City, 220 miles south of Salt Lake City.

Saturday, their first night of freedom, temperatures fell to 6 degrees. Sunday night, the low was 17. Afternoon temperatures on Monday approached the 60s under sunny skies.

Benson said the alleged attack was not the first time Red Cliffs has had runaways during its camping trips. In previous cases, he said Red Cliffs officials captured the runaways.

Scott Peterson said the program has treated 1,500 children in seven years. He said many are sent by parents or courts but until now the company has never had a group of children overtake the staff.

"We teach our people the best we can, but it's not a perfect science," Peterson said.

New law allows Romanians access to some secret files

BUCHAREST, Romania — In a move away from its communist past, Romania's president enacted a law Monday giving citizens access to files the former secret police kept on public figures.

Under communism, one in four of Romania's adult population was believed to have collaborated with the dreaded Securitate, the secret police force disbanded during the 1989 anti-communist revolt. Because of the huge number of informers, many of whom are rumored to have become active in public life after 1989, parliament has been reluctant to allow the estimated 125 million files to be opened.

Over the past 10 years, several politicians, journalists and key functionaries have been blackmailed over their alleged Securitate links. Some have lost their jobs and others have had their reputations tarnished by allegations they collaborated with the secret police.

"Starting from today, the blackmail of dignitaries and public functionaries on the basis of alleged collaboration with the Securitate will no longer be possible," President Emil Constantinescu said in a statement about the new law.

The Securitate turned Romania into a virtual police state from 1947 to 1989. Although it no longer exists, Romania is still a society racked by suspicion and fear of spies. The country retains nine secret services.

"After 45 years of living in lies and terror, and after 10 years in which unproved accusations have increased suspicion and mistrust among us, we can finally break from the oppression of the past," Constantinescu said.

For the past two years, Romanians have had access to their own files, but not those of other people.

Citizens still are not allowed access to each other's files. But under the new law, anyone can submit a request to an 11-member commission asking to see the files on public figures.

The commission will be controlled by lawmakers, and applicants will have to swear they did not work for Securitate. It was not immediately clear how the commission members would be selected.

Ranger Challenge

ROTC members travel to Iowa for training, to improve leadership skills

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was building a rope bridge that brought the most enjoyment to Paul McGuire during the Ranger Challenge Competition in October.

"It was through the rope-bridge competition that our work as a team was the best," McGuire, senior in criminology, said. "In my opinion, it was the most fun because it was not too physically challenging, and the work within the team was good."

Maj. Edward Riehle, assistant professor of military science, said nine members representing both the Army and Air Force ROTC programs participated in the competition at Fort Dodge, Iowa. He said the competition gave students the opportunity not only to improve their physical skills, but also to develop leadership abilities.

"This competition gave them the opportunity to develop skills in the technical areas," Riehle said. "It also gave them the chance to learn self-confidence, practice their training skills and refine their leadership skills."

Riehle said the students participated in events such as M-16 Rifle Marksmanship, Land Navigation, Weapons Assembly, Hand Grenade Competition and Rope-bridge Building. The K-State team received first place in both the Land Navigation and Hand Grenade Competitions.

Todd Loughney, battalion commander for K-State Army ROTC and senior in animal science, said the team work, camaraderie and the improvement in physical ability were some of the benefits of participating in the competition as well as leading to the first place win in two events. Loughney placed first in the hand grenade competition, which helped the team greatly in receiving an overall first place in the team category.

"The hand grenade course doesn't take all that much time, but you do have to pay close attention to what you are doing," he said. "We worked very hard as a team to prepare for the competition, and I think it showed how ready we were and what we have done so far in the training process."

Riehle said ROTC members are invited each year to compete in the three-day competition, and many schools bring two or more teams to compete. Members practiced for one hour in the morning on physical training and one hour in the evenings on specific events for six weeks. He said everyone must be in top physical condition to participate in the Ranger competition.

Loughney said one of the main reasons he first decided to participate was to improve his score on the Army Physical Fitness test. Because of his participation for the past two years, he said his physical ability has improved greatly.

"The training I have received in training for the competition has helped my physical fitness a lot," Loughney said. "Practicing with the group every day has improved everyone's physical abilities and given us a sense of camaraderie as a team."

McGuire, who also is the team captain, said he started competing in the competition two years ago because he wanted to see how other universities trained. He said the experience also helps the younger members of the team by building their leadership skills and giving them the opportunity to go back and teach what they have learned to others.

"It will help the younger students later because it not only builds their endurance, but gives them good skills such as leadership," McGuire said. "It challenges all of the members physically and is a chance to be a good asset to a team."

McGuire said although many team members have let up on their training since the competition, he is still training for a buddy-team competition in April at the University of Kansas. He said 30 universities have been invited to participate, and many of the events are similar to those in the Ranger competition. However, the event focuses more on working in pairs than as a nine-member team.

"Some have stopped training as hard because the competition is over," McGuire said. "However, we are sending four teams to KU next spring, and we are still training to continue to improve on what we have already done."

Professors propose change of Union-renovation plans

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plans for what is now the free-speech zone north of the K-State Student Union could be revised if architecture professors have their way.

Concerns with the standing plans, which were made by the Ken Ebert Design Team, were voiced at the Union Governing Board meeting Monday night by Jim Jones, head of the Department of Architecture, and Lorn Clement, associate professor of landscape architecture. Construction on the plaza is slated to begin in March 2000.

The plans for the plaza include a water feature, a bosque and a free-speech area.

The two architecture professors said the area is too cluttered and can be much more cost effective.

Clement listed three ways in which the plans need to be improved:

— Clarify priorities. The plans must meet the needs of students, Clement said. This would include adding a central space. The plans now call for a cluster of eight trees between Seaton Hall and the Union. Clement said the bosque blocks the view of the facade of Seaton Hall.

— Simplify the plans. The plans needs to provide unrestricted movement and bike storage. Elizabeth Dodd, Faculty Senate representative, said the plans have a bike-storage area too far away from any buildings andit is hidden in shadows, which will be unsafe. Dodd said she agrees with the architects about the bike area.

— Subtract expensive items. The plans call for a water feature. Clement said the architecture faculty isn't committed to a water feature because it is too expensive to maintain and things could be thrown in the fountain after football games.

Clement said these new ideas will make for a more cost effective plaza.

"An eraser has been used primarily as a major tool. We can save serious dollars," Clement said.

Clement also said another concern was the view. The plans block the view of Anderson Hall's tower, a big feature on campus that everyone identifies with.

Jones said they don't know the exact amount of money it would take to redraw the plans but could be between the $40,000 to $60,000 range. He also said it could push back the completion date, because redoing the design could take two to three months.

Carl Boger, Senate representative, said he was concerned the new ideas were being brought to the board too late.

"I don't want to spend $60,000 of student money to redesign the plaza," Boger said.

Bernard Pitts, Union executive director, said he agreed.

"These plans are four years of work. We've hired very qualified architects," Pitts said.

The board will meet again to discuss the revision of the plans at 4:30 p.m. Monday.

"This is major. This is critical. We need to put a lot of time into it. This is the future of K-State," UGB President Jeremy Lutz said.

Keep finals whole; improve dead week

That collective sigh of relief you've been hearing around campus is the sound of students kicking back and dutifully studying for finals during dead week.

For those of you unaware, dead week is this week. What that means is professors aren't assigning projects, papers or tests. And if you've just burst into laughter at that definition, you aren't alone.

In simplest terms, dead week ain't all it's cracked up to be. And it could get worse if Student Senate pushes through legislation that would split finals week. Under the proposal, finals week would start on a Wednesday or Thursday and then finish up after the following weekend.

In theory, the idea seems like a good one. In practice, it might turn into a total failure if dead week continued to be not-so-dead. Consider starting finals on Thursday of this week. If you're like most students, you probably turned in three papers and a final project the day before. Of course, it's not supposed to be that way, but it is. The next day, you start taking finals. Ugh.

We should be making the current system work instead of attempting to change finals week. You can help correct our faulty system by filing a complaint with the provost's office when you are assigned a test, paper or project due during the last week of classes.

I just want to say congratulations to the K-State Wildcats on a great regular football season. It's a shame that we don't have a play-off, because at 21 and 2 in the last two years, you shouldn't have to go the Holiday Bowl or the Alamo Bowl.

Thanks a lot for whoever had the nerve to steal half the Christmas lights I worked hard to buy and put up at my house. Maybe next year I'll put up an electric fence, too. Way to spread the Christmas spirit. I hope they look nice on your house.

It's December 6th. Where is my new cable?

Remember the time we got new cable on December 1st? Oh, wait. Neither do I.

You go, Snyder. Let the media know that we aren't going to bow down to Bowden or anyone else for that matter.

It's a good thing K-State isn't going to the Orange Bowl, because Alabama would have humiliated them in front of national television.

COLD realization

Long day of labor, night stranded provide insight

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN KURCHE

I opened my eyes.

Through my bleary half-sleep I could make out a familiar face looking at me. It was my own.

The windshield had been relatively clear when I fell asleep behind the service station. Now, the thick coating of ice and snow had sealed the car and my friend and I were trapped there by the light of the dashboard clock and our reflections. Beyond the window, the world was dressed in orange, lit by the glow of the sodium lamps arranged around the parking lot.

I didn't want to wake up. The clock said it was 3:15 a.m. — we had pulled off the interstate at about 2 a.m. The fatigue and sleet that both had started without much strength slowly had become stronger until it was hard to tell whether I was weaving across lanes because of road conditions or my own exhaustion.

I pulled off, knowing a battle between myself and the sky was one I wasn't going to win.

My friend was in the seat next to me. I was worried about carbon monoxide and had turned off the engine. We both fell asleep, but I slept more heavily than she. When she woke, she was shivering, while I didn't feel anything. I was lucky she woke me up. We needed to run the heater. We needed to move. Each exhale brought forth a cloud that hit the windows and fogged them for a moment.

Neither of us had coats.

I would not have woke up on my own. I didn't want to move — I was convinced I was warm enough. I was too tired.

We had been working that entire day, waking at 6:30 a.m. to drive to Kansas City, Mo., to earn some money with a catering company. We packed trucks, unpacked trucks, stacked chairs, unstacked chairs, moved tables, arranged food — we had started working at 9 a.m. and were not done with the setup until 5 p.m. Then we put on dress clothes to serve the 2,000 some-odd people who were attending the party.

The dogs were barking — man, did my feet ache. I didn't wear a watch that day because I knew that things would go slower if I kept looking to see what time it was. Finishing your assigned tasks begins to take on monumental proportions. Eventually, each finished project carries its own feeling of accomplishment.

That's what labor is. It's something many of you already know.

We broke the party down at 11 p.m., packing the trucks and riding back to the kitchen to unpack them once again. There were dishes to wash — dishes for 2,000. We would scrub, rinse and dip the dishes in sanitizer water, which we also doused ourselves in as we moved the wet pans, pitchers, bowls and lids to the drying rack. We would wash again and again and again, handcuffed to a sink filled with solutions that caused my skin to peel off in sheets.

That's what labor is.

We were released at 1 a.m. Someone with keys opened the refrigerator containing all of the leftover beer, cans were passed around and people drank. Nothing on this planet tastes as good as that beer — nothing — but I don't drink anymore, and my friend wasn't drinking that night. We were trying to get back to Manhattan, as if that was the final task — the last thing we needed to feel a sense of accomplishment. Then we could rest.

It was raining when we left. We heard there was snow further on Interstate 70, but it was too remote at that moment to think about. I made a joke about how "snow" probably meant a dusting on the grass, a few flakes melting instantly on contact with the cement.

When I woke we tried to start the car. I turned the key, fumbling for a few moments and thinking that in my half-sleep I was not turning the key far enough.

I tried again. The car wouldn't start.

The orange glow outside flickered for a moment. Then there was a blue-green flash and the entire world outside went black. The two of us sat in silence, staring at the green dashboard clock, petrified by the threat of the unknown beyond the iced-over windows. As far as either of us knew, the entire planet might have been wiped out by the storm.

We waited. I turned off the car entirely and removed the keys, hoping that the flash wasn't something indicative of lightning.

We waited.

Then everything came on again. Relieved, my friend and I realized a transformer must have blown in the cold and the wind and that it took a minute for the backup to come on.

We decided to get out of the car and run for better shelter. Our already wet shoes were no match for the snow.

Labor is working for an organization like Labor Ready or Labor Pro. An organization that contracts out an unskilled pair of hands to client companies that could use them. Labor Ready and Labor Pro provide a service to the unemployed, a service to the homeless, giving them a chance to earn an honest wage, to generate career contacts, build skills and build income. They pay workers at the end of every day, making it possible for them to build up enough income to pay for rent.

Organizations like Labor Ready and Labor Pro charge contract companies an hourly wage for their workers. The amount changes depending on the type of job and the skills needed to complete it. One person I spoke to said they thought the caterers paid the organization around $9 per hour for the help, and in their estimation the workers were paid around minimum wage. Catering can be physically demanding, but it requires few skills. Naturally, not everyone working for the labor contractors is entirely satisfactory, but they do provide much-needed assistance.

Our workers were given green shirts to wear with numbers on them. No one has the time to learn their names, so they are given numbers. The number becomes their identity.

"113 was was working pretty hard," someone said back at the kitchen. 113 was an older black man, fairly large, outgoing and upbeat. He had a lazy eye and a tendency to poke his head around the corner from time to time to see how things were going and to make a witty remark. The workers are given some of the least desirable jobs — 113 was in charge of emptying our trash. He was paid half as much as we were.

I didn't realize how cold it was until I got inside. The Hardee's we ran to was empty save for a person mopping the floor and another behind the counter. We picked a booth, and I went to get coffee. The man behind the counter handed me the cup, saying that it was too cold outside to pay and that I should keep my money. I thanked him and returned to the booth.

We passed the time by talking, my friend and I. We talked about how tough it would be to depend on a manual labor job for livelihood. We decided that college was a ticket out, a rite of passage to the privilege of not being forced to endure 16-hour days. We do not appreciate college enough.

I think it is interesting when friends tell me that the purpose of college is to have fun. Lately, I have been agreeing less and less with that sentiment. The way I see it, if I wanted to have fun, I could find a beach on which to spend my $40,000. I wouldn't spend it in Manhattan, Kan.

No, college is a chance. College is an investment — an investment that requires decisions. Sometimes you make the wrong decision and wind up stranded while you wait out the storm.

After calling AAA, we made it to a Motel 6 on the west side of Topeka.

We did not make it without sliding into an embankment. Luckily, we weren't going too fast. Luckily, we slid away from the concrete barrier dividing the interstate. Luckily, a passing state trooper was able to help us push the car back onto the road. We made it to the hotel by 6 a.m.

The room cost us as much money as 113 made after 10 hours of work.

So be thankful for school.

And always bring a warm coat.

Coverage, placement of Fiji article upsets former member of fraternity

Editor,

As a K-State alumnus and Phi Gamma Delta graduate member, I was surprised and concerned to read about my undergraduate brothers' alleged investigation for substance abuse and hazing in the article in the Thursday Collegian titled "Investigation continues into fiji fraternity's alleged hazing."

With such serious allegations against our fraternity, I, along with 30 of my fellow graduate brothers, were concerned upon reading this story. I clicked on the eCollegian to get an update. Surprisingly, there was no follow up on this story that your editorial department obviously considered front-page news (at least on the Internet). Still curious, I clicked on "Corrections" (on the eCollegian) to find a brief apology saying the Fijis were not being investigated for hazing and that "the Collegian regrets the error."

Can you share with me, along with the rest of K-State and Fiji alumni, why this "retraction" was not given as much coverage as the original story?

Collegian responds to input from readers concerning Opinion page

VIEWPOINT

REBEKKA MARTIN

The Christmas socks with the fold-over snowmen are mine.

If you look up as you scuffle along the sidewalk to your 10:30 a.m. class, you'll see who I am. 10:30 is officially morning — no matter what you did last night — and the sidewalks are reasonably level, so look me in the eye and smile.

I could go on about the weird phenomenon of some K-State students refusing to look at each other as they go to class but instead glancing up, down or sideways.

However, since most K-Staters are notably friendly, there wouldn't be much point, and a number of you would just be annoyed.

Throughout the semester, people frequently have commented on the content of the Opinion page. Most often these comments pertained to either the Viewpoints or the Campus Fourum. The editors addressed these issues and tried to provide the content the readers said they wanted.

Many readers said they are unhappy with pointless columns in the Collegian. They want to know about things that matter and ideas that provoke thought. This would not include topics like my footwear.

Jeff Bishop, freshman in biology, said he wants to know about political and controversial things.

This doesn't mean readers don't want to be entertained as well, but there should be some underlying message.

Many people have expressed appreciation of Guest Viewpoints, which the opinion editor coordinated with people outside the university, usually political figures. She also used reader feedback to encourage her regular columnists to write meaningful columns. Recent Viewpoints seemed to have more carefully thought-out themes, often related to family or significant events.

Several columnists consistently write Viewpoints that are both thoughtful and amusing or moving. However, the paper also has run some columns with no apparent purpose whatsoever.

"The columns are all something like they don't want to get up or something," Bishop said.

On the whole, this semester's columnists have done well, but I encourage them and future columnists to consider readers' desire to be informed as well as entertained. Readers also can encourage this by responding to columns via e-mail. Columnists' e-mail addresses can be found at the end of their columns each week.

Not surprisingly, even more people had something to say about the Campus Fourum than the columns. K-State has a love/hate relationship with the Fourum. Some people love it. Some people hate it. But almost everyone reads it.

Perhaps the fact that it is so highly read is what makes it so controversial. The target of Fourum criticisms often is the practice of printing statements that are negative or rude and have no constructive point.

Certainly, the strength of the Fourum is that readers can express concerns, complaints and praise anonymously. This also is its weakness because it allows callers to make disparaging remarks, some of which are not edited from the paper.

Hilary Toll, senior in life science and prephysical therapy, said, "I have a problem when the things they place in there are very, very, very destructive."

Besides not contributing to campus unity, these comments reflect negatively on our university. Some people wonder what prospective students, parents and others think of K-State when they see members of campus groups attacking each other in the Fourum. "I don't think the Fourum should be used to bash people," Toll said.

The image we present of our university is something to consider. This is true for both callers making remarks and editors choosing which statements to print. At the risk of sounding like your third-grade teacher before a field trip, the words and actions of a few do reflect on all of us. In addition, constructive opinions, both by columnists and readers, can make a difference at K-State.

The Collegian definitely promotes free thought and expression, but it wants to present pertinent ideas and information to its readers. That is why the staff has considered and attempted to implement suggestions from readers. As always, more comments, suggestions and concerns are always welcome.

To contact me, look for the cute socks.

RCPD assesses fake ID problem

■ Borrowing someone else's ID most common abuse, officials said.

BY CHRISTINA HOGGATT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fake IDs exists in Manhattan, but officials say the problem is not greater than any other college or military town across the nation.

Detective Michael Boller of the Riley County Police Department said fake IDs are a problem in Manhattan, but there has not been any substantial manufacturing of fake IDs locally.

"A problem with fake IDs definitely exists, but it is really hard to gauge an accurate number, because many users do not get caught," Boller said. "To my knowledge, there haven't been any recent incidents that someone is manufacturing large quantities of IDs.

"It is not uncommon for people just to use somebody else's ID, and these days anybody with a mid-level scanner is capable of manufacturing their own," he said.

Boller said many underage people have started purchasing fake IDs on the Internet. He said there are many Web sites that have started manufacturing and selling fake IDs, and for the right price anybody can get a fake ID.

Boller also said having a military base so close compounds the problem.

"The problem for underage college students and military personnel using fake IDs is, oddly enough, about the same," Boller said. "The military ID is easiest to fake, and they also have a black and white picture, which makes it harder to distinguish similar features."

Gary Bennett, head of security for Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, said underage people always are trying to get into the bar using fake IDs. He said there is a good mix of everything, from all forms of altered IDs and driver's licenses to people just using someone else's ID.

"We have the biggest ID collection in the state, but it's not because we want to — it's because we have to," Bennett said. "It all comes down to the law, and with the penalties for the bar being so much more than the person getting the MIP we don't have a choice."

Bennett said Rusty's has skilled ID checkers. He said people should realize the checkers don't have anything against the people; but they just have to abide by the law.

"The kids just want to get into the bars to drink and have a good time, and I don't blame them. But we must abide by the law," Bennett said. "My job is to keep Rusty's in business and make it stay that way, and that puts us in a spot where we have to card hard. We don't have a choice."

Boller and Bennett said fake ID use is fairly even among females and males.

"In my experience, I would say that the numbers of males and females using fake IDs are not one way or another, they are pretty much similar," Boller said. "But the most common form of the fake ID is when a person borrows someone else's ID that looks similar in appearance."

Greg Gilman, owner of Silverado Saloon, also said the most common fake ID problem it has is people using someone else's ID.

"We don't have a problem with a lot of altered IDs, people just give their ID to someone else, and they don't seem to realize that it's illegal," Gilman said. "The problem with fake IDs fluctuates during the year. There are a lot more attempts when school first starts."

Gilman said fake IDs probably get used quite a bit with Manhattan being a college town, but he is amazed that people don't realize the extent of the law.

Boller said the law is one of the main issues with this topic, and people don't realize that using someone else's ID could become a much more serious crime than just trying to get into a bar.

"Obtaining someone else's ID should really be taken seriously because it could lead to theft of an identity," Boller said. "This is an up-and-coming crime, and by using someone else's ID, it could literally be considered obtaining that person's identity."

Boller also pointed out that the manufacturing of fake IDs is a felony. He said if people who are caught with a fake ID decide to come forward with who is responsible for obtaining or manufacturing the ID, their sentence sometimes will be reduced.

It is agreed that Manhattan has a problem with the use of fake IDs, but the extent of the problem is not greater than any other college town.

"Manhattan has just as much of a problem as anywhere else, no more, no less," Bennett said.

K-State might try to upgrade weak schedule

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — K-State is trying to do something about the cupcake non-conference schedule, which many people believe is hurting the Wildcats in the BCS standings.

Although they've lost only one regular-season game the past two years, the Wildcats have been shut out of the BCS bowls. This year, after going 10-1 and losing only to Nebraska, they're headed for the Holiday Bowl to play Washington amid the perception that their record is deceiving because they play a soft non-conference schedule.

"You come to realize what we have to do is be a better football team. A year ago, our destiny was in our hands. It tells me we need to win them all."

— Bill Snyder, football coach

Sources said K-State has contacted schools in the Big Ten and Pac-10 exploring possible matchups.

"I think if we played Florida State, Michigan and Florida each year, then we would certainly change the perception," Head Coach Bill Snyder said in a teleconference.

"I can't say I've called those three. But yes, we've made attempts to contact some schools. But it's not an easy task. How that plays out, I don't know."

This year, the Wildcats filled their non-league season with Utah State, Temple and Texas-El Paso, which all turned out to be hopelessly overmatched.

"We still have our own agenda," Snyder said. "I guess it makes for good conversation and good print. But we're going to do the things we need to do."

While the main bowls keep snubbing the Wildcats, the odds-makers are showing them respect. They opened as 11.5-point favorites, the biggest favorite of any bowl team.

Family alleges attack by drunk Longhorn fans

■ Nebraska fans said they left game with more than victory; list of injuries includes broken nose.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN ANTONIO — Members of a Nebraska family who attended the Big 12 championship game at the Alamodome say they were attacked by drunken University of Texas fans who were angry the Longhorns had lost.

The incident started with heckling and ended with a broken nose, a chipped tooth, a swollen jaw, bruises and cuts for the family members, said Don Losole Jr., 30, a food salesman who moved to San Antonio two years ago.

His father and three brothers were visiting from Omaha and attended the game between Texas and Nebraska on Saturday.

The Losole family was seated in the Texas section and openly cheered for the Cornhuskers, wearing red and white team colors amid a sea of Texas burnt orange.

Taunts started immediately, but the tone turned meaner as Nebraska closed in on its 22-6 victory, Losole said.

"They were ranting and raving about how they wanted to beat us up," he was quoted as saying in Monday's San Antonio Express-News. "It got worse with the alcohol. I'd say 90 percent of it had to do with alcohol being served at the Alamodome."

When the game ended and a physical confrontation seemed imminent, the Losoles hung back from the crowds leaving the stadium in hopes of avoiding a fight, Losole said.

The assailants waited for them at an exit, the family said.

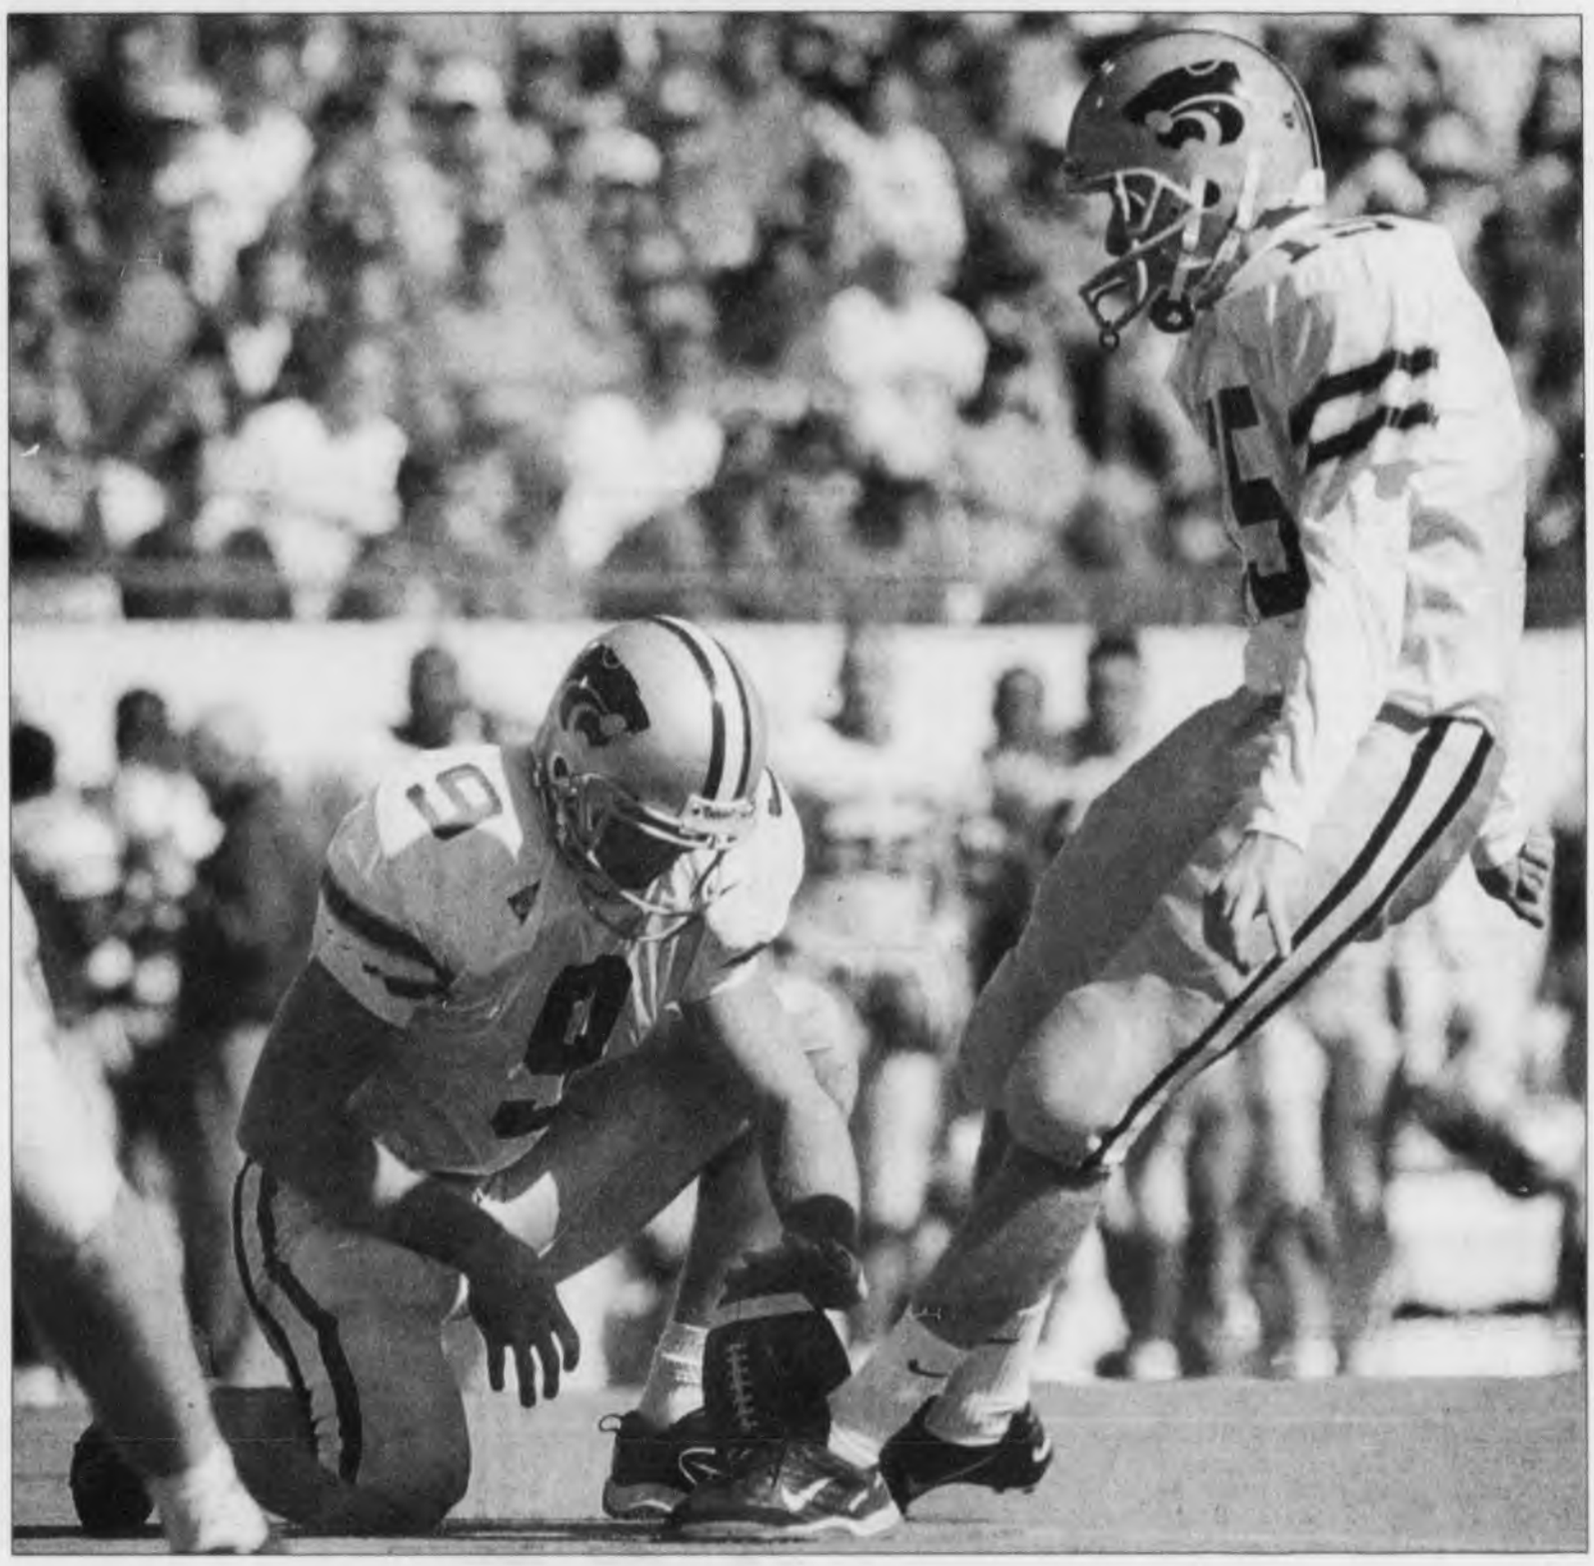
Somebody shouted, "We're going to show you how to make a Texas sandwich," according to the Losoles.

"It was the scariest moment of my life," said Dave Losole, 29, Don's brother.

Dave Losole said he spotted a San Antonio police officer at a lower level wearing a full uniform and gun and asked him for help, but the officer brushed off his request, reportedly telling him to calm down.

As the Losole family tried to leave, the Longhorn fans rushed the group, the Losoles said.

Both Losole brothers estimated about four or five Longhorn fans tackled each of them. Don Losole said he saw his 51-year-old father, the owner of an Italian restaurant in Omaha, get punched in the side of the head.



Security guards broke up the melee, and police ordered the group to scatter but made no arrests, Dave Lasole said.

The family members later filed a report with police at Methodist Hospital. The police report classified the case as an assault with bodily injury.

FILLING FOOTSTEPS

K-State field-goal specialist Rheem steps into shoes of Martin Gramatica by qualifying as finalist for 1999 Lou Groza Award as top place kicker

K-State placekicker Jamie Rheem kicks a field goal during the Oklahoma State game earlier this season. Rheem is a finalist for the Lou Groza Award.

STORY BY RICHARD SMITH

In what is becoming an annual rite of winter, K-State's placekicker is once again a finalist for the Lou Groza Award. Martin Gramatica won the award in 1997 and finished second in 1998 balloting. This year, his replacement is following in his footsteps.

Instead of Gramatica, junior Jamie Rheem is the player sitting on pins and needles this year, awaiting Tuesday night's announcement of this year's Groza winner. Florida State's Sebastian Janikowski, who won the award last season, and Wisconsin's Vitaly Pisetsky are the other finalists.

Should Rheem win the award, it would be just the latest in a list of postseason honors for him this year. Rheem already has been named first-team All-Big 12 and third-team All-America by Football News, as well as first-team All-Big 12 by The Associated Press.

On the season, Rheem connected on 18 of his 21 field-goal attempts and set a school record by hitting on 15 consecutive attempts. All three of his misses come from beyond 40 yards. He tallied on 41 of his 43 extra-point attempts as well, on his way to leading the Wildcats in scoring.

Rheem's accomplishments are more impressive given that he battled several nagging leg injuries throughout the season. Despite that, he routinely boomed his kickoffs over the heads of opposing return men for touchbacks and connected on a 57-yard field goal against Utah State.

Though not quite yet on the level of Gramatica, who has since gone on to NFL success as a rookie with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, K-State head coach Bill Snyder said that, injuries or not, he saw similar potential in Rheem's play this season.

"He's about as strong as Martin, but not quite as accurate at this point in time," Snyder said. "He's got the capacity and the ability. I'd like to see him have a full year next year of being completely healthy, and I think he'll be an excellent kicker."

The recipient of the award will be named during a teleconference in Palm Beach, Fla. this evening at 9:15 p.m. The candidates for the award will be on ESPN's college football awards show at 7 p.m. Thursday.

Former Lions running back makes perfect gift; presents remain for millionaires who have it all

Ah, Christmas, my favorite holiday. You just can't beat the spirit of peace and joy that comes along with this season, and it has better music than any other holiday, too. (Arbor Day, in particular.) Unfortunately, there is a downside to this wondrous tolerance- and understanding-filled time of year — the spirit of consumerism that fills the air.

I'm shopping-impaired. For me, the difficulty of trying to find worthwhile presents for friends and loved ones is on a par with doing high-level calculus without a calculator. If not for the blessing of gift certificates, which conveniently allow me to circumvent actually picking out a gift, Dec. 25 would be a long day. ("A subscription to Reader's Digest?!? [Fake smile] Thanks, Rich — it's just what I wanted!")

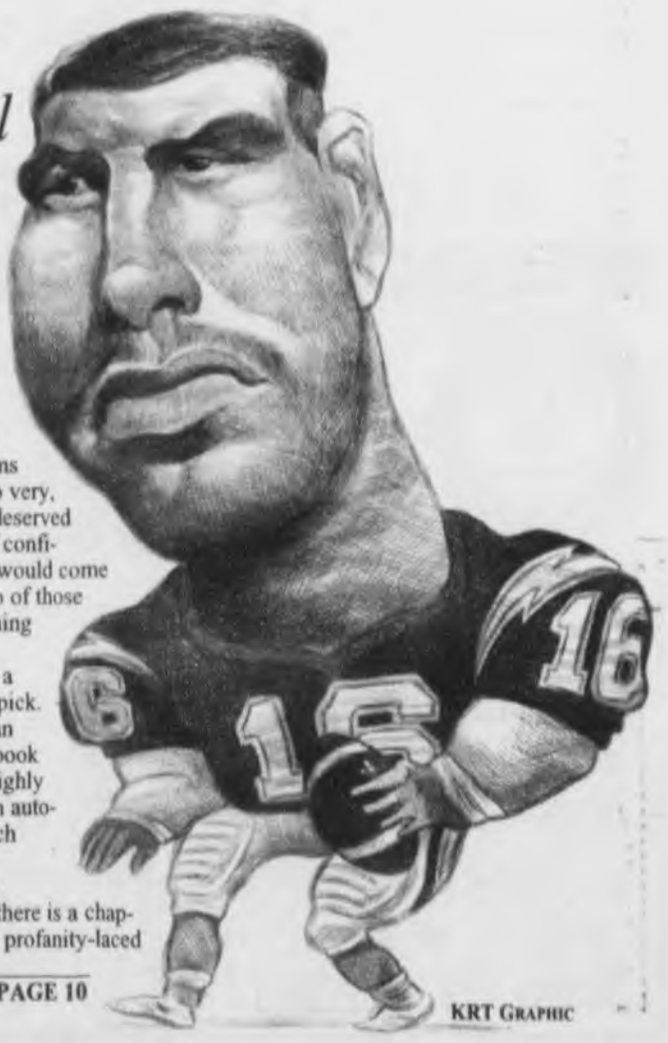
That got me to thinking, during a recent trip to the mall to pick up my annual stacks of gift certificates, if it's this difficult for me, how hard must December be on people who must shop for those who have everything? I'm referring, of course, to friends and loved ones of the scads of millionaire sports personalities out there— how could you possibly get them a gift they don't already have?

So, today, for those poor souls who have to shop for the Michael Jordans of the world, I brainstormed up a few gift ideas for some of our favorite sports personalities.

My first gift goes out to Gunther Cunningham. His package consists of an industrial-strength stress-reliever ball, and Barry Sanders. (It was surprisingly easy to find a box his size.)

The stress ball provides obvious benefits to the tightly wound Chiefs skipper, who seems only a third-down incompletion away from a heart attack, and Sanders would give him much less reason to fret, providing the offensive production and big plays the Chiefs so desperately need.

Sure, Sanders is still property of the Detroit Lions, and retired, but those are mere technicalities. I'm sure that among all the Backstreet Boys paraphernalia and human donor organs, you probably could find the rights to his contract on eBay.



The next gift under the tree has Bill Snyder's name on it. It is ... nonconference games against Michigan, UCLA and Tennessee! This one should be welcome after a second straight year locked out of the Bowl Championship Series in favor of a team with more losses but a higher Nielsen rating.

It appears the only way a Cats team ever will secure a BCS berth is either to finish undefeated or prove head-to-head that they are better than some of the Big 10 and SEC teams that bowl officials are so very, very eager to extend undeserved bids to. Here's a vote of confidence that the Wildcats would come out on top in at least two of those three games, finally earning some bowl respect.

The next gift goes to a former NFL first-round pick. Bratty Chargers QB Ryan Leaf gets a copy of the book "The Seven Habits of Highly Effective People" and an autographed Todd Marinovich poster.

It is to be hoped that somewhere in the book there is a chapter titled "Don't unleash profanity-laced

INSURING your HEALTH

Lafene offers medical insurance as financial precaution for students

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

When students become ineligible to receive health insurance coverage under their parents, a medical plan sponsored by K-State might serve as a cost-efficient option.

"Health insurance is really important for students who are used to having their parents take care of it," said Reita Currie, health educator and promoter for Lafene Health Center.

The health insurance provider, Student Risk Managers Inc., operates out of Lafene and now covers 813 students on campus. Student health insurance representative Megan Dill said a lot of students now are learning about the service.

"Everyone enrolled at K-State gets a package explaining the coverage at the beginning of the year," Dill said. "A lot of people don't know about it and throw them away."

Although Lafene's fee of about $6.41 per credit hour covers basic operations, office visits and health-education promotional services, Lafene director Lannie Zweimiller said students are charged for prescriptions and all other services.

"Health insurance is necessary in case of major sickness or injury," Zweimiller said.

Zweimiller said the health insurance offered through K-State is not connected to Lafene directly. He said it includes a student who represents the insurance carrier and, as a favor to students using the provider, covers all prescription costs.

In order to become a carrier of this health insurance, Dill said students first must pick up an information package explaining the service. She said the policy covers students who are taking at least one credit hour.

"There's so many things that can happen to students," Dill said. "It beats all of the other insurance companies' rates."

The policy requires that students establish a preferred health-care provider. Dill said it covers 80 percent of the costs associated with the preferred provider, and for non-preferred providers, it covers 60 percent.

Most services are covered by this insurance, but Dill said some preventative procedures are not included. Flu shots, though, are covered.

"The days of insurance covering all costs is somewhat back," Currie said. "It depends on the company."

Health insurance is important in ensuring that students receive proper medical care, Currie said.

If students are injured outside of Lafene's business hours, or if they must receive specialized or emergency care, Currie said medical costs could wipe out a student's budget.

"Our physicians will refer students if they need more specialized care," Currie said.

"The health center coverage would not transfer, though, and students would be responsible for all costs."

If Lafene does perform services that require payment, Currie said the business office will file insurance claims for the patient. She said she recommends students use the service because they are paying for it each semester.

"The health center is very important because it's more accessible, there's good turn-around time on appointments, it offers minor emergency care and is the first line for students," Currie said.

Currie recommends that all students be aware of the restrictions and policies of their particular insurance provider.

"It's important to be educated about health insurance coverage," Currie said. "Students must understand what's covered and what's not."

Most important investments found in friends, family

From experience, I can say money and wealth are trappings that easily can consume one's mind and attention to the point of excluding everything else.

The idea of making your first million becomes a drug, amplifying the importance of financial knowledge while inducing ignorance of everything else just as important to one's ultimate success. The error is in believing that investing is only a financial concern. Rather, the most important investments we make are personal. Let me share three investments I believe are critical to building the personal understanding necessary to financial-investment success.

Never pass up the chance to expand your horizons, literally. Few of us have had the opportunity to travel overseas, yet doing so allows us to better understand ourselves, our country and the relative ease of our lives.

I've had the opportunity to travel to Russia and its satellite republics. It is one experience to hear about Belorussians standing in lines waiting to receive a small ration of food from the local store and sympathize as we pull a frozen pizza from the refrigerator.

It is another to be pulled excitedly by the arm to the corner creamery when my aunt learned they just had received ice cream. Nothing can be well-understood without a contrasting point of view.

Always take time to appreciate the arts. What do the arts have to do with investing? Aside from the personal appreciation of art through an understanding of the skill and patience invested in the creation of an individual work, art is designed to make us think, to force our minds out of the straight-line path from start to finish in preference of the long, curving road to our destination.

It asks us to evaluate and reaffirm our moral and ethical foundations through the questions these different routes require us to answer. Ask yourself, when was the last time you stood in awe in front of a Renoir or a Monet? When was the last time you were interested in seeing one? Have you ever thought about what you are missing? Do you know what you're missing?

Financial investment is an art; it requires attention to the minute details while maintaining a view of the greater scheme of the work. The tools are different; the understanding is the same. Yet most importantly, as much emphasis as we put into investing for our retirement or those wonderful toys we want, we put so little thoughtful energy into investing in the lives of those around us we call our friends, our families and special ones.

We often take for granted the fact that they always will be a stone's throw away should we need them, only to realize their absence when that time comes. Sometimes it is through neglect, sometimes through passing away friendships for light or transient causes.

I recently was in Las Vegas for a high school friend's wedding. Home being St. Louis, his family was surprised and gratified by the large showing of the "St. Louis Crowd" at the wedding, outnumbering his family.

That surprise only served to reinforce the value of those relationships. For some, the thought of missing a friend's celebration is inconceivable — these are the strongest friendships, and the most enduring.

Far above whatever stocks I might have in my portfolio, these friendships are the assets I hold most valuable.

Thus, investment is not limited to money or the exchange of goods. The most important investments we make are not financial in nature but personal, and the dividends we receive are not tangible, nor are they exchangeable for material goods. No matter what one might think, money cannot compensate for the loss of these dividends.

Realizing their value and taking advantage of these investments, then, is the task before us. It is a task in which we will experience either our most devastating failure or our greatest triumph.

A few will read this and criticize my stating the obvious. I suggest it is the obvious we most often neglect to appreciate.

I firmly believe the investments we make in our lives and in our friends will outweigh in value any investment we make in the New York Stock Exchange. Remember Georgia O'Keeffe's criticism of modern life: "Nobody sees a flower, really — it is so small — we haven't time, and to see takes time, like to have a friend takes time." I encourage you to take the time to enjoy investing — in every aspect of your life.

global diversity

Speaker stresses value of information base, knowledge of cultures

Karen Shepard Jackson speaks Monday night in the Union Big 12 Room. Jackson, global diversity manager for the Dow Chemical Corp., spoke about characteristics of the millennium employee.

If people want to be successful in the next millennium, they must have a global information bank, Karen Shepard Jackson said Monday night.

Jackson, a global diversity manager for the Dow Chemical Corp., spoke about characteristics of the millennium employee as part of the Tilford Lecture Series, sponsored by the Tilford Group, the KSU Foundation Multicultural Program, American Ethnic Studies Student Association, the Women in Engineering and Sciences Program and the Multicultural Engineering Program.

The series is in memory of Michael Tilford, a Kansan who was noted for his work in the diversity field.

Jackson stressed the need for diversity in the workplace and cited statistics projecting Hispanic women to be the fastest-growing segment of the labor force, while white men will have the least growth.

"Traditionally, we've hired people who look like us," Jackson said. "This picture is drastically going to change in the next 10 years."

Jackson said that to understand diversity, people must first understand their own culture, because their background is their reference for how they understand others.

"I believe if you don't know where you come from, you can't understand where someone else is coming from," Jackson said.

Jackson said that as more and more teams become global, it will be important to understand and make use of cultural differences.

"You're going to be in a team that is not like you, and you may look alike," said Jackson, acknowledging that race and gender are not the only cultural differences workers encounter.

Members of the work force need to embrace and implement change and take risks, Jackson said. She said she believes everyone should be familiar with six sigma, a principle that involves doing more with fewer people and is often a strategy for downsizing.

Jackson emphasized that students need to start training now to enter the work force. Part of this involves achieving a balance between life and work as well as time-management skills.

"We look at what else you've done besides school," she said. She explained that it is important to be able to do more than one thing at a time. Participation in activities is an important addition to academics.

It is essential for workers to have technical competence in their fields, but a 4.0 grade point average is not necessary. A 2.7 GPA is sufficient now to get an interview.

However, Jackson said she expects the minimum GPA to raise to 3.0 by the time current students enter the work force and climb even higher in the future.

"One degree isn't going to be enough," she said. "You're going to have to have a masters."

Communication skills Jackson discussed included speaking, writing and listening. She encouraged her audience to learn and practice a second language. She also advised students to practice avoiding slang in certain situations.

"That's habit-forming," she said. "That's a second language as well."

Jackson said computer skills were essential. Not only do students need to learn to use e-mail, but they also need knowledge of Excel, Power Point and Access.

Teamwork will also be important to future workplace success, Jackson said.

Jackson suggested people acquire role models who are living their definition of success and ask for advice.

"Networking is the name of the game. It's all about who you know," she said. "You've got to have a diverse network."

Jackson talked about the competitiveness of the millennium work force.

"It's going to be extremely competitive," Jackson said. "We are a global economy. You may look alike, but you are all very different."

Last chance to give blood in 1999 arrives this week

■ Local residents to have final opportunity of year at CiCo Park on Thursday.

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Area residents have one final chance to donate blood before Y2K.

The Riley County Chapter of the American Red Cross is having its final blood drive of 1999 at Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park from noon to 6 p.m. on Wednesday and from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. Thursday.

This blood drive concludes the five annual community and university blood drives. The previous drives have been successful, but more donors always are needed, said Dori Milldyke, local Red Cross Blood Drive coordinator.

"We always wish we had more people donate than we have, since only about 5 percent of possible donors do donate," Milldyke said. "We hope it will be very successful, but I heard we might be having bad weather, which always keeps some people away."

All blood types are needed, but donors with type O blood especially are encouraged to donate. Type O-negative is the universal donor, but it is also the rarest type of blood.

"We always need type O blood," Milldyke said. "Positive is the most common type of blood, and negative can be transfused to most blood types. That is important to trauma patients who are brought into hospitals and do not have the time to have their blood typed."

The time required to give blood is usually minimal, Milldyke said.

"It depends on how busy are," Milldyke said. "If people come in at noon on Wednesday, we will be probably be swamped with people, and it could take from one to 1 1/2 hours. At any other time, it probably only takes 45 minutes to an hour, and most of that is spent doing forms."

Blood donors must be at least 17 years old, weigh a minimum of 110 pounds and must be in general good health.

Appointments can be made by calling the Riley County Chapter of the American Red Cross at 537-2180, but donors who walk in also are welcomed, Milldyke said.

Use it. CALL. Use it. CALL. Use it. CALL. Use it. CALL. Use it.

Florence, a former mechanic, signed a work card stating he had installed shipping caps on generators but admitted days after the crash that he had not. The caps keep a firing pin from hitting an aspirin-size percussion cap.

Gonzalez, a vice president of maintenance, was accused of pressing Florence and other mechanics to sign the paperwork.

He was also accused of signing paperwork for a deicer task the prosecution contended was not done on an Aserca Airlines jet in 1995. That claim supported the prosecution's charge that SabreTech lied, rushed work and skipped assignments.

SabreTech acknowledged that mistakes were made but said they did not amount to crimes.

Defense attorneys also suggested electrical problems on the plane might have caused the crash.

ValuJet, which has changed its name to AirTran, and SabreTech have settled most lawsuits brought by victims' families, but a handful are set for civil trial.

SabreTech also has been charged in state court with murder and manslaughter in the crash.

If convicted, the company could face fines that might go to the victims' families as restitution.

SabreTech is no longer in business. Its maintenance operations were sold by Sabreliner, which has retained the SabreTech name. A record fine of $2.25 million had been proposed against SabreTech, but the company has appealed.

hard to explain."

According to the American Lung Association, almost 300 people die each year from carbon monoxide exposure related to residential combustion appliances, and thousands more develop an illness. Exposure also can affect unborn babies, infants and people with a history of heart or respiratory disease.

Randy Hilgers, poison-control specialist at the University of Kansas Medical Center, said toxic exposure to carbon monoxide causes a decrease in the body's ability to supply oxygen. Exposure can lead to nausea and vomiting, and oxygen is the only available treatment.

Hilgers said faulty car exhaust systems are usually to blame for exposure to carbon monoxide, which is colorless and odorless. He said the number of cases increases during winter months.

Although the number of cases in the emergency room involving toxic exposure has remained steady, Hilgers said the number of reported cases has increased, and that the higher numbers are a result of increased use of carbon monoxide detectors, which rarely reach toxic levels.

"I get a lot of calls from people whose alarms have gone off and seen a change in their levels," he said.

Bryant said carbon monoxide detectors should be installed in all homes and apartments.

"Anybody that doesn't have a carbon monoxide detector should get one," she said. "We could have very easily not waken up."

tirades at your employers, who are paying you more than you deserve anyway." As for the poster, he could hang it in his locker and be reminded that, much like former Raider Marinovich, his arrogance has put him on the road to a long and fruitful career as a Canadian Football League backup.

Our next stocking stuffer is for ABC announcer Brent Musberger ... and it's a pairing with ESPN color analyst Paul Maguire. This one really falls into the gag-gift category. I hope no innocent person actually would have to suffer through watching this game, but putting the most annoying television play-by-play and color commentators together would give each some much-needed perspective on their broadcasting styles.

Musberger: "'The Major's back to throw ... and it's intercepted! There was a 'fire in the 'Ville' and Applewhite had to get rid of it quickly. Now the 'A-train' and the Michigan offense will retake the field."

Maguire: "Dear God, I'm not this annoying, am I?"

So many gift ideas, so little space. Here are a few quickies. To Jarrod Cooper — his own talk show if this whole NFL thing doesn't work out. To the Kansas City Royals — an owner, revenue-sharing and Ken Griffey Jr. To Roy Williams— a mulligan to use during the NCAA Tournament. To LaVar Arrington— a punter-shaped punching bag. And to Oregon, BYU, the Broncos and the Titans — their old uniforms back.

Finally, to all the Collegian's loyal readers— free plane tickets to San Diego, and a safe and happy winter break.

HOLIDAY BOWL

Last year, after barely missing a shot at the national championship game against Tennessee, the Wildcats dropped all the way to the Builders Square Alamo Bowl. It was clear early on this year that they again would not be invited to any of the other BCS bowls.

"Yes, it's disappointing," Snyder said. "You come to realize what we have to do is be a better football team. A year ago, our destiny was in our hands. It tells me we need to win them all."

When it was pointed out that other schools do not need to win them all, Snyder said several factors could be working against the Wildcats.

"We might not be as good a football team as we need to be," he said. "There might be a perception that we just haven't arrived yet, that we haven't established the kind of tradition some programs have. It might be the concept of our non-conference schedule. Or it may be a combination of all those."

Since the invitations are apparently influenced by the networks, many K-State fans believe they are being penalized for having a small population in Kansas.

"There's always the perception, I guess it's factual, that we don't offer a whole lot of TV sets in the state of Kansas. I'm sure that's part of the process that goes into it," Snyder said.

FAN ASSAULT

Raymond Roberts, a homicide detective who has worked security at the Alamodome about six times, said police would not ignore a plea for help.

The Losole family first leveled the accusation in The Omaha World-Herald, saying a mob of about 15 Longhorn fans attacked them.

The article set off a flurry of messages to the Nebraska newspaper's Internet site. Some messages called Longhorns classless and cast a shadow over Texans in general.

By late Sunday, the sparring between loyalists of both teams had spread to the Web pages of the Austin American-Statesman. Some Longhorns played down what they saw as a typical post-game scuffle. Others were embarrassed by the allegations.

Patricia Ohlendorf, vice president for administration at the University of Texas, urged San Antonio police to investigate the matter.

"We regret very much that people were treated like this in our state," Ohlendorf said, adding that such behavior was not characteristic of most Longhorn fans.

She wished Nebraska good fortune in the Fiesta Bowl.

Voters defeat movement to recall Karen McCulloh

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

City Commissioner Karen McCulloh will remain in office.

McCulloh received 62 percent of the total votes in Tuesday's special recall election. She received 4,400 votes in her favor with 2,649 against. Total voter turnout was 32 percent.

After hearing the results at the City Commission meeting Tuesday night, McCulloh asked Mayor Roger Reitz for a five-minute break to hug her husband, who brought flowers and balloons to congratulate her. She received applause from the audience and hugs from the other commissioners.

McCulloh said she is pleased with the results and that she got a little teary-eyed when she saw her husband.

"Its been extremely difficult," she said. "But now that it's over, I can't help but be very appreciative of all of the calls and letters of support.

"It's truly wonderful — the outpouring of love from the community," she said.

Election Officer Rich Vargo called the recall election after verifying that a recall petition filed by the recall committee — comprised of Don Rose, Marvin Zentz and Stanley Hoerman — had the required 2,237 signatures.

The committee filed the petition in June, disagreeing with McCulloh's vote to remove a monolith of the Ten Commandments from the front of City Hall. The monolith was removed after a 3-2 commission vote, with commissioners Carol Peak and Bruce Snead also voting to remove the monolith.

McCulloh said she hopes this vote has settled this issue and that there will be no action taken by the committee against Peak or Snead.

Rose, chairman of the recall committee, said his group is going to enjoy the holiday and then meet after the first of the year to consider the situation. It's been a hard struggle, he said, because his group is not made up of career politicians, receiving a salary.

He said he is proud of its effort.

"We fought a good fight, given all we can, and we made our mark," he said.

Rose said he thought the vote would go more in their favor, but that he will accept the will of the majority.

"I accept the will of the people — the voters," he said.

McCulloh said she would have liked to see a higher voter turnout but was happy the citizens did the sensible thing.

"They know elected officials have to make hard calls," she said. "If they don't agree, they should wait till the next

THE END OF A CENTURY

Rise to the top

BY JOSHUA KINDER

Under Coach Bill Snyder, Wildcats rise from depths of college football

"Ten years down the road, hopefully we can look back and see a program that is on solid ground, and one that hopefully could win in the vicinity of six to eight ballgames a year and when all things fell into place, had the opportunity to compete in a bowl game, or for a championship," — Bill Snyder, Nov. 30, 1988.

On that day, Snyder was introduced as K-State's 29th head football coach — and 10 years later he turned out to be the architect of what has been called the greatest turnaround in American college football history.

He faced the unenviable task of trying to turn around a program considered by most the worst in the nation, considering no team had ever lost as many games as K-State in the history of American college football.

Snyder since has guided the Wildcats to 86 wins in the '90s, including seven consecutive bowl appearances. In fact, one would have to add every K-State win from 1956 to 1988 to get 86 wins.

"Determination says it all," former K-State defensive end Dirk Ochs said. "He wasn't going to take no for an answer. He just wasn't going to take it, and he wasn't going to back down, either. He wanted to prove they were wrong and that K-State will win."

Prior to Snyder coming to K-State, the Cats had gone 2 1/2 seasons without a single victory. On Sept. 30, 1989, Snyder led K-State to its first win in 30 games when it defeated North Texas State 20-17.

Although K-State managed to go just 1-10 in Snyder's first season, for the seniors on the team the win meant much more, since it was their first and only win.

Former linebacker Matt Hennesy, who played at K-State from 1987 to '89, said the victory felt like the team reached one of the highest pinnacles in sports.

"It was unbelievable," he said. "You would've thought we won the Super Bowl or something. I think that was the turning point of the program."

Snyder was happy for his seniors, but would have preferred to win more than just one game.

"It was different for me than it was for them," Snyder said. "I was so pleased because indeed none of them had an opportunity to play in a major college football game which they had won.

"I was disappointed because it was the only ballgame that we won. That was a difficult year, but I felt wonderful for them because they experienced something positive, and if it hadn't been for that one, they never would have experienced it, and that would have been such an unfortunate thing."

What is a coach to do first when he arrives at a program that had suffered so many years of turmoil? In Snyder's case, it was simple. He didn't concern himself with the past but instead concerned himself with how to improve the team in the present, and there wasn't much in the past the team wanted to pay attention to.

"Obviously, it was a very busy time because we were trying to pay attention to a number of different things," Snyder said. "We didn't really

Fraternity allegations considered

■ Self-imposed sanctions OK'd by IFC after guilty plea by Fijis.

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Phi Gamma Delta fraternity pleaded guilty to allegations of substance abuse and human-rights code violations Tuesday night in an Interfraternity Council hearing.

Self-imposed sanctions, which the IFC Judicial Board heard and amended, were recommended by Fiji.

Mike Goodpasture, senior in physical sciences and president of IFC, said sanctions were discussed at the hearing for Fiji. The self-imposed sanctions were not revealed.

A letter sent to the IFC accusing Fiji of the violations required investigation and resulted in the hearing.

The hearing was designed to finalize investigations that have been occurring within the fraternity.

Adam Nigg, senior in military science and management and director of judicial affairs for the IFC, said Fiji was given the chance to plead its case after the party who voiced the complaint presented its argument.

"From the complaint presented, Fiji was able to plead guilty or not guilty," Nigg said.

The identity of the party who voiced the complaint and the nature of the complaint were not revealed.

The allegations were brought against the entire chapter. Goodpasture refused comment on the hearing.

Jewish student says rule hurts religious rights

By JENNIFER KEHLER
Kansas State Collegian

A campuswide policy, enacted to ensure the safety of K-State students by prohibiting the burning of candles and incense in campus buildings and residence halls, might prevent some K-State students from practicing their religion.

Justin Rosenberg, junior in computer science and vice president of the Jewish student organization Hillel, said the campus policy prevents him from lighting the candles in his menorah and celebrating Hanukkah in his room in Goodnow Hall. He said he believes his situation is unique and should be considered an exception to the policy.

"I think they should make an exception because it is part of my freedom of religion," Rosenberg said.

Hanukkah is known as the Festival of Lights or Festival of Dedication, which celebrates the rededication of the Second Temple after it was recaptured by the Jews. A vial of oil was expected to burn for one day but actually remained lit for eight. The tradition of lighting the candles on the menorah symbolizes Jewish survival and light from within.

Derek Jackson, assistant director of housing and residence life, said the policy is enforced in the residence halls to ensure the safety of students living there. An exception cannot be made for Rosenberg, Jackson said, because every situation must be addressed in

Wabaunsee jail might have to close due to drug reports

ALMA, Kan. — The Wabaunsee County Jail might have to be closed and inmates housed elsewhere in the wake of reports that prisoners have easy access to drugs, guns and knives, the county commission chairman said.

"We were just shocked and appalled that this type of activity was occurring in our jail facility," Fred Howard, chairman of the Wabaunsee County Board of Commissioners, told The Topeka Capital-Journal on Monday. "I find that just absolutely stunning."

Howard said county commissioners are waiting with apprehension for reports from investigators and Attorney General Carla Stovall before they decide what to do.

A report by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation said past and present jail workers and inmates said the inmates of the Wabaunsee County Jail had been smoking marijuana for an extended period of time.

Alex Frank Thompson, a 30-year-old inmate from Alma, told authorities during an investigation that he took marijuana from the evidence locker and smoked it in jail.

Wabaunsee County District Judge Gary Nafziger sentenced Thompson on Monday to 34 months in prison for one count of trafficking in contraband in a correctional facility. The sentence will run concurrently with a 24-month prison sentence for one count of possession of methamphetamine, which was found on him when he was arrested on the trafficking charge.

Thompson said the former head jailer told him and another inmate to straighten up the evidence locker. While working in the room, Thompson said, he had access to weapons and drugs.

Authorities said Thompson took about 8 pounds of marijuana from the locker.

"We was having a good time," Thompson told the judge. "There was guns, knives — you name it. All we took was the drugs."

Baby's eyes removed to try to prevent spread of cancer

IOWA CITY, Iowa — With cancer ravaging 18-month-old Jalen Howsare, his parents did the only thing they could to try to stop the spread of the tumors. They let doctors remove his eyes.

"The most important thing is to have Jalen around and healthy," Jalen's father, Tom Howsare, said. "If he doesn't have sight, we can deal with that. And we think he's strong enough to deal with that."

The family from Solon learned Monday that doctors found no other signs of cancer after Friday's operation.

Jalen had an illness known as bilateral retinoblastoma. He had about 100 small tumors in his right eye and 50 in the left.

"It's the most severe case we've seen in decades here at the university," said Dr. Culver Boldt of the University of Iowa's University Hospitals in Iowa City. "These are very aggressive tumors. It can be an extremely lethal condition."

About one baby in 15,000 has retinoblastoma, and about 25 percent of those children have it in both eyes.

Boldt said most are diagnosed early in life, and less severe cases can be successfully treated with radiation or chemotherapy, though sight might not be saved in either case.

Jalen's tumors were not diagnosed until last month. Because the tumors were on the edges of Jalen's eyes rather than toward the middle, they were harder to detect until they had grown rather large, the doctor said.

Homeless couple charged after death of firefighters

WORCESTER, Mass. — A homeless couple were charged with involuntary manslaughter Tuesday in connection with a warehouse fire that killed six firefighters.

Thomas S. Levesque, 37, and Julie S. Barnes, 19, had been living together on the second floor of the abandoned warehouse for several months, District Attorney John J. Conte said. The blaze allegedly started Friday night when they knocked over a candle during an argument.

The fire from the candle ignited clothing and papers, Conte said. The couple tried unsuccessfully to extinguish the fire and rescue their dog and cat, he said, before they fled the warehouse. They made no attempt to report the fire, Conte said.

Two firefighters went into the building after reports that squatters had been living there. When the firefighters became lost in thick smoke and radioed "Mayday, mayday," four other firefighters tried to find them. All six died.

It was believed to be the nation's deadliest blaze for firefighters since 1994, when 14 firefighters perished in a forest fire in Colorado.

NASA delays shuttle launch because of electrical cable

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A nicked electrical cable has forced another launch delay for space shuttle Discovery's flight to the Hubble Space Telescope.

Discovery is now scheduled to blast off late Saturday. Liftoff had been scheduled for earlier in the day.

It is the fifth time that NASA has delayed the Hubble repair mission, almost entirely because of damaged shuttle wiring.

This time, technicians found a one-eighth-inch nick Monday in the Teflon insulation of a critical engine wire; the conductor was exposed. The bundle of cables containing the bad wire was replaced Tuesday.

During the latest shuttle launch in July, an exposed wire caused a short circuit that knocked out two engine computers. The entire fleet was grounded after wiring defects cropped up in all four shuttles.

Discovery and its crew originally were supposed to fly to Hubble in October. The mission took on an added urgency when the telescope's pointing system collapsed in November, halting all astronomical observations until the shuttle arrives with replacement parts.

4 injured in school shooting in Netherlands; 1 in custody

VEGHEL, Netherlands — A teenage student apparently bent on revenge opened fire inside a high school in the Netherlands on Tuesday, wounding a teacher and four students in the first school shooting in Dutch history.

In a drama now chillingly familiar in the United States but unprecedented in this country known for its strict gun-control laws, the 17-year-old suspect fired more than 10 shots inside the regional vocational school in Veghel, about 60 miles south of Amsterdam. He then surrendered to police.

Church bells rang in sympathy through the rainy evening in Veghel, a working-class industrial town infused with the smell of chocolate from a factory that manufactures Mars candy bars for the Netherlands.

The victims were taken to hospitals, where two of the students were in critical condition. The teacher, a 46-year-old woman, and another student were in stable condition and out of danger after surgery. A fifth student suffered a bullet graze wound, police said Tuesday.

Police did not identify the suspect, in line with Dutch privacy laws. The gunman opened fire with a pistol of unknown caliber in a school hallway and in a computer room crowded with students shortly after 2 p.m.

"There was panic in the school," police spokeswoman Gerda Preusting said.

Preusting said the suspect was upset over a romance and appeared to be hunting for someone who was not there.

FOOTBALL

focus on what had been and what was, but more on what we hoped it would be and like for it to be, so each day was a challenge for all of us. I think each day was rewarding because there were so many steps forward that you could take in a lot of different ways."

Former Wildcat linebacker Brooks Barta, who played at K-State from 1989 to '92 and ranks second on K-State's all-time career tackle list, said the program changed its look overnight.

"There was a great deal of excitement," Barta said. "Everything went from what seemed to be a high school program to a college program overnight. The expectations were set higher and the practices got tougher, and with that they expected us to do things right."

When Stan Parrish resigned as head coach of K-State football after the 1988 season, then-athletic director Steve Miller and current associate athletic director Jim Epps wanted to pursue a Division I head coach, rather than hiring a Division II coach.

Snyder wasn't on the original list of candidates. In fact, Miller and Epps visited 18 college campuses before Snyder's name was mentioned.

"Jim suggested to me that we hadn't talked to a guy named Bill Snyder in Iowa," Miller said. "We had heard time and time again that Snyder had done some good things there, but he definitely wasn't in the first group of coaches we talked to."

Miller phoned the offensive coordinator in Iowa City and asked whether he would be interested in the head coach vacancy. Snyder first declined, saying he wasn't interested in the job, but Miller and Epps didn't give up.

"Originally, they had called and that was before our season was over, and I told them I wasn't interested at the time, primarily that we were still in our season," Snyder said. "A week or so later, they called back and asked if I would visit with them after the season, and I said they could come up if they liked."

After meeting with Snyder, Miller said he knew right away that Snyder was the best candidate for the position.

"We talked for about 30 minutes, and I knew he was the right man for the job," Miller said. "I then spent the next couple of weeks promising him the world and convinced him that he could get those things when he came."

Snyder said he only wanted to make K-State football a competitive program again.

"In our dialogue, I indicated those things that would be important to give this program the opportunity to survive or succeed," Snyder said. "Steve was very willing to commit to those things, and granted, Steve is an individual that is very outgoing, and I'm sure probably consented to things that he wasn't sure he could accomplish, but he is a doer and I was confident that he understood how significant those issues were."

In Snyder's first season, salaries of the assistant coaches were raised nearly $10,000 each and the recruiting budget was raised from $125,000 to $300,000.

As far as coaching went, Snyder's first priority was to improve a program accustomed to losing.

"First, we have to learn how not to beat ourselves," Snyder said on the day he was announced as head coach.

Hennesy echoed Snyder's first-day comments.

"Up until then, in my experience and career there, we had always found ways to lose," Hennesy said.

Snyder initiated a list of goals, the 12 goals for success , and he wanted the team to know them. In fact, he had team members take tests to make sure the goals were embedded in their minds.

"We had to memorize those that first year," Hennesy said. "We had a test on it. We had to know them, because that's how much it meant to him, because he really truly believed in them."

Today, the Wildcats have 16 goals — something a pre-Snyder K-State hadn't practiced.

"That's just what our goals have been throughout the 11 years," Snyder said. "They really haven't changed. They do, but don't have anything directed toward winning and losing. They are intrinsic values."

It took five seasons for the Snyder-led Cats to reach their second-ever bowl game, their first in 11 years.

Tucson, Ariz., marked the site of the 1993 Weiser Lock Copper Bowl, where K-State pounded Wyoming 52-17 in front of nearly 20,000 Wildcat fans who followed the team.

"That was really a highlight of the time we have been here," Snyder said. "We had tremendous support, and I thought that was really special. It told me something that I had learned in the previous years — that there was a tremendous support base for Kansas State football."

Nebraska wingback Lance Brown reaches out for the football as linebacker Travis Ochs pulls him down at the Nebraska 38 during the first drive of last season's game at KSU Stadium. Nebraska scored a touchdown on the drive.

Of the Cats' next five bowl appearances, none would mean as much to fans until the 1996 and 1997 seasons. The Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl in 1996 posted what was to be one of the largest crowds to cross state lines to follow a single team when nearly 45,000 people traveled to Dallas to see the Cats take on BYU, a contest that K-State dropped 19-15.

The 1997 season marked the first time that K-State had won 11 games in a season, after defeating Syracuse 35-18 in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, and more than 50,000 K-State fans traveled to Tempe, Ariz., to witness the contest.

In a way, the 1997 season highlighted what was to come in 1998. With 12 starters from the previous season returning, the Cats made a dream run. It included a victory over every regular season Big 12 Conference opponent, including the Nebraska Cornhuskers for the first time in 30 years. The team went undefeated in the regular season for the first time in school history. In that same season, with Michael Bishop at quarterback, K-State earned its first-ever No. 1 ranking from Nov. 1 to Nov. 29 in the ESPN/USA Today Top 25 poll.

In the end, the Cats were upset by Texas A&M in the conference championship and again in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl to Purdue, but it was a season for the record books.

"I certainly wouldn't make light of it," Snyder said of the No. 1 ranking the Cats received during the season. "I think our players were proud of it. I could share some pride in that, and I'm sure our coaches could as well. I think that at the time it happened, our approach remained the same. Those things would take care of themselves if we continue to improve ourselves and get ourselves better, and when it really counts and it was all said and done, we weren't good enough to be there." I was proud that we accomplished that."

With the losing tradition of K-State and the past 11 years of winning K-State football in mind, Snyder said it adds to the heritage of the university.

"Students at Kansas State University have only experienced the good," Snyder said. "Nobody here other than faculty and the people who were here in the community at that time knows and understands what the 1980s, '70s, '60s, '50s — whatever decade you want to pick — was all about.

It's really part of the heritage of Kansas State University. Everything isn't always good, but it kind of highlights where Kansas State is now. I think you have to understand the first 90 years in order to really understand the last 10."

Enrollment

In 1990, enrollment at K-State topped 20,000 students for the first time, which had been a goal of the university, and President Jon Wefald expressed his happiness with the number in a 1990 Royal Purple article.

"Since the late '60s, K-State has alumni across the nation who have been waiting for the day when K-State would have more than 20,000 students," Wefald said. "Part of the reason the alumni have been hoping for this is because all of the other Big 8 institutions since the 1970s have been over 20,000 people."

Throughout the decade, K-State would continue to set new attendance records, including a record enrollment in fall 1999.

Library facilities

Students gathered in the early part of the decade to stage a sit-in, organized to bring awareness to the university's inadequate library facilities. The protests worked, and K-State officials, along with the Legislature, began to look for ways to fund the expansion.

The funding was found, and the expansion to Farrell Library, later renamed Hale Library, was completed in April 1997. The university continues to look for ways to increase the amount of materials contained in the library.

Fire in Aggieville

Tragedy struck Aggieville on Feb. 14, 1998, when a fire was reported in the city's historic district. The flames blazed through the northeast corner of Aggieville, and in the ashes lay $1 million in damages.

Men's basketball falters

It was a rough decade for K-State basketball fans. While the football program continued to improve, the basketball program struggled throughout much of the decade. Although the men's program was historically strong, it advanced to the NCAA Tournament just three times during the decade. However, the team did continue its home-court advantage, having a winning home record each year.

1990-1999

Owner Jon Levin greatly expanded Varney's in the 1990s. In the fall of 1991, Varney's opened The Children's Book Shop, followed in the summer of 1992 by the K-State Place - both originally located in the Manhattan Town Center.

The Children's Book Shop in Topeka was opened in the fall of 1992, followed by another Children's Book Shop in Lawrence in the fall of 1997.

On May 23, 1995, a heavy rain caused a huge section of Varney's roof to collapse. Miraculously, no one was injured in the disaster, but it took the whole summer to repair the damage and replace the merchandise for the opening of school!

In the fall of 1998, Varney's took a major step in purchasing the vacant Campus Theatre building. The new and expanded Varney's Book Store should be ready to serve K-Staters in the fall of 2000 - watch for our Grand Opening!

OPINION

Precautions necessary to avoid gas inhalation

The difference between life and death for two K-State students earlier this week might have hinged on their alarm clocks ringing.

Had they decided to turn off their alarms and sleep in that morning, they might not have awaken at all, because the carbon monoxide in their apartment had reached dangerous levels. The students almost were victims of America's leading cause of poisoning deaths — carbon monoxide.

Every year, 200 people in the United States die, and 500 more are hospitalized from carbon monoxide poisoning. It is a greater danger to people in the winter. Carbon monoxide is a colorless, odorless gas produced by burning of fuel. That means it is produced by furnaces, chimneys, flues and vents. It can infiltrate your residence through hot-water heaters, stoves, space heaters, high-temperature venting pipes and improper ventilation.

Symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning include dizziness, mental confusion, severe headaches, nausea and fainting.

There are things short of going without heat that you can do to protect yourself from this colorless, odorless killer.

First, if you own a house, have it inspected annually by a qualified professional. If you rent, make sure your landlord has your building or house inspected at least once each year.

Second, don't heat up cars for long in a garage connected to your house — even a garage with the door open. Slight amounts of carbon monoxide can cause symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning, such as exhaustion.

Thirdly, get a carbon monoxide detector. It will alert you to the presence of levels of carbon monoxide in time before the gas reaches lethal levels. The detectors should be placed near bedrooms so you can hear the alarm if it sounds, but at least 15 feet from the kitchen and bathroom.

Finally, if you experience symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning, get to a hospital.

BRANDI HERTIG

Trying times lie in future

Rapidly approaching is the year 2000 — a point in history where people in the 1950s thought we'd be flying around with jet packs, a la "The Jetsons." In this age of Jerry Springer, school shootings and tech vests, can we make similar starry-eyed predictions for the coming years? I say no, but we sure can pretend for a brief shining moment, eh?

September 2002 — PepsiCo Inc., in an attempt to bolster morale at its university, will mandate daily viewings of a loyalty video with host Pauly Shore. As a result, nine out of 10 students will suffer seizures, while the others will develop newer and more exciting forms of onset diabetes.

July 2012 — Researchers in the chemistry industry finally pinpoint the cause of obesity in the United States: being fat and lazy.

August 2015 — Former "Golden Girl" Rue McClanahan will surpass Wilt Chamberlain's record number of sexual adventures by finally sleeping with Bea Arthur.

May 2022 — The depletion of the natural supply of fossil fuels will force motorists to cut holes in the bottoms of their cars and use their heels to brake while yelling, "Yabba dabba doo!"

October 2034 — Canada will invade the United States during the Canadian Thanksgiving. As well as being forced to listen to Barenaked Ladies and the Tragically Hip, Americans will have to acknowledge a regime run jointly by Michael J. Fox and the Kids in the Hall.

January 2045 — The second coming of Christ will finally come to pass, but millions of Christians will be disappointed when they learn Jesus is really not the son of God, rather a pot-smoking, dress-wearing J. Edgar Hoover. He officiallly will change his name to Chaz and tour the States in an orange Volkswagen Bus.

May 2057 — Engineers will push the continents back together, forming the long-lost super continent of Pangaea. However, George W. Bush still will not know where Mexico is.

April 2069 — Abortions will become mandatory when too many babies are born looking like Starr Jones.

June 2075 — Keith Richards, the last surviving member of the Rolling Stones, will die just as he planned — between the breasts of a model, bottle of Dramboui in hand.

January 1, 3001 — Worldwide catastrophe strikes as the real millennium begins. Confusion over how many Xs and Ms should be used in the Roman date causes mass annihilation. The few survivors include MacGyver and the robot from "Small Wonder." Together, they create a utopia.

Isn't the Cotton Bowl a little bit better than the Holiday Bowl? So that if we won the Cotton Bowl, we'd probably get a better spot in the rankings next year.

I was wondering why they call it dead week when we have tests all week.

I support your decision to go to the Holiday Bowl. Now let's go out there and show those BCS fools what they're missing out on.

I really enjoyed hearing the K-State choir sing outside Eisenhower Hall the other day, and the teacher who came out and told them they weren't allowed to sing out there is going to get nothing but coal in her stocking.

The entire student body should be ashamed at the Collegian staff not remembering that Dec. 7th is Pearl Harbor Day.

Can we put something in here about the football team that's not completely fair weather?

The Parking Services need to watch residents in Jardine using guest parking passes to avoid paying for parking permits.

Keep finals week the way it is. The last thing I want to be doing on a weekend is studying for a final.

We get out late enough as it is. Keep finals week as it is.

I think Kansas State should start letting the BCS grade its classes. That way the people in the College of Business will finally get nailed for their weak strength of schedule.

Costa Rican student struggles against stereotypes

GUEST VIEWPOINT

DANICA COTO

First things first. I don't live in a tree, nor does my uncle or my dog for that matter. Neither does anyone else from Costa Rica. I had to make this clear to a guy I met in California, who was curious as to what type of trees we Latin people live in.

But don't get me wrong. I prefer people ask about my culture and my country than to make stupid assumptions. Such as Dan Quayle, who, when asked by a reporter why he was brushing up on his Latin, said he wanted to better communicate with people on his visit to Latin American countries.

So I've learned not to be offended by people's comments, especially when they think their nicknames for me are cute. "Bean," "Taco" and my all-time favorite, "LDC" (lesser-developed country) all have been names I've answered to. My heritage now has grown into something of a joke, in which people I work with try to come up with the most offensive comments they can think of, racial slurs included.

The best comment by far came when I was enjoying, of all things, chili with Fritos — quite the American meal. Being the generous person that I am, I offered some Fritos to my friend Jenn, who said, "Did you grind the corn for these yourself?"

But I've learned to take this all in good fun. All these people would be in severe pain had they said all this seriously.

I can't blame some people for their responses, though. Costa Rican culture is so different from American culture, and although I've been in the states for 4 1/2 years, there are habits I'll never get rid of.

Take, for example, our custom of kissing guys and girls on the cheek when we greet or say goodbye to each other. After I come back from vacation, I always greet people with a kiss. The worst incident was when I kept trying to kiss this girl to say "hello," and she just kept backing up. So we engaged in a kind of fencing scene, where I just kept advancing, and she kept retreating, thinking I was attacking her or something. I found out later she thought I was trying to engage her in some lesbian act.

There also is the issue of my accent. I've heard everything from "Wow, you speak English so well that you'd never know you were from an underdeveloped island," (kudos to my mom, who's from California, for teaching me English at an early age) to "How cute, is that the new word you learned in your ESL class?"

Then there are people who think Latin accents are sexy, in particular my boss. He has this penchant for me saying "Ay, papi," and cracks himself up thinking I say this late at night, under the sheets. For the record, I don't do this — not every night, at least.

The only drawback to my nationality, not that I'm biased or anything, is when people find out where I'm from. It's amazing how many friends you have when Christmas rolls around and you say you're going to a tropical beach for New Year's. But my parents don't mind visitors, as long as they clean their feet before coming in. Tree houses are awfully hard to keep clean.

Reader lauds opportunity shelter offers for residents to adopt pet

Editor,

I am writing in regards to the article last week on the planned expansion to the T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter. I would like to encourage students, alumni and citizens of Manhattan to contribute any amount of money they can give to this worthy cause. Anyone who has visited the shelter knows it is much too small to handle all the homeless animals in the area. Every contribution, big or small, can help make the new expansion a reality.

There is one more request I would like to make of readers, and that is to visit the shelter and consider adopting a new pet of your own. With winter setting in, homeless animals are in desperate need of a warm home. I have visited the shelter lately and seen many beautiful and healthy animals in need of a new family.

I adopted an adult male cat from the shelter more than a year ago, and I am so glad I did. I love my cat very much, and I hate to think what might have happened to him if I hadn't taken him home. Please consider giving this same chance to another animal, and let them bring you happiness in return.

Vending Services manager asks students to show appreciation

Editor,

Since February 1961, the K-State Student Union has provided refreshment vending services to K-State. Over these years, the Union Vending Department, originally known as Union Concessions, has provided a proud tradition of quality service to the campus community.

With the recent completion of the exclusive contract with Pepsi Cola, vending on campus will be handled differently. Pepsi and its subsidiary, Five Star Vending, will be responsible for providing like services to K-State beginning Jan. 3, 2000. We are confident they will continue the tradition and wish them the very best.

Between now and the first of the year, I am asking that you hug a vending employee in appreciation for the many years of service they have provided to the K-State community. Thank Dale Budden for his 31 years of service.

Thank Jean Akin for her 26 years, Ken Evers for his 18 years and Rich Fransler for his 11 years. Thank Richard Stephenson and Charles Finger for their three years of service. These six people represent an accumulative 92 years of loyal, dedicated and honorable service to K-State. Thanks, team.

Student researches Congressional Medal

BY KATIE LAUX
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Congressional Medal of Honor is the highest award for valor in action against an enemy force to be bestowed on an individual serving in the U.S. Armed Services.

Most people don't know anyone who has earned this honor, but Tim Frank, graduate student in history, has met dozens. Frank said he has been interested in the Medal of Honor Society since he was 10 years old.

After going to the Korean War Memorial dedication ceremony and seeing a man with a blue ribbon around his neck, Frank discovered the Congressional Medal of Honor — and what would become his life's passion.

He began researching the Medal of Honor Society and interviewing everyone who would talk to him. Frank said he eventually plans to write a book containing the real-life stories of Medal of Honor recipients.

"I want my book to be different than all the others," Frank said. "I want it to be in the recipients' word, more like a compilation of stories."

He said he is studying history because it intrigues him, and in his spare time he chooses to search out the long-lost stories of the bravest men and women in U.S. history. Frank has published four stories with the U.S. Navy for the Naval Aviation News magazine.

Frank recently attended a reunion for Congressional Medal of Honor recipients in California, where he made some new friends and reunited with some old ones and vowed to let their stories be told.

"Like all veterans, these people have sacrificed so much for their fellow man and this country," he said. "We can't let that be forgotten."

Frank said his dreams of being a historian began in grade school. He grew up listening to his grandfather tell stories about serving in the Army Air Corps in Hawaii during the 1930s and in the Navy during World War II.

After the first few interviews with Medal of Honor recipients, Frank said he found that no one was talking to them.

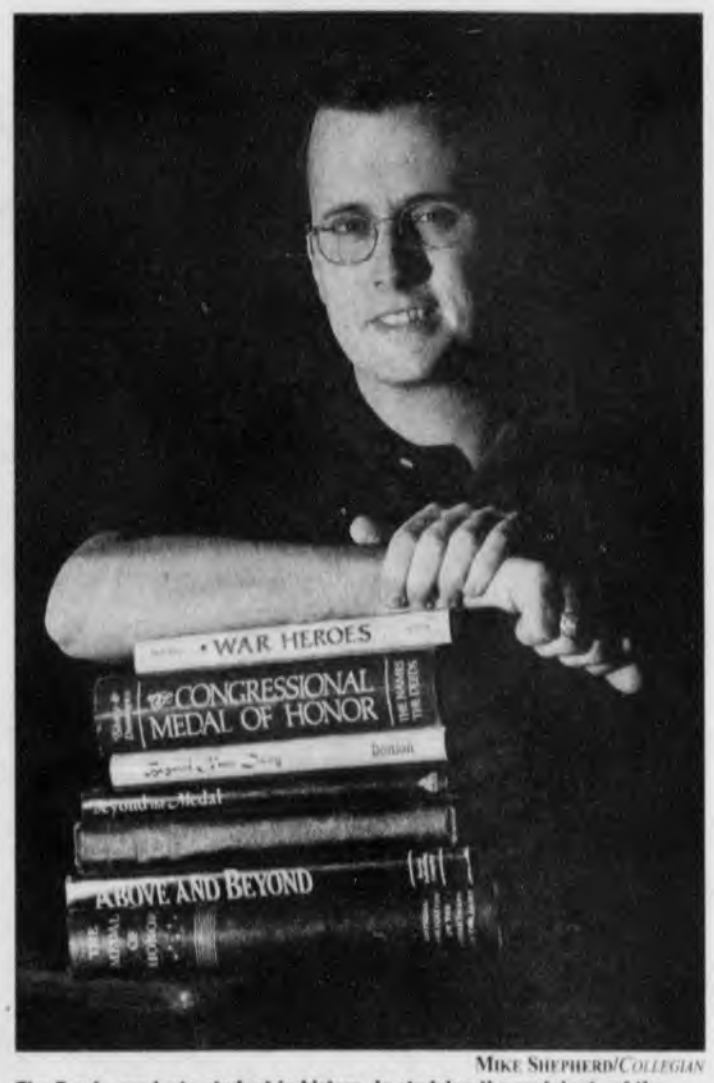
"I had always looked at people in the spotlight and asked, 'Why would they want to talk to me?' I later came to find that nobody was talking to them," Frank said.

After gaining the respect and trust of the recipients, Frank said he realized the Medal of Honor recipients were from all walks of life. There are no color boundaries or socioeconomic restraints for the Medal of Honor.

"I found that the Medal recipients represented a good cross section of America," he said.

People are not aware of the immense honor behind the medal, Frank said.

Frank said he plans to spread the word and make others aware of the incredible people behind the medal.



Others said they agreed the stories need to be told.

"I think the recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor are the great heroes of our country's history, and their stories should be made more prevalent and available to the young minds in this nation. Otherwise, these great men and their stories may be lost to time," Charles Purma, senior in political science, said.

To receive the Congressional Medal of Honor, a potential recipient must have two eyewitnesses and at least one recommendation. The recommendation then is reviewed by a panel, and if it is deemed that the candidate went above the call of duty, the honor then is bestowed.

Among the 3,410 total recipients, there have been 2,363 medals awarded to the Army; 745 to the Navy; 295 to the Marines; 16 to the Air Force and one to the Coast Guard, as well as nine unknowns.

Soda inventory to drop during transition week

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's transition to one soft drink company is about to begin.

Two vending companies, Coca-Cola Co. and PepsiCo. Inc., will begin the transition process next week by limiting their refilling of drink machines.

"There'll be some reduction in filling of machines next week," Bill Wisdom, head of Vending Services, said.

The transition period is a result of a 10-year, $12-million exclusive-drink-rights contract the university signed with Pepsi in November. All Coke machines will be moved off-campus toward the end of the month, and a majority of the Pepsi machines will be moved as well, to be replaced by newer machines.

As a result, vending officials are hesitant to restock the machines fully because they will be easier to move if they are not full. Wisdom said Pepsi officials and vending services will attempt to make the changes as smoothly as possible.

"I want to alert the students that we will be doing the best we can to service the machines next week," Wisdom said. "A student may see a light go on for a drink, but they will likely be able to get it somewhere else.

"We are going to try real hard to keep all of the products available," he said. "There just won't be as much of it."

The process, Wisdom said, will continue through next week.

"Then the week of Dec. 20, equipment will start to get pulled," Wisdom said.

Associate Vice President for Administration and Finance Tom Schellhardt said the contract is in the final stages.

"It is at the point now where it is being finalized," Schellhardt said.

He also said it basically is at the reviewing stage, where the two parties look over the material one last time.

"We are going to try real hard to keep all of the products available. There just won't be as much of it."

— Bill Wisdom, head of Vending Services

In the agreement with Pepsi, K-State placed a three-year pricing freeze on drink prices for the 12-ounce cans.

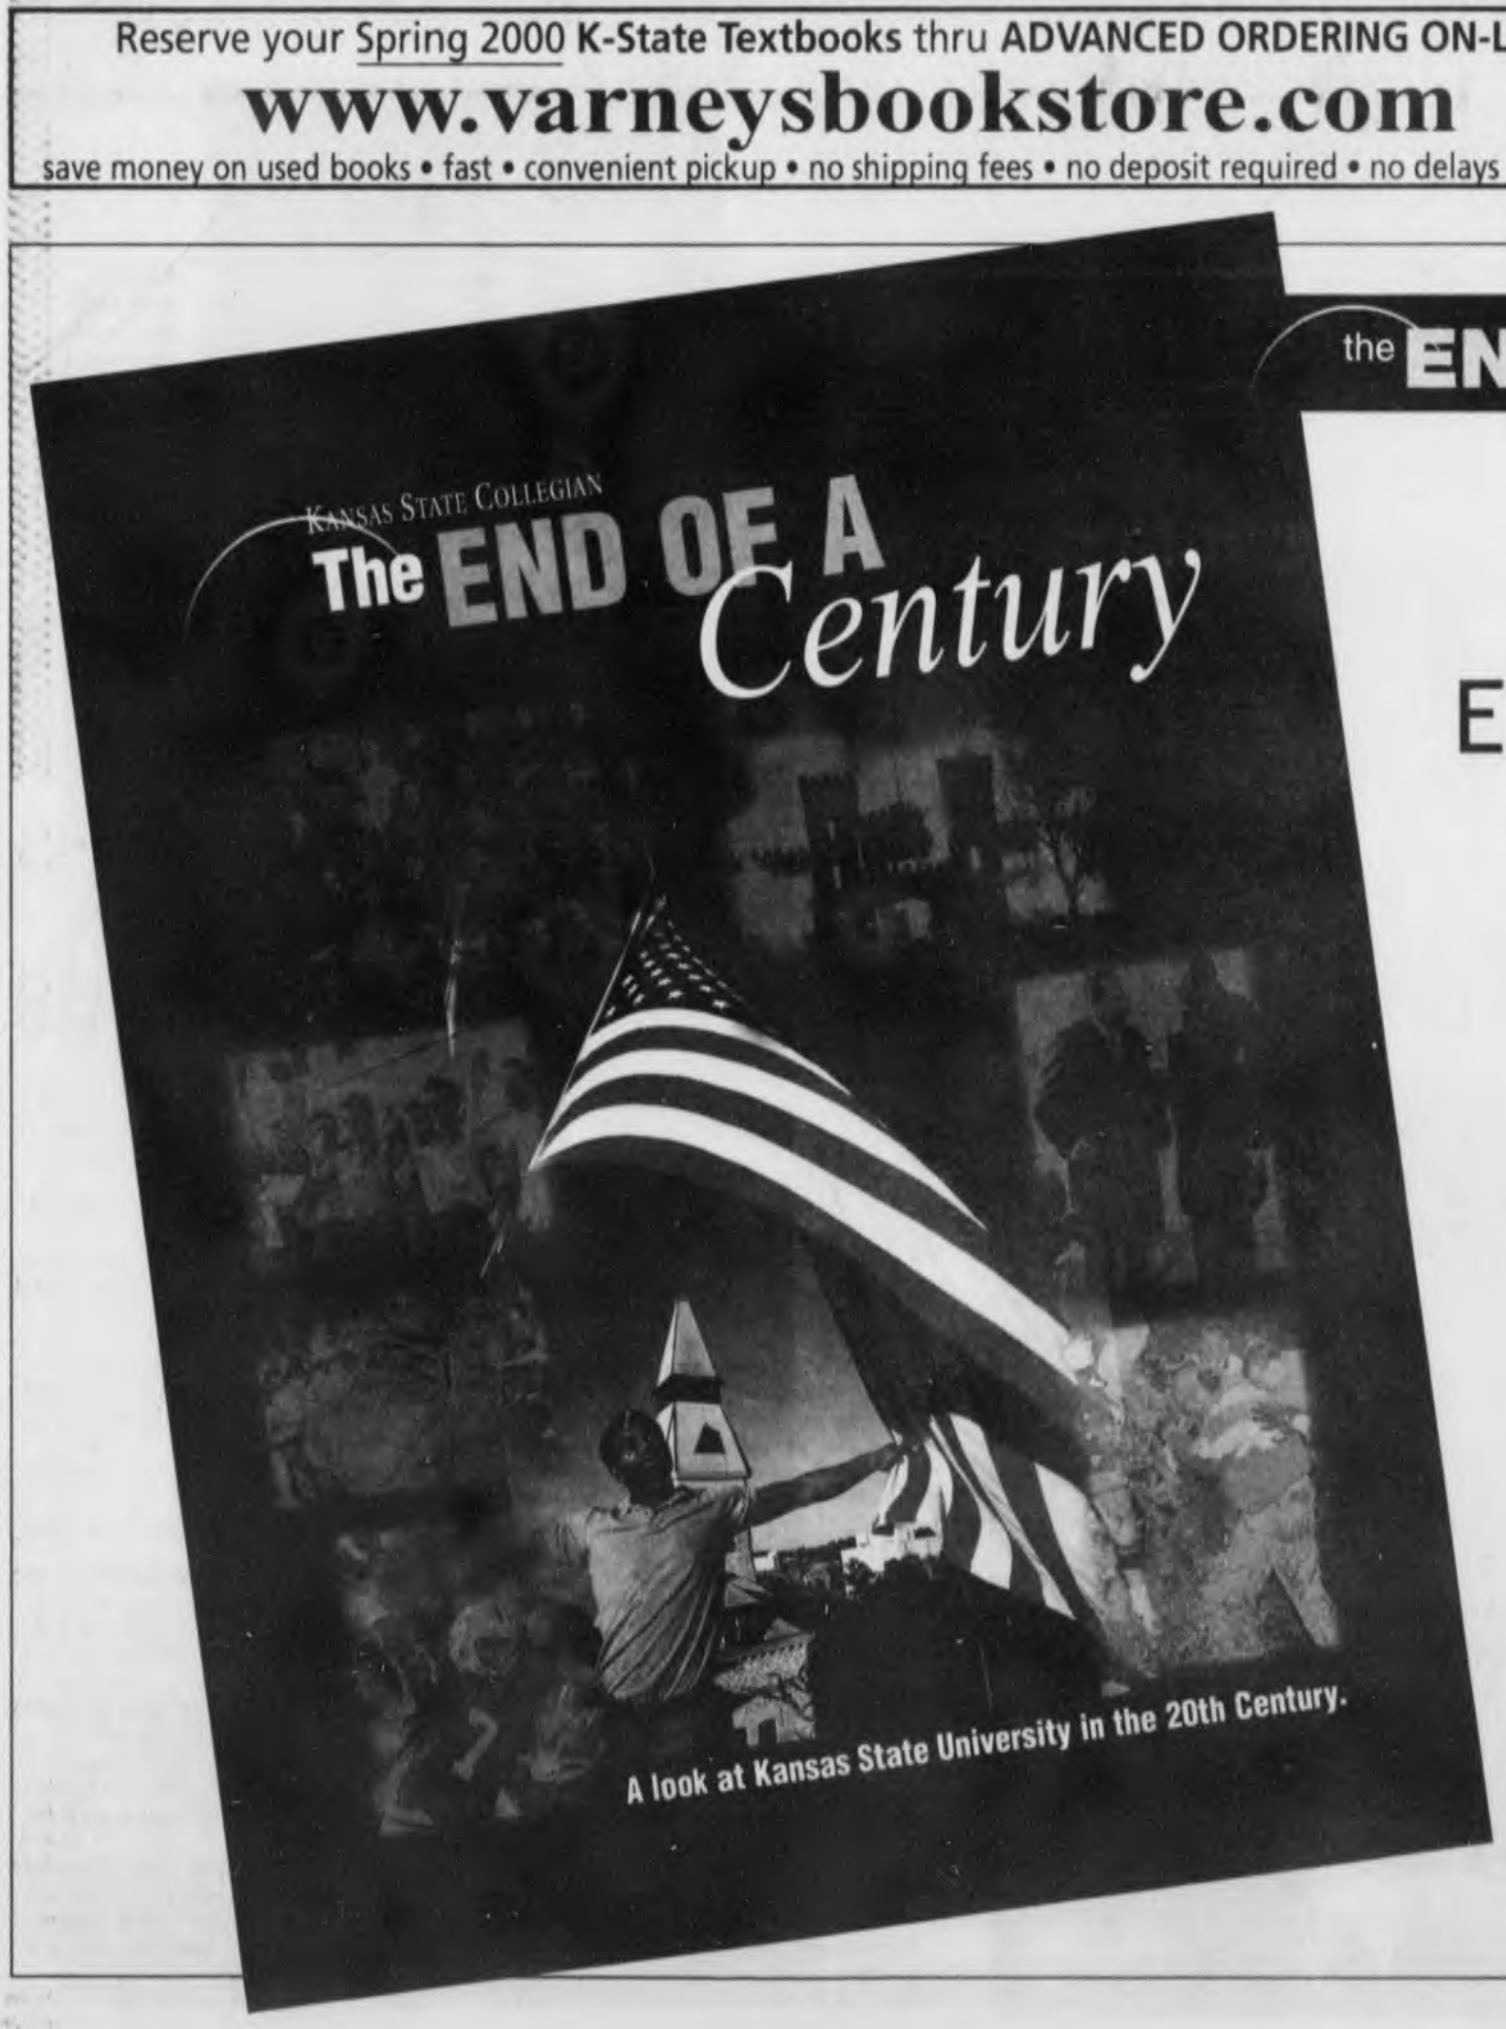
The agreement also includes plans to stock a majority of the machines with 20-ounce bottles, which will be sold for 85 cents.

The changes in vending also signal the end of an open-drink market at K-State. Wisdom said the contract takes effect almost immediately after the new year.

"Officially, January 3, is the date Pepsi and Five Star Vending take over," Wisdom said.

Wisdom said he is being reassigned within the K-State Student Union. He said his secretary also will remain with the university, and some of his staff members plan to work for Pepsi.

"Three of our staff members will be going to work for Pepsi and Five Star Vending," he said.



The other staff members still are examining their options, Wisdom said, and that his staff's new job will be to see that the new partnership is successful.

Bowl remedy means fixing BCS system

Always the bridesmaid, never the bride.

It's practically a motto here at K-State.

Despite a 10-1 record and a No. 6 ranking in the BCS, the Wildcats were passed over by BCS officials in favor of the more marketable, although lower ranked, Michigan Wolverines.

The reason for the snub is simple. We are K-State, and as one bowl official commented, no one wants to watch K-State play football.

Despite this snub, the BCS continues to break its arm trying to pat its own back over the success of a system that does little more than highlight the obvious and underscore the national football bias.

It isn't so much that K-State was overlooked, but that the BCS is trying to promote itself as the fair and equitable answer for college football.

Therein lies the problem.

If the first-tier bowls continually are going to reward teams based more on tradition than on on-field savvy, and based on who will be sure to place ABC atop the Nielson Ratings, the "fairness" of the BCS system must be questioned.

Yes, I understand that exploiting underpaid college athletes as a year-end cash cow is the way the TV industry works. If we want to relish in that as a "success," fine.

But I can't accept the BCS continuing to tout its success under a banner of equitability.

Ignoring rankings is anything but equitable.

The task that is laid before K-State by the BCS is to win every game on its schedule, including the Big 12 Championship game. If the Wildcats go 12-0, they get a shot at the big boys. Michigan, on the other hand, just has to show up at the stadium on game day and it'll have a prominent bowl locked up.

BCS promoters are trying to dictate the way Bill Snyder schedules teams.

If Snyder puts a team like Notre Dame on the schedule, then every pundit from here to South Bend, Ind., will end their "cupcake" schedule criticisms.

If Snyder continues to follow the philosophy that has pulled K-State out of the football cellar, then the criticisms will remain, and K-State will be punished when the regular season is over.

Evidently, routing intelligent Catholics impresses sportswriters, and facing untested challengers keeps eliminating respectability.

The message is simple: Beef up your schedule or get permanent reservations for the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl.

Aside from the BCS's absolute disregard for fairness, what exactly did the BCS do that we are supposed to be so darn thankful for? They put No. 1 Florida State in the Nokia Sugar Bowl against No. 2 Virginia Tech. Excuse me if I don't leap out of my chair in excitement.

Any poll in the nation could have matched up those two teams (except for the Seattle Times poll, which puts Nebraska in the No. 2 spot). Why do we need the BCS to put these two teams together? I could poll three Welsh exchange students and a Seeing Eye dog and get the same results. Why do we need an elaborate mathematical system that requires more technology than the Mars Polar Lander just to come up with the world's most obvious answer?

The answer: we don't.

Until the BCS begins to serve as a basis for all four BCS games, and not just the national championship game, it will remain an unneeded system established for convenience but existing in confusion.

ABC's analysts can continue to tell the nation not to shed "crocodile tears" because K-State blew its chance for respectability when Michael Bishop fumbled the football in the fourth quarter of the 1998 Big 12 Championship game.

The reality is that K-State never had respect to begin with. Until the "money first, fairness second" mentality of the BCS is challenged, K-State never will get the respect it is due.

K-State will remain a bridesmaid until the BCS creators can find a union between bowl bids and fairness, finally earning K-State a marriage at the pulpit of national respect.

K-State women look to carry momentum from home victories into upcoming game

By SARAH CRAIG
Kansas State Collegian

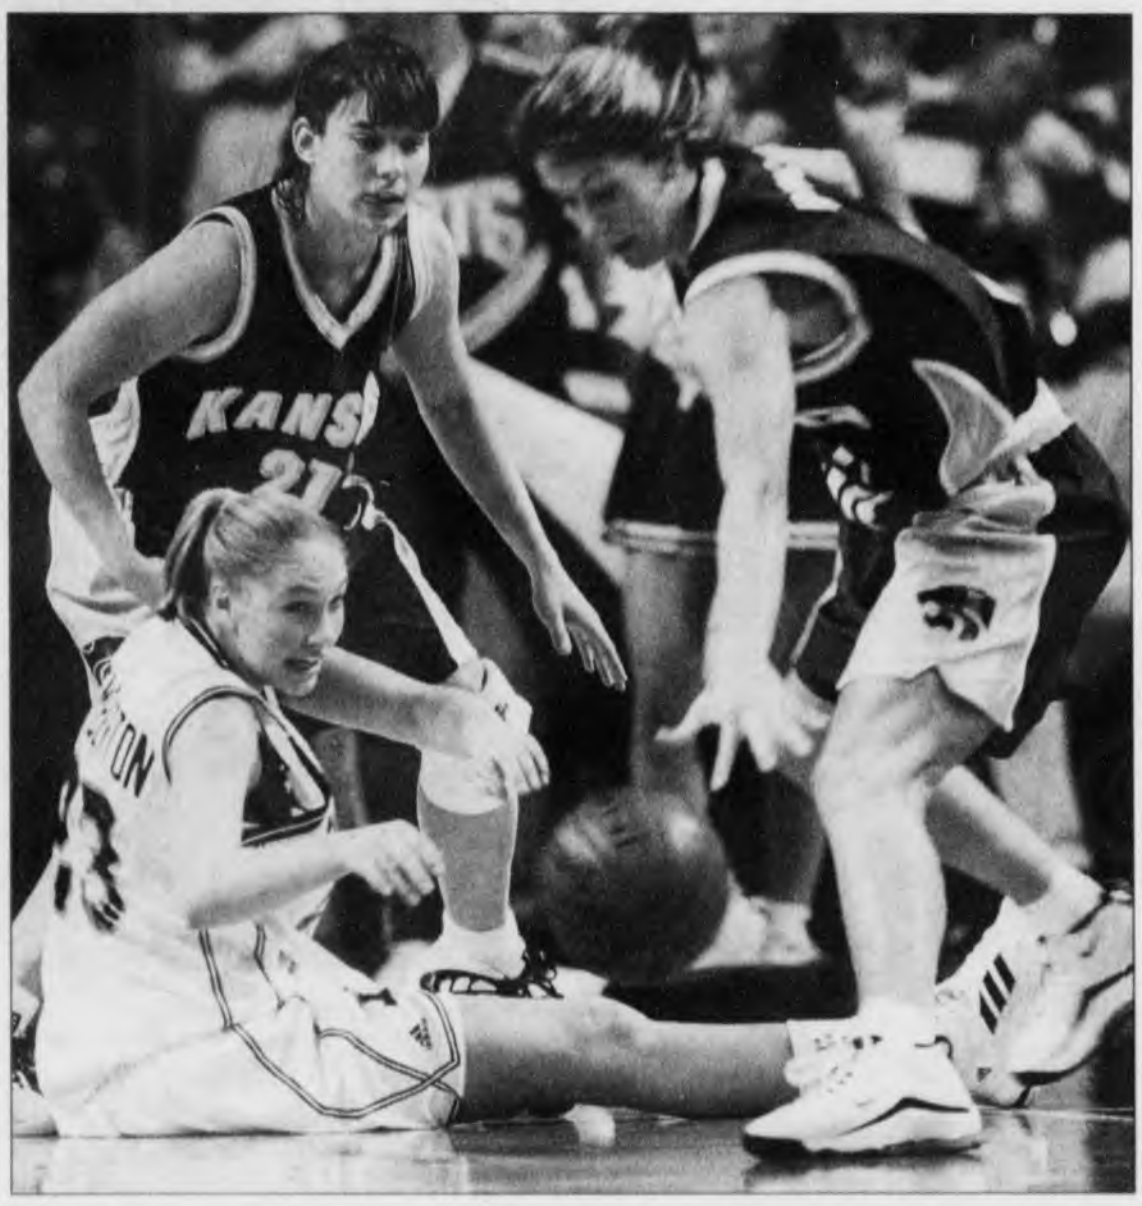
The K-State women's basketball team travels to Wisconsin-Green Bay tonight to compete in what head coach Deb Patterson said she considers the team's first real road game.

This will be the first game the Cats (4-2) play on non-neutral or non-home ground, so they have to fight the home-court advantage. Patterson said the Wisconsin-Green Bay Phoenix (2-4) team has proven itself at home.

"They play very well at home, so you have to be prepared when you're on the road to assert yourself early and to keep foreign officials out of the game," Patterson said.

The Cats have worked primarily on defense this week to prepare a solid man-to-man for this team.

"They'll run a lot of motion in the offense and really back-cut a lot, their posts will step out, they'll post you up, they have a very aggressive mentality as a team, and they will penetrate a great deal off the dribble," she said.



"I think that's good at this point, because we struggled with that, so it's going to give us an opportunity to sharpen up our defensive presence on the ball. When you identify a problem area, and you come back into the gym and work on it for a couple days, it's good to be tested on it right away."

The Cats will see inbound plays different from any this season, Patterson said, but they have tried to prepare to handle that.

"They run some very unconventional inbounds plays, which is fun. They're really creative and tend to be very successful," Patterson said. "If we have them well scouted, then we should take care of six to eight points."

The Phoenix's leading scorer, junior Melanie Tilque, averages 11.3 points and 4.5 rebounds. Patterson said the Cats will play a man defense to continue to challenge themselves and prepare for later competitors.

"I think we need to continue to experience the kind of looks that we're going to see from Green Bay, and it's real important that we don't allow ourselves any slippage," Patterson said. "I'm real pleased with the way they have responded, and I like our defensive look at practice. They need to carry that intensity with them on the road. You cannot show up flat and succeed."

Idaho's Darci Pemberton loses the ball to K-State's Nicky Ramage in the second half of Saturday night's game, which the Wildcats won 81-69. The Wildcats' two wins in the tournament improve their record to 4-2.

Senior passes career milestone, contributes more than points to team

By SARAH CRAIG
Kansas State Collegian

Scoring 1,000 points is a significant feat for any basketball player. Scoring 1,000 points after having spent much of the junior year on the bench is even tougher. That's what senior center Angie Finkes did last weekend in just the sixth game of regular season.

Finkes ranks 22nd with 1,024 points on the list of women to achieve 1,000 points.

Head coach Deb Patterson said Finkes is not the type of player who contributes only points to her team, and that is why she respects Finkes as an athlete.

"When I think about the contributions that she makes, I think of communication, intelligence, discipline within our offensive and defensive systems, and her hard-nosed, aggressive demeanor, which makes her very tough defensively and on the boards," Patterson said.

"I understand that she has developed a couple of go-to moves that are just very solid, very fundamental, and the type of move that whether she's defended by someone 6'4" or 6'1" are tough to defend."

Finkes crossed the 1,000-point line late in the second half of the Cats' 80-32 win over Alabama State. She said she had no idea what a big shot she was putting up when she did.

"It's kind of hard to keep track of your points when you're running up and down the floor, so I had no idea," Finkes said. "It's something I think everybody tries to accomplish, so I'm really proud of it, but I'm more glad that we won."

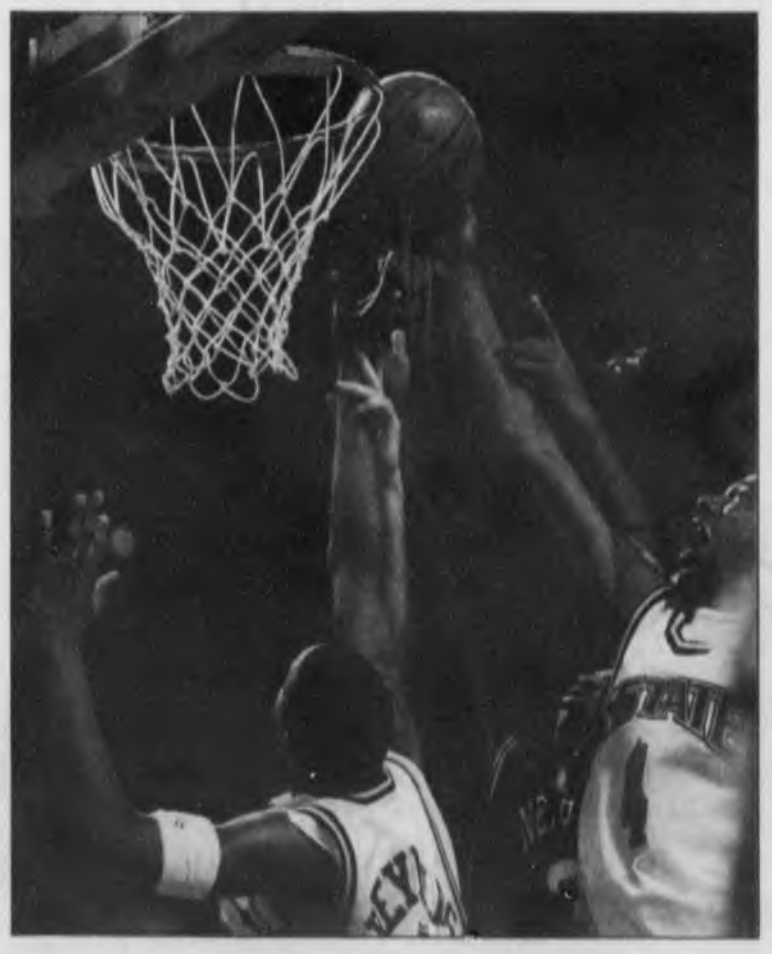
Patterson said she has enough confidence in Finkes to expect double-digit scoring in almost every game, something she has seen her do against tough competitors.

"She's not only been successful in our program, but we've lined up against many of the very best teams in the country," Patterson said. "That's why her attaining the 1,000-point mark is so significant from my perspective. She's done it the hard way, and I respect that."

Finkes doesn't really like to talk that much about the mark, except to say that she's proud. Patterson said she considers this one of the most valuable parts to this player.

"Angie doesn't think about points, she thinks about what she needs to do to help this team win, and I think that's one of the things that has allowed her to be successful," Patterson said. "She's concerned about competing to win and contributing on the floor offensively, defensively, on the boards and as a leader to bring her team to success."

Finkes attributes a great deal of her success to the people surrounding her in the past three years — coaches and teammates.



"It just goes to show that we have one of the best coaching staffs in the country," Finkes said. "We have great three-point shooters, and you have no idea how nice it is to have outside shooters because it really loosens things up inside."

K-State's Angie Finkes goes up for a shot over Alabama State's Vicky Pouncey on Friday night at Bramlage Coliseum in K-State's 80-32 win. Finkes scored her 1,000th career point in the game.

Injury-riddled Cats prepare to face Memphis

K-State's Travis Reynolds and Tony Kitt fight with a New Orleans player for a rebound Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State won the game, 62-47.

STEVEN DEARINGER/ Collegian

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State men's basketball team might experience one of its toughest tests yet when it plays host to the Memphis Tigers tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

Memphis (4-2) is coming off an 82-72 win over No. 25 Miami on Saturday, while the Wildcats (4-1) are coming off of a 15-point victory against New Orleans, the best defensive game thus far for K-State.

K-State limited New Orleans to three field goals in the second half, including a 17-minute dry spell. For years, K-State has hung its hat on defensive play.

"It's been a continuous process for us," assistant coach Butch Hawking said. "With more repetitions, we're going to continue to get better. We can only see our defense getting better as the season goes on. It's all a matter of executing.

"We feel good where we are, but we're not thinking too far past Memphis. We just want to get a little bit better every day."

As K-State's season keeps rolling, other aspects have begun to shine a little brighter, namely the point guard position.

Until the contest against New Orleans, K-State had spent much of the time searching out a consistent point guard.

Junior Galen Morrison and freshman Kenyatta Dix saw most of the time at the position early, but with sophomore Josh Kimm healthy again, for the first time, the Cats have a true point guard. In Kimm's second career start last Saturday, he posted a valuable 33 minutes, committing just three of the team's season-low 13 turnovers.

This came after K-State had averaged nearly 26 turnovers per game.

"There is a lot of learning at the point guard position," Hawking said. "One has to be a good leader and be able to run the show. That's not an easy thing to do for anyone."

The Cats might be without their leading scorer in senior shooting guard Cortez Groves. Late in the contest against New Orleans, Groves tore his hamstring.

On the season, Groves has averaged 14.8 points per game.

Hawking said it will be a game-time decision whether Groves sees action.

With Groves possibly sidelined with an injury, senior Tony Kitt is expected to be counted on even more. On the season, Kitt has averaged nearly a double-double per game at 14.4 points and 9.4 rebounds.

The Tigers feature a young lineup, but have several standout players. Leading the way is junior guard Marcus Moody, who averages 13.2 points per game, as well as sophomore forward Paris London, who posts 7.2 point a game and nearly seven rebounds.

"It should be a good ball game," Hawking said. "They're loaded coming off their win against Miami. They play great pressure defense, so we have to be ready for them or it could be a long night."

Tipoff for the game is set for 7 p.m.

Country Stampede 2000 tickets available now; Brooks and Dunn, Chesney among performers

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Get the cowboy hats ready and the dancing shoes on, because Country Stampede 2000 tickets are available now.

Paige Roesler, festival manager, said the fifth-annual Country Stampede will be June 22-25 at Tuttle Creek State Park. Tickets for both the festival and campsites went on sale Saturday and can be purchased through the Stampede office or through its World Wide Web site, www.countrystampede.com.

"We have started to send out mailers and have already received a lot of calls about the tickets," Roesler said. "We are very pleased with the lineup for this year and expect to see a lot of people in attendance for the festival."

Roesler said a talent agency from Omaha, Neb., started gathering talent from the country music industry in August. She said the agency begins early to sign artists before they schedule concert tours, and many performers return each year.

"We have quite a few artists returning every year," Roesler said. "They have a good experience at the festival and get a great response from the crowd. We haven't had a lot turn us down unless they already have previous commitments."

Dustin Evans, Yankee Grey and Collin Raye are scheduled to perform at the kick-off party June 22. Tickets are $10 at the gate or free with a three-day or VIP ticket.

Other top country artists scheduled to perform at the Stampede include Chely Wright, the Oak Ridge Boys, Sawyer Brown, Kenny Chesney, Dwight Yoakam and Sammy Kershaw. Brooks and Dunn will close the festival Sunday night.

"Brooks and Dunn were here in 1997 and put on a great, high-energy show," Roesler said. "We asked them to come back this year, and we expect they will bring in a good crowd."

Another group, Styx, also will be performing. Roesler said there was a good response last year with Lynyrd Skynyrd, so the Stampede decided to invite a non-country group again to allow something for everybody.

Shannon Miller, director of promotions and marketing for festival sponsor WIBW-FM 97.3, said Country Stampede is the station's biggest event for the year. She said the station now is doing everything from selling sponsorships for the Jumbotron to doing on-air contests for tickets to promote the event.

"Right now, our biggest role is to get people thinking about buying tickets for Stampede," Miller said. "We want to get people riled up for the festival and start them thinking about what they will be doing this summer."

Miller said when the festival started five years ago, it was only a three-day event. Now, she said it has grown to span four days and brings people from throughout the Midwest to listen to country music.

"This event is so much fun and is a great party for all who attend," Miller said. "Country music is on the rise and is what people want to hear. There is no other place in the area where people can see this kind of star power and have fun at the same time."

Dale Schwieger, park ranger at Tuttle Creek, said there is not much preparation for the festival this time of year. Those involved with the Stampede usually do most of the work and do not require much outside help from Tuttle Creek. However, crews have been working on grass repair, he said.

Sawyer Brown lead singer Mark Miller scans the crowd during the band's performance at Country Stampede 1998.

Because of the heavy rains that created a soggy final day for Country Stampede 1999, much of the grass was destroyed. He said the rain and the enormous number of people trampling it weakened the structure of the grass, causing it to not to grow in some areas. Stampede officials hired crews to replace the grass, and Schwieger said because of the good rains in the past few months, the festival grounds are ready to go.

"Country Stampede brings people back in other ways throughout the year," he said. "This is another way for people to see our park and what we have to offer."

Schwieger said the campgrounds also have been renovated, but the improvements were not necessarily because of the festival. He said although campsites still will be close to each other, electrical sites have been spread out to relieve some of the pressure that is created during peak times such as Country Stampede.

"The improvements will take pressure off several areas," he said. "Although these renovations were not done because of the festival, it will benefit all campers that attend the Stampede along with regular users."

Roesler said planning of the festival began directly after this year's event with signing groups and making the initial preparations for the event, which brought more than 103,000 people throughout the four-day festival. She said contacting business for sponsorships, sending information to potential vendors and making the media a key player in promoting the Stampede is the main work being done right now.

"There is great music out there, and it is also a time for family and friends can get together and have fun," Roesler said. "I know of many people who put these dates on their calender and plan their family vacations around it. Everyone can come out and have a good time."

Highway control to be transferred

BY TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite special meetings to resolve the jurisdiction of Kansas Highway 113, city commissioners waited until the last possible day in deciding to eliminate the road from the state highway system.

Commissioners unanimously agreed to co-sponsor a request with Riley County that gives control of the highway to the city of Manhattan and the county. The request, which will enhance an application for Kansas Highway 18 road construction, must be received by the Kansas Department of Transportation today.

The city and county will gain control of the road's speed limit, appearance and level of maintenance service.

Dan Harden, Riley County director of public works, said KDOT prefers to control highways that run throughout the state, rather than short highways such as K-113. By enhancing the KDOT application and taking responsibility of the highway, the city and county can increase their chances of receiving funding for improvements to K-18.

"It's a value to them," he said. "They want to shed that right away because it's expensive."

The city will inherit an average cost of about $180,000 per year by removing K-113 from the state highway system, which includes routine maintenance and milling and overlay to be completed every seven or eight years.

The state can have only 10,000 miles of Kansas roads. When that point is reached, Harden said KDOT could give local governments control of state highways, which would force the city to foot the maintenance bill with nothing in return.

"In the event that agency gets into a funding crisis, they might start shedding them," he said.

The $60 million project would bring safety improvements to K-18 by increasing lane widths and constructing safer ditches and medians.

Commissioners also had the option of purchasing "points," which would also enhance the city and county joint application.

"I'm wondering if we should try to buy some points and not encumber future generations forever by having them pay for K-113," Commissioner Karen McCulloh said. "If we are going to own Seth Child for the next millennium, I think paying cash would be much more efficient. It's just a question of do we have the cash."

Harden said this alternative functions better with smaller projects, because the cost of purchasing a point increases with higher costs.

County Commissioner Russ Frey said the city and county should work together in developing a system of future infrastructure funding.

"Community values have come into play," he said. "Our community is telling us, 'let's eliminate the risk by adding some points.' I would suggest it is time for the city and county to look at how we look at future funding for infrastructure."

Richard Hayter, former Manhattan mayor and Chamber of Commerce transportation task-force chairman, said K-18 is not designed for the high speeds or the amount of use it receives.

Commissioners also approved first reading of a charter ordinance that exempts Manhattan from a Kansas statute regarding the newly created Public Housing Authority Board of commissioners.

Commissioners agreed to co-sponsor a request with Riley county tht gives control of the highway to the city of Manhattan and the county. he request, which will enhance an application for Kansas Highway 18 road construction, must be recieved by the Kansas Department of Transportation today.

The charter ordinance would allow seven members to serve on the now five-member board.

Commissioners heard comments from residents who are unhappy with the board's lack of resident representation.

Commissioner Carol Peak, the temporary liaison between the board and the commission, said changes within the board and public housing management are necessary and will create a stronger link with the City Commission.

K-State graduate student awarded for submission of name, 'Cat's Den,' for new retail store in Union

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cats' Den will be the name of the new special retail store to open soon in the K-State Student Union.

Jenny Imhoff, graduate student in secondary education, came up with the winning name.

Following a contest that ended Monday, the name Cats' Den was selected from 246 entries from 94 entrants by an ad hoc Union Governing Board naming committee that included student employees. The UGB then chose the winning entry Monday at its meeting.

Imhoff said the name just came to her.

"I was thinking of wildcats in the wild and just had this picture in my mind of a wildcat guarding its den," Imhoff said.

For entering the winning name, Imhoff will receive a $250 Union Gift Card that can be used at 15 Union locations. She also will be involved in the grand opening ceremony and festivities for the Cats' Den.

Imhoff's name was not the only entry for including the word "cats," said Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions manager and naming committee chairwoman.

"The majority of the entrants wanted 'cats' or 'wildcats' or an anatomical feature of cats, such as paws, claws and tail," Snyder said.

"I was thinking of wildcats in the wild and just had this picture in my mind of a wildcat guarding its den."

— Jenny Imhoff, graduate student in secondary education

Cats' Den is set to open sometime in January, but the goal is to be open for the first day of classes, Snyder said. The 1,000-square-foot retail store will be located on the first floor near the north entrance to the Union and will provide a variety of school supplies, food, beverages, newspapers and magazines and some K-State clothing and novelty items. The film-developing center also will be moved to the store, she said.

The store also will feature two entrances, one of which is inside the Union's north entrance. This will allow Cats' Den to stay open even if the Union is closed, Snyder said.

Cats' Den will be open during normal Union operating hours, which are 7 a.m.-10 p.m. Monday through Friday, 7 a.m.-11 p.m. on Saturday and noon-10 p.m. on Sunday.

Campaign assistant to Nixon during Watergate affair to preach about new calling as Presbyterian minister

STORY BY JENN DAVOREN

A brief stay in prison following the Watergate scandal allowed the Rev. Jeb Magruder time to make decisions concerning his faith.

Events following his seven-month sentence will be the topic of his sermon, "Watergate and Beyond," when Magruder speaks at 10:30 a.m. Sunday at Manhattan's First Presbyterian Church.

"The sermon will focus primarily on his life, his involvement with the Nixon administration and his fulfillment as a pastor," the Rev. R.T. McConnell of First Presbyterian said.

Magruder, who served as the deputy campaign director for Nixon's re-election in 1972, was convicted and sentenced during the Watergate hearings when he and other members of the president's administration pleaded guilty to charges of obstruction of justice.

The book, "An American Life: One Man's Road to Watergate," came from Magruder's experience with the scandal.

"It's an honest insider's account," he said.

While serving time was hard, Magruder said it helped him in that he was able to make significant decisions about the direction he wanted his life to take.

"It made a lasting impression about what I wanted," Magruder said. "I wanted to do more in a sense of helping people with their faiths."

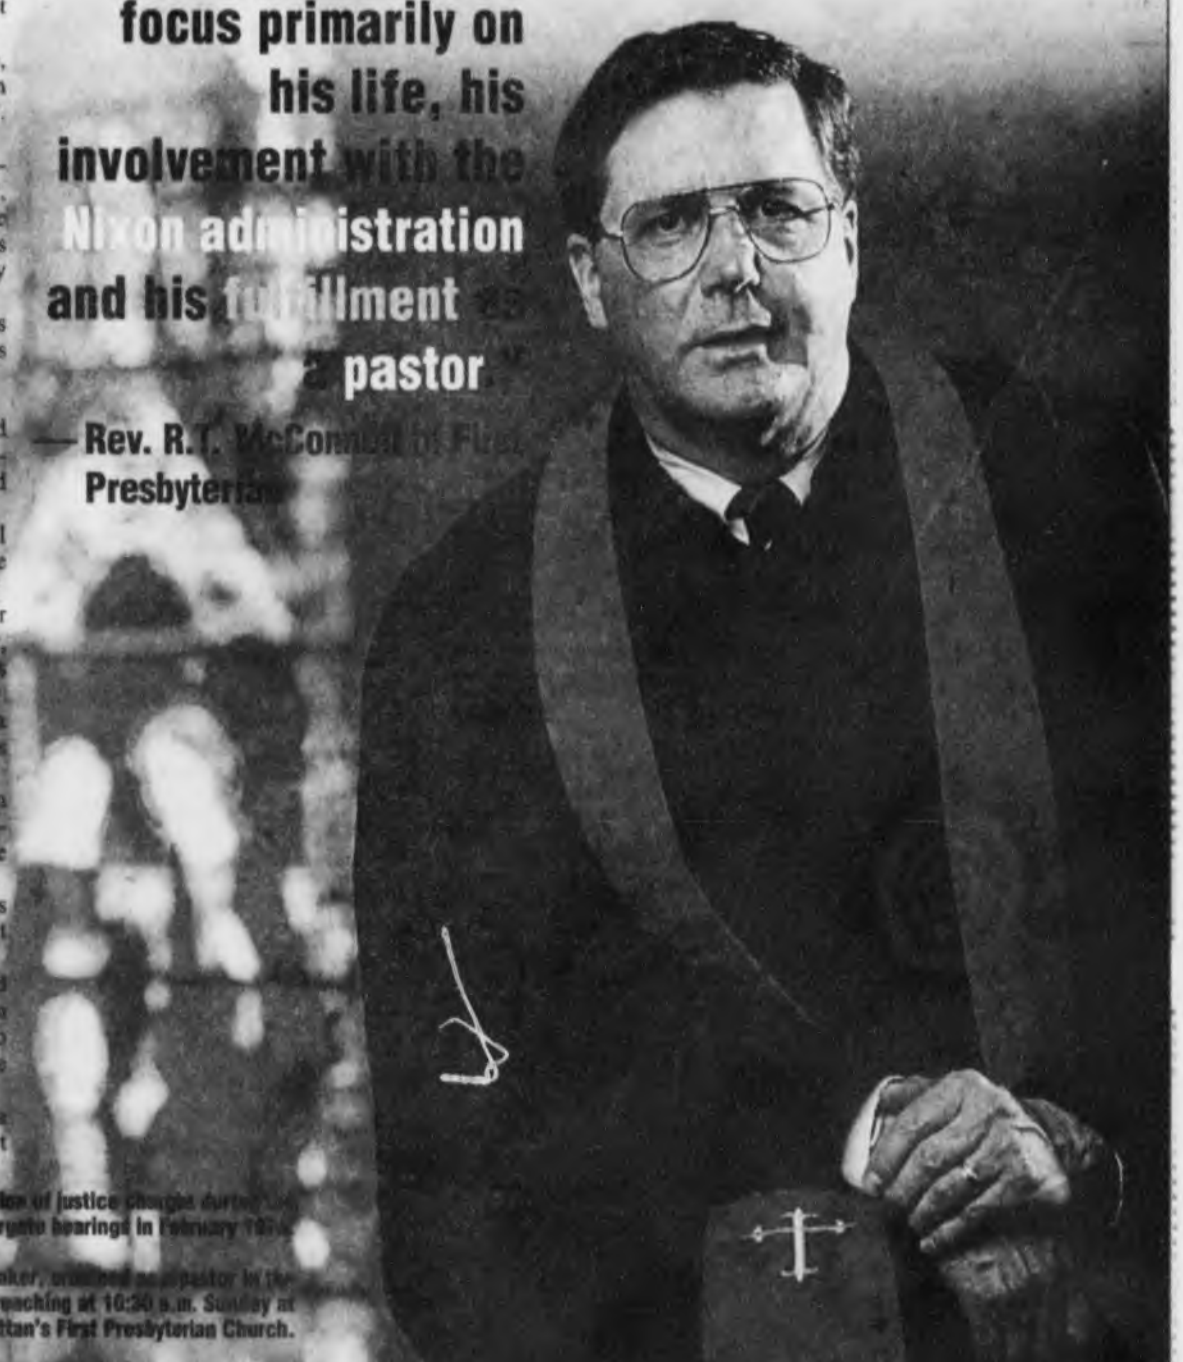
Shortly following his release, Magruder enrolled at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he spent three years studying for his masters of divinity degree.

"The masters of divinity allows you to be a pastor, chaplain or any of the variety of forms of ministry," McConnell said.

Magruder said his years at Princeton, due in part to the intense study of well-known theologians the school promoted, helped him to come to terms with Watergate and its repercussions.

"I went to find out philosophically as well as theologically how some people could get involved with something like that," he said.

Pastor positions in California, Ohio and Kentucky, as well as brief trips to churches in neighboring states, allowed Magruder to become well-known to Presbyterians across the country.



Magruder's trip to deliver a sermon to a church in Michigan allowed him to meet McConnell, and they began the correspondence that led to next week's Manhattan sermon.

"He's a friend of mine, and so when I called him a few weeks ago to ask if he would preach here in Manhattan, we set up this date," McConnell said.

Now that Magruder has retired from his place as senior minister of the First Presbyterian Church of Lexington, Ken., he has taken a position with Resource Services Inc., a firm that works out of Dallas. Magruder said the company aids in the development of churches.

"We don't use the term fund raising," Magruder said, "We use capital stewardship campaigns for churches."

"The sermon will focus primarily on his life, his involvement with the Nixon administration and his fulfillment as a pastor"
— Rev. R.T. McConnell of First Presbyterian

Academics not only impetus for campus religous growth

BY ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With finals approaching, some students might turn to their faith for some last-minute help.

Jeremy Hollowell, senior in operations management, said it isn't necessarily fair to bombard those powers with last-minute prayers about better grades.

"I may pray about my finals," Hollowell said, "but it's not God's fault that I haven't studied enough."

Jennifer Hennessy, senior in sociology, said that in her daily prayer, she will not ask to ace a class.

"I will pray for Him to help me remember or help me study" Hennessy said. "But I won't just pray to get an A."

At the St. Isidore Catholic Student Center, Father Keith Weber said there is usually an increased amount of students who attend mass before the end of the semester.

"The weekend before finals, most of the students are here," Weber said.

Weber said that on the average weekend, St. Isidore's masses have about 2,100 students who attend on a regular basis. During the week, an average of 40-75 students attend daily mass.

Brian Cobb, a preacher with the Manhattan Church of Christ, said more students attend church when there are home football games and around the holiday season.

Since college often grants students a larger amount of independence, sometimes students can stray from their religious beliefs, Weber said.

"To some students, it makes no difference at all if they are under their parents' influence," Weber said. "These students decide on their own to come to church on a regular basis."

Usually, students go to either extreme when it comes to their religion, Cobb said.

"It's a time of personal growth or regression," he said. "Their decisions can go either way to an extreme. It can be very good for their spiritual growth, but a lot of kids slip through the cracks."

Cobb and Weber said many times, students will refrain from going to church their freshman year. Usually by the time the students are sophomores or beyond, they decide to start attending church.

Hollowell said he still has the same values and beliefs as he did prior to becoming a college student.

"On the religious level, I'm probably about the same as I was in high school," Hollowell said. "I just don't go as often as I did then."

Hennessy said her level of devotion has increased since high school.

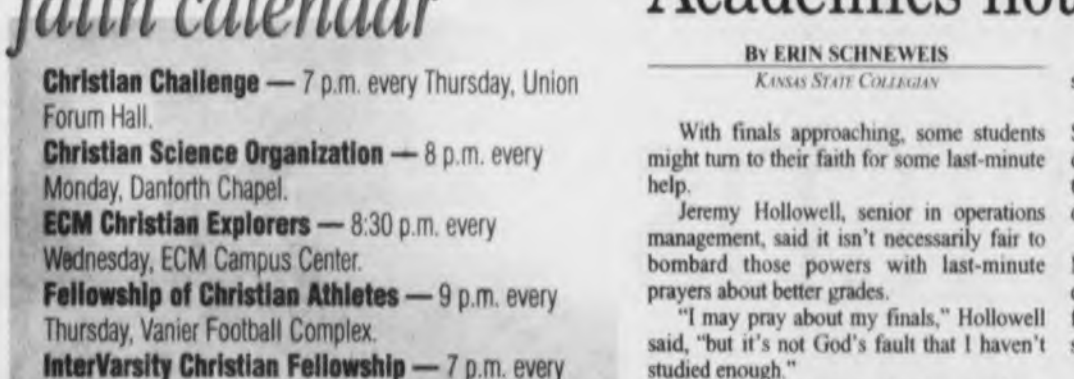
"In college, it became more of an issue to fulfill me," she said.

There are a lot of benefits for students who attend mass, Weber said.

"It keeps them grounded. It gives them a sense of direction and purpose," he said. "It gives them a sense of peace, joy and hope."

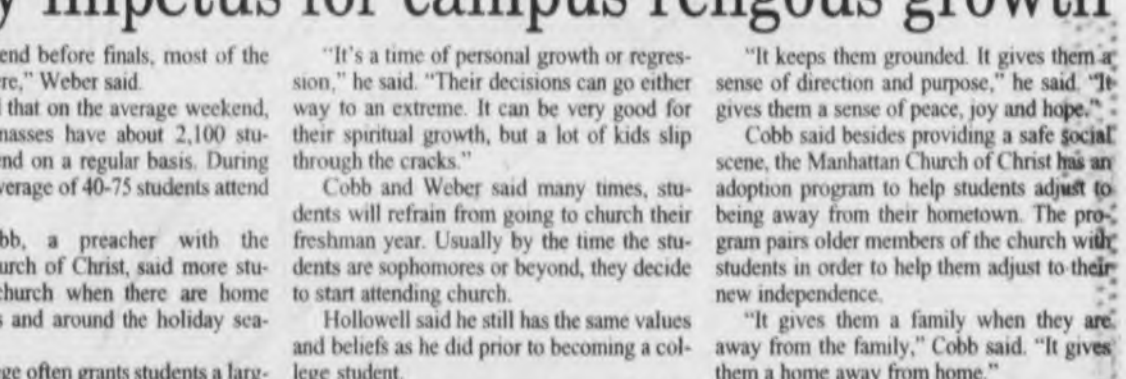
Cobb said besides providing a safe social scene, the Manhattan Church of Christ has an adoption program to help students adjust to being away from their hometown. The program pairs older members of the church with students in order to help them adjust to their new independence.

"It gives them a family when they are away from the family," Cobb said. "It gives them a home away from home."



For Hollowell, attending church does help him deal with different factors of his life.

"I think a lot of the sermons that I've heard have had a lot of bearing on my life," he said.



Hennessy said she looks to church as a place of fellowship.

"It is a place where I can be with a body of believers and worship God together," she said.

Trial begins in murder of K.C. soldier

■ Soldier might have been killed due to his sexuality.

BY JAMES PRICHARD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky. — An Army private accused of bludgeoning a fellow soldier to death with a baseball bat went on trial Tuesday, with military prosecutors saying for the first time that the victim was killed because he was thought to be gay.

Pvt. Calvin N. Glover, 18, of Sulphur, Okla., is charged with premeditated murder in the slaying of Pfc. Barry L. Winchell, 21, in July.

Before the start of the court-martial, Glover admitted to a lesser charge of unpremeditated murder. But prosecutor Capt. Gregg Engler pressed on with the court-martial, seeking to prove the more serious charge.

Engler said he would show premeditation by introducing evidence that Glover hates gays and suspected that Winchell was homosexual.

Premeditated and unpremeditated murder carry the same maximum sentence: life in prison without parole, plus a dishonorable discharge.

Glover sobbed while recalling the killing to Col. Gary J. Holland, the judge. He said he did not know why he hit Winchell at least two or three times with a bat during the July 5 attack in their Fort Campbell barracks.

Glover said that he had been drinking before the attack and that another intoxicated soldier encouraged him to use the bat to avenge a punch Winchell gave Glover during a party.

Winchell, who was from Kansas City, Mo., was perceived as gay by some soldiers in his unit, and friends said he had recently visited a Nashville gay bar.

general election to oust you.

"The community has come out in a positive way," she said.

McCulloh said she wants to see the state reevaluate the recall process. She said commissioners should be able to respond to charges against them without going through this entire process.

McCulloh, who will become mayor in April, said she didn't know whether her future included another run for commission but will give it some serious thought.

Rose said he thinks this issue has made the community more interested in their local government, calling it a national and local issue.

"Its sharpened the swords of everybody," he said.

John McCulloh, McCulloh's husband and K-State professor of history, said he felt enormously gratified.

"I see it as a victory for the principle of representative government," he aid. "I see it as a victory for moderation.

"Now it's time to work on healing the wounds," he said.

Karen McCulloh said she plans on getting back to work.

"It's going to be nice to finally sleep through the night," she said.

Despite the effort Rose put behind the recall petition, he said there is no animosity toward Karen McCulloh.

"I continue to extend my hand to her in a friendly way," Rose said.

HANUKKAH

the same manner.

"Once you start opening the door, it just becomes harder to make judgments of who gets to do it," Jackson said.

The campuswide policy was developed about five years ago, but Dwain Archer, director of fire safety inspections, said it has been enforced in residence halls and campus buildings for the past three years. He said it was instituted for the good of the university and to provide a safe environment for students.

"Our campus buildings are relatively old and constructed mostly of wood," Archer said. "With open flames, there is always the chance that they may be unmonitored and could lead to a fire."

Archer said two fires occurred in the residence halls last year. In one instance, a candle was left burning by an open window, and the wind blew the drapes into the flame, setting them on fire. A second fire began when a candle melted down onto a desk and lit a stack of papers on fire.

Jackson said he has seen an increase in the popularity of candles used for aromatic purposes. When people light candles and walk away from them, he said, there is a greater chance of a fire starting.

Rosenberg said his situation is different, because he won't be leaving the room while his candles are burning.

"I'm going to be right there the entire time in case something goes wrong," Rosenberg said. "Besides, they are birthday candles and will burn out within about five minutes."

Rosenberg said he is disappointed with the policy, especially since he is unable to celebrate with his family this year, and lighting his menorah is the main way to celebrate his religion. Without the candles, said he feels the blessing, which is to be said over the lights, will be insignificant.

"Hanukkah is supposed to be a celebration of lights," Rosenberg said. "For me, it's going to be a celebration of darkness."

Public Speaking II students present ideas for solving campus problems

By CHRISTINA HOGGATT
Kansas State Collegian

More than grades were at stake when six students presented speeches Tuesday for their Public Speaking II class.

The students tried to convince an audience of about 50 people to take action and sign petitions for various causes that they said would make a positive difference at K-State.

Professors' rights to notes

Brianne Dusin, junior in finance, urged students to sign a petition to prohibit K-State students from taking notes for commercial purposes.

Dusin told students about Internet sites that hire students to take class notes to be posted on their Web sites.

"The Internet knows no boundaries, and the new epidemic is student note-taking for commercial purposes," Dusin said. "These notes are the intellectual property of the professor, and the professor had the copyright."

Dusin said there are many problems with the notes available on Web sites such as studentu.com and versity.com. She said the main problems are that the posted materials and notes are incorrect, and they increase students' incentive to skip class.

"Student note-taking for commercial purposes," Dusin said, "is an invitation for disaster that increases students' incentive to skip class and is also an infringement on the professor's copyright laws."

Personal info privacy

Charlie Bennett, sophomore in pre-law and business operations management, spoke on how K-State students should have the right to choose whether their personal information will be posted on the Internet.

"K-State grants the world to know every student's personal information, and through this, our privacy is being violated," Bennett said. "Many students don't even realize how much of their information is on the Internet, because when students fill out their undergraduate information, it does not tell them that all of their information will be posted."

Bennett proposed K-State should offer students the choice of whether they want their personal information posted on the Internet.

"There has not been a huge problem with student information being on the Internet, but let's fix the problem before it gets out of hand," Bennett said. "It is a real easy problem to fix with very little cost to the university."

Student-adviser ratios

Missi Pike, junior in accounting and finance, spoke on the problems with the low number of advisers in the College of Business Administration and the high number of students.

She is petitioning for the student advising system in the College of Business Administration to be changed.

"The ratio of advisers to students is one to 650 or 675," Pike said. "This is not giving the students enough adequate attention to actually meet their educational and personal needs.

"I suggest the College of Business implement more advisers and add peer advisers or educators," Pike said. "The adviser-student ratio is inadequate, and the students in the College of Business are not getting the real benefit of an adviser."

Biological warfare issues

Tara Ludlum, junior in speech and theater and secondary education, spoke on the possibility of biological warfare and what K-State can do to prepare for it.

Ludlum said K-State, as an agricultural school, would be a perfect place to have a Biosafety Three Lab. The lab could come up with vaccines to stop biological warfare, would be able to see signs of the agent and would give Kansans a better sense of security.

"The threat of biological warfare is very real, and K-State has the resources to research and take care of the problem," Ludlum said. "I am asking you to sign a letter to Senator Pat Roberts that would help fund the biosafety lab."

Promoting safe sex

Shawn Vick, junior in electronic journalism, spoke on the issue of sexually transmitted diseases that affect K-State students and had a petition to add condom vending machines to residence hall restrooms.

"Millions of students are contracting STDs everyday, and the problem is K-State students are contracting STDs as well," Vick said. "I want you to sign a petition to the Student Senate to get condom vending machines in the residence hall bathrooms."

He said about 15.3 million U.S. students are infected with an STD, and two of the main causes are the lack of education and the lack of available protection. Vick said the solution to this problem should not be ignored, and K-State should face the facts and deal with the real issues.

"The only place to get condoms on campus are at Lafene and a few vending machines that are in obscure places," Vick said. "If we put condom vending machines in the residence hall bathrooms, the students would have greater availability to condoms."

Student Senate composition

Heath Schroeder, junior in finance and pre-optometry, spoke about the composition of the Student Senate and how the SGA elections should be changed.

"The problem with the SGA is that it's not a representative of the student body," Schroeder said. "With this misrepresentation, the Student Senate has a hard time seeing what the average student is needing from its governing body."

Schroeder said the student body profile consists of 17 percent residence-hall residents, 67 percent off-campus and 16 percent greeks, while Senate's profile is 15 percent residence halls, 30 percent off-campus and 55 percent greek. He said the cause of the problem is the SGA voting regulations.

"Under the current voting system, organized voting is running rampant," Schroeder said. "The sad part about this is that everyone recognizes the problem but does nothing to change it."

Schroeder said he thinks everyone on campus knows who will get into SGA and who will not.

"My solution to this problem is frighteningly simple," Schroeder said. "My plan is to limit each voter to one cast vote. This would solve the problem of organized voting within organized living arrangements," he said.

Schroeder urged students to sign his petition that will change the election rules to achieve diversity.

Culligan Holiday Bowl:
Washington

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
BOWL GUIDE

Dec. 29, 1999

Hear no EVIL

See no EVIL

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

After 3rd straight 10-1 season, Wildcats plan to make return to Holiday Bowl

Washington Huskies Quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo

K-State prepares to face Washington Huskies in Dec. 29 bowl game in San Diego

The Culligan Holiday Bowl against the Washington Huskies will present a conference clash the No. 7 Wildcats are not accustomed to.

The game will pit the Pac-10 against the Big 12 at on Dec. 29 Qualcomm Stadium in San Diego, Calif.

K-State (10-1) will be trekking to San Diego for the second time in the string of seven consecutive bowls it has played in. This visit comes after K-State posted its third consecutive 10-win season but missed out on an ABC Sports Bowl Championship Series at-large bowl bid.

"I thought bowl games were supposed to be a reward for what you do throughout the season, and I think it's sad that it's all about money," junior safety Jarrod Cooper said. "You work hard all summer and winter and come for the season and go 10-1 — I mean that the team that beat you could've easily been a national championship team.

"I guess that you just have to chalk it up and keep on going."

But Cooper said this season's bowl game is nothing like that of last season, when the Cats lost to the Purdue Boilermakers in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl. Head coach Bill Snyder said the loss was a result of letting the loss to Texas A&M in the Big 12 Championship game carry over into the bowl game.

"The crushing blow at the end of the season shook us up a little bit," Cooper said. "This time, after the Nebraska game, we realized that no matter how good we do, there's somebody out there that doesn't like Kansas State and they're going to try to get us. We were all aware of that, so we knew something was going to happen.

"We're fine, though. We're going to go to Holiday Bowl and have a good time and come home with a victory. It's a football game, and we're going to go there to play, and be ready to play."

While the Huskies (7-4) do not own an impressive win-loss record, there are problems standing in the way of a Cat win.

First and foremost, the Rick Neuheisel-led Huskies feature an explosive quarterback in junior Marquès Tuiasosopo, who runs the option to a t — an important part of an offense that averages nearly 400 yards a game.

Head coach Bill Snyder said Tuiasosopo has the attributes of a Michael Bishop-type playmaker. Junior defensive end Monty Beisel echoed Snyder's sentiments.

"I think their biggest threat has to be their QB running game," Beisel said of Tuiasosopo, who is second on the team in rushing with 541 yards. "He likes to drop

What to do, who to watch and where to go in San Diego

Huskies' offense

By RICHARD SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Typically, Rick Neuheisel-coached teams have not been known for their offensive versatility. During his tenure as head coach at Colorado, Big 12 Conference opponents became accustomed to a steady diet of flying pigskin as Colorado starting quarterbacks averaged nearly 2,500 aerial yards and 18 passing touchdowns per season.

When Neuheisel took over as head coach at the University of Washington this season, the situation seemed ideal — a pass-oriented coach moving to a traditionally pass-oriented league (the Pac-10) and a school that has produced 13 NFL quarterbacks.

To contend in these new surroundings, Neuheisel implemented a potent new offensive wrinkle. This year, for the first time, a Neuheisel-coached team is running ... the option.

Though it might be surprising that Neuheisel eschewed sexier, more modern innovations like the run-and-shoot in favor of a staple of '60s college football, largely, it has worked. The Huskies finished sec-

Coaching battle

By CHRISTOPHER MCLEMORE
Kansas State Collegian

It's not exactly the "Thrilla in Manila," but the matchup between K-State head coach Bill Snyder and Washington head coach Rick Neuheisel in the Culligan Holiday Bowl will be a battle worth watching.

"I don't know why K-State fans hate Rick Neuheisel," senior running back Frank Murphy said. "But they do."

K-State fans haven't exactly been silent about their collective dislike for the Washington coach. Over the years, the K-State faithful have filled message boards and talkshow airwaves with anti-Neuheisel banter. The overwhelming dislike seems to stem more from Neuheisel's previous coaching position than his sweater-vest wardrobe and pretty-boy persona.

Before moving to Washington to coach the Huskies, Neuheisel was the head coach at Colorado, amassing a 33-14 record with the Buffaloes, including post-season victories in the Southwestern Bell Cotton, Jeep Aloha and Culligan Holiday bowls.

Save your money

Here's a tip for K-State fans: save your holiday money.

No, gifts of goodwill toward man and creature are still encouraged. Anything one can offer another during the celebration of our lord and his seasonal incumbent, Pokémon, is still the norm. As Chris Rock says, "Cornbread. Ain't nothing wrong with that."

This message of stinginess deals with a different type of holiday, one that the Culligan man has bastardized with his money-bag-toting army of mineral water.

K-State has nothing to gain from a trip out west to "battle" little Ricky Neuheisel's Washington puppies, the pride of the Pac-10 Conference. This is nothing new, so no need to dwell on that fact. The players and coaches decided their fate by nobly voting to accept the Culligan Holiday Bowl invite so the loser

How to get there

By MIKE VIETTI
Kansas State Collegian

K-State football fans planning to travel to San Diego for the Culligan Holiday Bowl on Dec. 29 should know there are plenty of options available.

The KSU Alumni Association as well as Lucky BrewGrille both are offering travel packages for the Wildcats' seventh-consecutive bowl game.

Lucky's has two packages to choose from: a three-day, four-night package for Dec. 27-30 or "The Millennium Package," a four-day, five-night package for Dec. 28-Jan 2.

With either plan, guests will stay at the 600-room Holiday Inn located on Mission Bay, and a three- or four-person room is available.

For the "millennium package," a three-person room is $225 per person, while a four-person room will run $170.

For the three-day, four-night package, a three-person room costs $160, while a four-person room totals $160.

Another option Lucky's offers is a bus charter to San Diego for $140 per person extra. The charter will leave Dec. 27 and

7 BOWLS 7 SEASONS

Snyder leads Cats to national prominence

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In 1993, K-State won its first bowl game in the history of Wildcat football. Now, seven years and seven bowl berths later, the program has developed into one of college football's elite.

"Kansas State came from the depths of the sea basically," junior defensive end Monty Beisel said. "It's kind of a dynasty we're building. I understand I've stepped into something great."

K-State's greatness began in 1993 with a 52-17 shellacking of Wyoming in the Weiser Lock Copper Bowl. Since then, the team has been invited to a bowl game every year.

"Any time a team goes from nothing to something, playing in seven bowl games in a row and winning at least nine games a season, it's obviously saying something," senior defensive end Darren Howard said. "There's not many teams in the nation that can say that."

The bowl list includes the Jeep Eagle Aloha Bowl in '94, the Plymouth Holiday Bowl in '95, the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl the following season, the 1997 Tostitos Fiesta Bowl and the Builders Square Alamo Bowl last year.

"It doesn't seem real," senior free safety Lamar Chapman said. "My five years here at Kansas State just flew by, and I can pretty much remember everything."

Chapman said the Fiesta Bowl, a 35-18 victory over No. 14 Syracuse and the Wildcats' first Alliance Bowl bid, was a turning point for K-State football.

"I think that was probably one of the biggest games ever here at Kansas State," he said. "Going to the Fiesta Bowl and beating a good Syracuse team — I think that was great for our program."

K-State has a 3-4 record in bowl appearances and is looking to improve that mark Dec. 29.

After a 10-1 record this season, the No. 7 Wildcats accepted the offer to make a trip back to the Holiday Bowl this year to face the unranked Washington Huskies.

John Reid, executive director of the Holiday Bowl, said the Wildcats' interest in San Diego is intense.

"We witnessed it in '95 when it was still on the upswing," he said. "There was a lot of growth at that time. It's the most phenomenal turnaround in the history of college football."

Head coach Bill Snyder said K-State has made a step forward since the early stages of the program's development.

"Nine years ago, we were begging for a bowl, and now we're complaining about our selection, so we must have made some kind of progress," he said.

Beisel believes that a bowl tradition is being started at K-State.

"It's a thing that every player on the team looks forward to every year," he said. "There's no doubt in our mind that we're going to go to a bowl every year now."

Junior strong safety Jarrod Cooper gives credit to Snyder for the vast improvements in the strength of K-State football.

"It's a privilege for me as a player just to see Coach Snyder coming out on the field and playing with some of the people that he's made. I'm honored to be here.

"I think it's getting a name out. If you want to play and you want to win you'll come to Kansas State. I'm not trying to promote us, but the man (Snyder) knows what he's doing. I'm not going to question him anymore. He tells me to jump, I ask him how high."

San Diego offers Wildcat fans variety of tourist attractions

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aside from the glamour and prestige surrounding the 1999 Culligan Holiday Bowl, the city of San Diego, Calif., will have to adjust to a massive sea of purple.

Despite the great distance from the state of Kansas, many loyal Wildcat fans are planning to make the trek to the West Coast to watch No. 7 K-State take on the unranked Washington Huskies.

While in San Diego, Cat faithful can enjoy a variety of tourist attractions and accommodations.

World-renowned Balboa Park lies in the heart of the city. It is home to 15 museums, various arts and international culture associations, as well as the San Diego Zoo, making it one of the nation's largest cultural and entertainment complexes.

The horticultural wonder recently was recognized as the best urban park in the Americas.

The 1,400-acre park is host to more than 12 million visitors per year.

Junior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said he will enjoy taking time out to have fun in his first trip to California.

"I'll go to the zoo, play with the snakes a little bit," he said. "And I'll get a little tan — that Manhattan snow is kind of fading me out. It'll be a good experience."

The Zoo and Wild Animal Park lies northeast of downtown San Diego, caring for 3,800 animals of 800 different species. Its collection of animals, as well as its plant collection of more than 6,500 species, is acknowledged as one of the finest in the world.

The 100-acre zoo opens at 9 a.m. daily and closes at 4 p.m. General admission is $15 for adults and $6 for children ages 3-11.

Sea World and Busch Gardens also are popular tourist attractions. Sea World will be open from 10 a.m. to 7:30 p.m. from Dec. 26 to Dec. 31. The cost is $39 for an adult, and $30 for children ages 3-11. Group rates also are offered.

Disneyland also is only a two-hour drive from San Diego in the city of Los Angeles.

Downtown San Diego provides visitors with multitudes of sightseeing opportunities, including the Gaslamp Quarter, the Convention Center and the Horton Plaza.

The Gaslamp Quarter Association represents a diverse group of more than 380 businesses located in the 16-block historic downtown district. It was named an entertainment district in 1989 and now is home to more than 65 restaurants, coffeehouses and night clubs.

Cat fans should enjoy the nightlife of San Diego, including top sports bars such as Seau's The Restaurant (opened by Charger linebacker Junior Seau), Pizza Port, The Beachcomber, Yogi's and Sport City Cafe and Brewery.

Hotel accommodations should be reserved as soon as possible before they are booked. The popular lodging for Cat fans looks to be the Holiday Inn On the Bay on North Harbor Drive.

back, check things out and run it. He understands his lanes and possibilities to get out and the field. He just makes things happen.

"We're going to have to attack him from all angles and make some big plays."

Also leading the Washington charge in the Pac-10 wide-open offense style are running backs Willie Hurst and Maurice Shaw. Hurst posted 546 yards and five touchdowns on the season, while Shaw ran for 440 yards and six scores.

However, it's defense that might prove to be the weak link for the Huskies, who have given up an average of 25.3 points per contest this season, considering the Huskie offense averages 28.3 points a game. K-State enters the game ranked No. 3 in scoring average per game and posts an average of 374.7 yards per game.

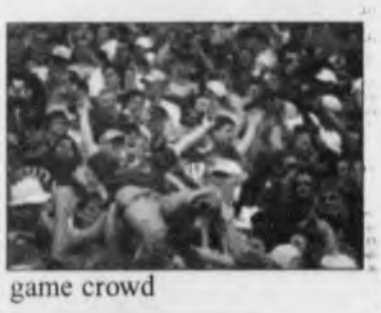
Snyder said the Washington defense can reveal several different looks and that they appear to be focused on game-to-game matchups.

"It's a team that has shown a lot of different hats," Snyder said. "You look at them and watch them by game, by game, by game and you don't see the same thing taking place every ball game, so it tends to lead you to believe that they kind of work on focusing on matchups and what best fits the offense that they're going to play against.

"There's a lot there. There's probably more there than in their offense. By that — when I say more — there's, quote, a few more things that you would have to be concerned about."

As a whole, Snyder said the Huskies appear to have improved greatly throughout the season, considering that after losing their first two games of the season, they went on to win seven of their last nine.

"They're a more improved team now," Snyder said. "They're a team that has maybe settled into their offense a little bit more. There's still some things that pop up in the later stages of the season that are a little different than what they had done on the outset of the season."



Kickoff is set for 7 p.m. and will be televised on ESPN.

Of those 33 wins, two came against K-State. Neuheisel's Buffaloes scored back-to-back wins against Snyder's Wildcats in 1995 and 1996.

In recent years the tables have been turned. The Wildcats have won the latest two games against Neuheisel. K-State victories in 1997 and 1998 have evened Snyder and Neuheisel at two games apiece.

But this time the war against one of Neuheisel's teams means a little more than a regular-season game.

"We're trying to prove something," senior free safety Lamar Chapman said. "Being 10-1 and not invited (to a BCS bowl) makes us want to prove a point."

Unfortunately for the Wildcats, the familiarity with Neuheisel might not be much of an advantage. The Neuheisel-led Huskies are a different team than the Neuheisel-led Buffaloes were.

While Colorado predominately focused on a big-play passing attack, Washington often runs an option attack behind the running ability of junior quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo.

The fact that Washington tries to run the option, might be more important for K-State's success than its knowledge of Neuheisel.

"I think we've always played well against the option, minus Nebraska," senior linebacker Mark Simoneau said. "We're confident against them because they don't run it the same way as Nebraska."

Even with that confidence, the Snyder-Neuheisel battle is shaping up to be less of a David vs. Goliath battle than 11.5-point spread might suggest.

"They look good," Murphy said. "They're fast and physical. I don't know where their four losses came from."

Does that mean the Wildcats will have a repeat of last year's bowl disaster?

"We'll be ready to play," Chapman said.

ond in the Pac-10 at 7-4 this season and second in the conference in rushing offense on their way to a berth in the Culligan Holiday Bowl against K-State on Dec. 29th.

A large part of the reason for both Washington's switch to its new ground-hugging philosophy and its subsequent success has been the play of quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo. The athletic junior has rolled up a whopping 2,762 yards of total offense, a school record, and accounted for 18 total touchdowns this season.

Though a competent passer, Tuiasosopo has really made his mark on the ground this season, finishing second among Huskies with 541 yards rushing, and tying for the team lead with six touchdowns by land.

K-State linebacker Mark Simoneau attributed Tuiasosopo's rushing success to a combination of determination and athleticism.

"He seems to be a really competitive type of player," Simoneau said. "He runs hard and is hard to bring down. You see him break a lot of tackles."

Tuiasosopo's play and competitive nature even lead K-State head coach Bill Snyder to compare the Husky signal-caller to former multi-talented Wildcat star Michael Bishop.

"I think he's an extremely fine quarterback," Snyder said. "He's a guy who has multiple talents ... who can run as an option quarterback and who throws the ball well."

Never was the range of Tuiasosopo's talent better displayed than in the Huskies' 35-30 win over eventual Pac-10 champion Stanford. In that contest, he became the first player in NCAA history to pass for more than 300 yards and rush for more than 200 in the same game, tallying 302 and 207, respectively.

The last time K-State faced such a versatile quarterback was in its 41-15 loss to Nebraska last month, when Husker quarterback Eric Crouch rumbled past the Cats for 158 yards and two scores on the ground.

Though Tuiasosopo might not be Crouch-caliber, linebacker Ben Leber said that shutting him down would be key in the Wildcats' attempt to tame the Huskies in San Diego.

"He's pretty good," Leber said. "I can't say that he's an Eric Crouch, but he makes very good decisions, and he's going to be one to try and stop."

Painful though it was, Simoneau said the loss to Nebraska might have provided the Wildcats with a blueprint for shutting down Washington's new old-fashioned offense.

Never was the range of Tuiasosopo's talent better displayed than in the Huskies' 35-30 win over eventual Pac-10 champion Stanford. In that contest, he became the first player in NCAA history to pass for more than 300 yards and rush for more than 200 in the same game.

"Hopefully we learned something in that game," he said. "We'll just have to correct what we did wrong then, and play hard."

of the Big 12 Championship, Texas, rightly goes to the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl this year.

But what about the fans? There appear only to be two solid reasons for purple people to visit "the big Q," or Qualcomm Stadium, Ryan Leaf's playpen and host of the "big game." One, to continue the tradition of mass migrations to support the team, and two, to use the bowl as a convenient excuse for a winter vacation in one of America's most beautiful cities and ring in the new year with a hefty dose of mai tai's and beach action.

That's it. The Holiday Bowl is not a continual step into the elite ranks of college football that was the case in 1997, when head coach Bill Snyder's troops began the year with a historic New Year's day spot in the Cotton Bowl and concluded the year 364 days later with an Alliance Bowl battle with Syracuse in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

It doesn't have the intriguing out-of-conference matchup some bowl games have. Cat fans have seen enough of Neuheisel's tech-vest-oriented offense while he was coaching Colorado to last a lifetime.

Heck, the game's two time zones away, so convenience is thrown out the door as well. A plane ticket to San Diego over the holidays isn't the cheapest.

So how does the Holiday Bowl entice less-than-eager K-State fans to take a week off and travel to Cali for a chance to witness the biggest game in San Diego on the night of Dec. 29? They charge $40 minimum for the showdown. A wise man like Confucius would refer to this proposition as "crap."

My tip is this: Hold onto those dollars for another K-State bowl day. Don't ignore the team. Just support them in one of your neighborhood Cat-friendly taverns with friends and fervid football fans at your side. $40 in drinks will take you well into the fourth quarter.

If this isn't your bag, put that money toward a fund drive to support the implementation of a college football playoff system.

K-State fans aren't the only ones clamoring for this after yet another disappointing postseason bid. Marshall would have missed out on any bowl game had it lost the MAC Championship game in which it was trailing until late in the contest.

Although the playoff/bowl debate has been around longer than Don Cornelius, Bob Harig raises an interesting solution in his column for ESPN.com.

Harig suggests the system adopt a 16-team playoff, represented by eight conference champions and eight at-large bids decided by a panel similar to the NCAA basketball tournament selection committee. The eight conference champs will be hosts at the first round games, while the remaining games will be played at regional bowl sites throughout December and into early January.

As for the playoff-excluded teams, invitations to the lesser "dot-com" and fast-food endorsed bowls will be handed out. Not perfect, but much better than the mediocrity we settle for these days.

It probably would be just as easy to organize this playoff rally without the dough, but remember nothing makes a bigger statement in college football than a big pile of green.

The trip to San Diego is enticing without a bowl game, and if the funding is available, support the Cats by all means. Just be realistic about what you'll see. This game isn't a once-in-a-millenium matchup. It doesn't captivate the nation's attention. The Holiday Bowl is yet another postseason mismatch with little importance in the grand scheme of college football. It's just another money maker for the powers that be.

Your cash could be spent better elsewhere.

Besides, I hear those Snyder figurines with kung fu grip are affordable and the gift to give this Christmas.

return Jan. 2. The charter only is available with the "millennium package."

Tickets to the Holiday Bowl are not included in either Lucky's package, but tickets to several Lucky-sponsored parties are, owner Bob Leetch said.

Lucky's will sponsor a party every night during the course of the stay in San Diego, beginning with the kickoff party at Hard Rock Cafe on Dec. 28 and culminating with the Y2K Blowout party on New Year's Eve, in which Leetch was able to reserve a cruise ship that will sail on the bay from 10 p.m. until 2 a.m.

"I think the packages we have are value-oriented," Leetch said. "We have the only ones aimed at non-wealthy people."

Leetch said fans should act as soon as possible because there are only 200 total packages available, and they are expected to be sold out by early next week.

The Alumni Association packages are more costly, but offer more in the way of accommodations. .

The Alumni Association's packages are four-day, three-night packages. from Dec. 27 to Dec. 30. Guests will stay at the Sheraton Harbor Island Hotel, which also is the hotel of the football team.

Travel packages will include a game ticket, transportation to and from the game and pep rally and to the official K-State pregame party, sponsored by the Alumni Association.

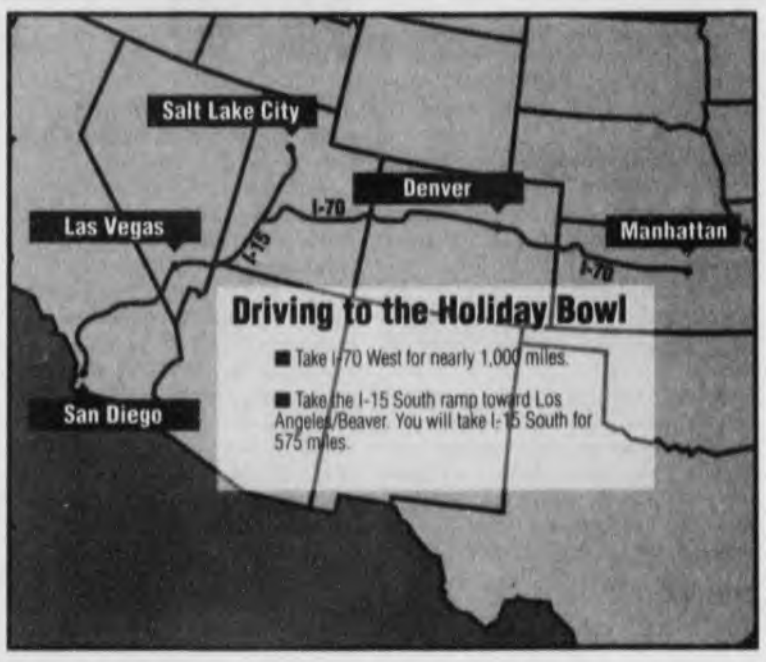
Fans can choose the "full tour" package, which includes airfare from Manhattan, Wichita or Kansas City, Mo., for $1,099 per person for a double room.

Also available is a package without airfare, in which people can drive themselves to San Diego. This package is available for $565 per person for a double room.

Karen Shafer, director of alumni communications, said fans will get a good value despite the cost.

"When people travel with us, they don't have to worry about transportation because it's included with our package," Shafer said.

For the independent K-State football fan, there also are options. Round-trip airfares from Kansas City, Mo. to San Diego are becoming scarce, but can be found with some searching for as little as $250 or as much as $500.



For the train lover, Amtrak has available seats for trains going to San Diego from Kansas City and back.

Amtrak has a train leaving Dec. 26 at 11:20 p.m. that will arrive at 7:26 a.m. on Dec. 28 in Fullerton, Calif. The cost of the two-day ride is $149.

Returning to the midwest is a little more expensive. A train leaving Fullerton at 8:16 p.m. Jan. 1 will return at 7:24 a.m. Jan. 3 to Kansas City, Mo., and will run $222.

Busing to and from San Diego is another option. Greyhound Buses offer four daily trips from Kansas City, Mo. to San Diego, either lasting one day or two, depending on time of departure. Each of the departure times has the same rate of $138 one-way or $274 round-trip.

Once the K-State football fan actually makes it to San Diego, Motel 6 and Econo Lodge appear to be the best value.

Motel 6 offers three locations in the San Diego area. Rates for a single room are $44.99 and $59.99 for a double room. The rates are the same every night except for Dec. 31 and Jan. 1. On those nights, prices jump to $50.99 for a single and $65.99 for a double.

Econo Lodge also has discount motel rates at both of its locations in San Diego.

During the week, rates are $39 for single rooms and $49 for double rooms. On Saturday and Sunday nights, the rates increase by $10 dollars for either type of room.

However, on New Year's Eve, the rate for a single room will be $79 or $89 for a double room.

Budget woes might cause increase of tuition rates

■ Regents fear cuts in state budget might dip into $21 million dedicated to higher education next fiscal year.

By JOHN HANNA
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Budget problems could lead to higher tuition for students at state universities.

The Board of Regents plans to re-examine its tuition rates for fall 2000, set by the board in June.

On Tuesday, Chairman Bill Docking called a special meeting of the board's University Budget Development and Tuition Committee for Dec. 15 at Hutchinson Community College, where the regents will have their regular monthly meeting.

The 11-member committee makes recommendations on tuition rates to the regents. Committee members include four regents, university administrators and faculty and student representatives.

Docking said it is important for the regents to examine every option and show the board is willing to help manage state universities through the state's budget problems.

Last month, the officials and economists who make state revenue projections told legislators and Gov. Bill Graves that the state would have to cut about $110 million over the next 19 months, absent a tax increase.

The regents are concerned especially about an extra $21 million in aid to universities and community colleges and technical schools, money for the state's 2001 fiscal year, which begins July 1. The Legislature promised the money when it reorganized the higher education system earlier this year.

"Given our state's current finances, it has become very clear to me that the quality of higher education in Kansas is at risk," Docking said. "The excellence found on our campuses must not be compromised."

In June, the regents approved a 2.5-percent increase in tuition at state universities for fall 2000.

However, they added extra fees to finance library improvements and new technology that made the overall tuition increases range from 3.7 percent at K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine to 6.4 percent at Emporia State, Fort Hays State and Pittsburg State universities.

K-State officials discredit rumors of new rape drug

■ E-mails cautioning of Progesterex should be ignored, vet pharmicist says.

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

An electronic mail forward that alleges there is a new drug rapists are using to sterilize their victims is false.

The e-mail states the new drug, Progesterex, actually is used to sterilize horses, but recently there have been cases of the drug being used in conjunction with Rohypnol, more commonly known as roofies, or the date-rape drug. It claims there have been cases of the drug being slipped into drinks at fraternity parties at some universities across the country.

This e-mail should be disregarded by anyone who receives it, said Shirley Arck, pharmacist at K-State Veterinary Medicine Clinic. The drug Progesterex does not exist, she said.

"We got word of this, and we looked into it and there's nothing there," she said. "There is no drug Progesterex."

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education, said he, too, looked into these allegations and found no evidence to prove they were true.

"Every reputable source I checked with says it's a hoax," he said.

Bill Arck said he is unsure how many people at K-State have received the forward at this time.

This e-mail and other similar warnings are believable because names of drugs often can be misleading, he said.

"It's like in high school when surveys are given, sometimes people make up false names of drugs to catch the people who say they've done every drug," he said.

"I know Progesterex sounds real, and it rolls off the tongue pretty easily," Bill Arck said. "At least someone was creative, I guess."

Bill Arck said these sort of false rumors occur every once and a while, and they spread extremely quickly.

"Every couple of years this happens," he said. "It's not the first time and it won't be the last time.

"If you never realized the power of e-mail and the Internet, this is a good example."

K-State students not foiled at Johnson County fencing tournament

Josie McClellan knows hard work is the key to any success.

McClellan, freshman in secondary education, said fencing taught her that.

Justin Hayworth/Collegian

McClellan and four other K-State students traveled to the Johnson County Invitational on Dec. 4 to participate in the beginners fencing tournament. Three of the five fencers placed within the top-four places, Coach Bill Meyer said.

"It's a pretty big deal," he said. "It was the whole Kansas City metro area, and we're a pretty small group at K-State."

The five students became involved with fencing through a class at UFM. The class is only in its second year at K-State, with about 15 people enrolled during the fall semester, Meyer said.

Other students who competed in the invitational include Aaron Brown, senior in pre-professional elementary education, who placed first; Ben Harvey, fifth-year senior in chemical engineering, who placed third; McClellan, who placed fourth; Lindsay Smith, junior in dietetics and Lisa Riecker, junior in geography.

Meyer said any student who had the desire to compete was eligible to go to the tournament.

"Basically, anyone who got the nerve up to do it could go," Meyer said.

The tournament's success raised the group's morale, he said.

"It certainly gave us a boost," Meyer said. "We went in as the unknown underdogs because we hadn't done so well before. It was instant stature."

McClellan said although some of the other women she competed against were more knowledgeable than she on technique, her natural athletic ability was her strongest point.

"It was my athleticism and aggressiveness," she said. "I wasn't as technically strong as some of the other girls. It's really fun, though. I like hitting people with a sword."

Harvey said he enjoys the sport because of the balance between physical and mental ability.

"It's different," he said. "It requires a lot of thought. It's not strictly physical ability."

"I wasn't as technically strong as some of the other girls. It's really fun, though. I like hitting people with a sword."

— Josie McClellan, freshman in secondary education

McClellan and Harvey said they both plan to continue fencing.

To win tournaments in the future, McClellan said, will take dedication.

"It takes commitment going to class, being willing to learn," she said. "Being athletic helps, but you don't necessarily have to be. If you work really hard, you can do well at anything."

Civil jury finds murder of King to be conspiracy

By WOODY BAIRD
The Associated Press

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — A jury hearing a wrongful death lawsuit filed by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s family found Wednesday that the civil-rights leader was the victim of a vast murder conspiracy, not a lone assassin.

The family had sued Loyd Jowers, a retired Memphis businessman who claimed six years ago that he paid someone other than James Earl Ray to kill King. The family's lawyer claimed the government, the Mafia and the military were involved.

After three hours of deliberations, the jury of six blacks and six whites awarded the Kings just $100 in damages.

The family had asked for a token

Maize High School recieves threats; classes continue

MAIZE, Kan. — Students who arrived for classes Wednesday morning at Maize High School, near Wichita, lined up for metal detector scans in response to reported threats of violence.

Amber Dutton, spokeswoman for the school, said two separate threats were made to the school. The first was found on the chalkboard in the teachers 'lounge. The note said, "The shootings will continue. Maize is next, Feb. 1, 2000."

Dutton said a second threat reportedly was to take place Wednesday at the school. A student told a counselor she had overheard conversations about a student bringing a gun to school.

A repeat of the Wednesday threat was made Tuesday night to the school resource hotline, which was forwarded to the Maize Police Department. The alleged incident was supposed to happen at a school assembly. Assistant Superintendent Mike Meyer said no assembly was scheduled.

Maize police and sheriff's deputies greeted students at the school, just north of Wichita, around 6 a.m. Students were scanned with hand-held metal detectors. Classes for the 1,500 students were not delayed.

The school district sent a letter home Tuesday to parents, informing them of the threats.

A $1,000 reward has been offered for information regarding the threats. Parents also were being encouraged to talk to students about the chalkboard threat.

The letter, issued by Superintendent Craig Elliott and principal Ken Rickard, states that the district has not decided whether to have school Feb. 1. If it is canceled, it would be made up at the end of the year.

Parents were told Wednesday that if they did not want their children in class, they could keep them home.

Fitness magazine tags K.C. 2nd-fattest city in nation

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A craving for zesty barbecue and an aversion to exercise makes Kansas City residents among the fattest in the country, according to Men's Fitness magazine.

Kansas City on Tuesday was named the second-flabbiest city in the country, trailing only behind Philadelphia. St. Louis was 19th.

Houston, Indianapolis and New Orleans are the other fattest cities, according to a study in the magazine's January issue.

The healthiest cities in the country are San Diego, Minneapolis, Seattle, San Francisco and Washington, D.C.

A separate study released this week by The Health Network, a consumer group, ranked Kansas City and St. Louis as the third and fourth least-fit cities, after Detroit and Fresno, Calif.

Jeff Lucia, executive editor of Men's Fitness, said Kansas City and other metropolitan areas shouldn't get too worked up over the survey but should take it as a wake-up call about the serious problem of obesity.

"I would say that with Kansas City, it's not necessarily a matter of too many people sitting around on their duffs," Lucia said.

What, then, is Kansas City's problem?

"Could it be the barbecue?" Lucia suggested.

The magazine based its ranking of the 50 largest cities on an analysis of 29 categories, including obesity, exercise and smoking rates, TV-watching habits, climate and the number of health clubs and sporting goods stores.

Kansas City got F's in obesity, the number of gymnasiums and sporting goods stores, water quality and geography.

Thirty-two percent of residents are obese, and only 8 percent belong to a fitness club. At the same time, city residents can pig out at any of 60 barbecue joints.

Kansas City flunked the geography category partly because it has no accessible mountains or accessible ocean beaches — and thus few opportunities to go mountain-hiking or surfing.

"We may be at the top of the list, but the whole list is pretty pitiful," said Carrie Lehr, a physician and weight-loss specialist at Research Medical Center.

"I don't think the people I meet in Kansas City are any lazier than anyone else. The factors that influence us influence others. (Obesity) is a national epidemic."

A grade of C assigned to Kansas City for one category, "junk food joints," was based on the number of fast-food restaurants, pizza places and doughnut shops listed on a Yellow Pages Web site.

Asked whether there was a scientifically proven relationship between the number of fast-food joints in a city and that city's fitness level, Lucia responded, "Well, why wouldn't there be?"

Kansas City earned a B in TV watching, based on one week's data from Nielsen Media Research.

Kansas City earned nary an A in any of the 14 categories analyzed by the magazine. Besides TV watching, it did best in commute time (B) and health care (B).

Other factors: percentage of adults who exercise (C), alcohol consumption and number of bars (C), smoking (D-minus), air quality (D) and "outdoor assets," such as state parks (D).

NASA delays shuttle liftoff because of dented fuel line

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — For the second time this week, NASA on Wednesday delayed the launch of space shuttle Discovery to the crippled Hubble Space Telescope, this time because of a dented fuel line.

Liftoff had been scheduled for Saturday night. Shuttle managers decided to put off the launch by at least one day, and possibly several days, while engineers decide whether repairs will be needed.

It was the sixth delay for the Hubble repair mission, which was supposed to take place in October. Because of a problem with its pointing system, Hubble cannot make any astronomical observations until Discovery and its crew of seven arrive with replacement parts.

During final launch preparations Wednesday, workers discovered a foot-long, half-inch-deep dent in a hydrogen-recirculating line for the three main engines, NASA spokesman James Hartsfield said.

Officials were unsure how the tube was dented.

The long, metal tube encloses a smaller tube that carries liquid hydrogen and serves as an insulating vacuum to keep the fuel super cold. The concern is that the dented tube might have impacted the line inside, Hartsfield said.

NASA estimates it will take at least several days to replace the damaged line, if that is required, Hartsfield said.

Complicating matters is the fact that NASA wants Discovery off the ground by mid-December in order to avoid any potential Y2K problems. Otherwise, the mission will have to be bumped up to January.

On Tuesday, NASA postponed the launch from early Saturday morning to late Saturday night because of a nicked electrical cable in the engine compartment. The conductor in the cable was exposed.

During the last shuttle launch in July, an exposed wire on Columbia caused a short circuit that knocked out two engine computers. The entire fleet was grounded after wiring defects cropped up in all four shuttles.

Hearing raises concerns about turnover of canal

BY DAVID BRISCO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With just days until the Panama Canal is returned to Panama, several members of Congress and former military officers are trying to stir interest in maintaining U.S. influence over the waterway.

Rebuffed by the Clinton administration, Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala., completed two days of hearings Wednesday, stacked with testimony against the 1978 treaty that gives up the canal Dec. 31.

Bachus said the administration ignored his requests for testimony.

Most of the testimony before the House Banking subcommittee on domestic international monetary policy focused on the threat of a perceived Chinese takeover of the canal, even though the Clinton administration, Panama and China all have denied that will happen.

"It may be too late to do anything, but maybe not," said retired Gen. Gordon Sumner, who accused the Panamanians of corruption. He said bushels of cash from China had been pouring into the country, although he offered no details beyond operation of port concessions by a Hong Kong-based international corporation, Hutchison-Whampoa Ltd.

Officials of the company, which operates ports around the world, have denied assertions they are controlled by the Chinese military or are part of any Chinese effort to gain a foothold in the Americas.

The Clinton administration has said it has found no basis for suggestions by many Republican lawmakers and others that the firm has close links to Chinese military.

But Sumner and retired Adm. Thomas Moorer, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who has been campaigning for years against turnover of the canal, both said the company could control trans-ocean commerce and hinder U.S. military ships from crossing Panama.

Moorer repeated a fear that China could launch nuclear missiles against the United States from Panama.

Rep. Helen Chenoweth-Hage, R-Idaho, said in a statement to the subcommittee that she has introduced legislation to declare the treaty void.

"The American people are calling for action, for their protection, and we must respond," she said.

She said the treaty was illegal because different versions were signed by the two governments and former President Carter exceeded his constitutional authority in giving away American property and abrogating an earlier treaty.

Israel, Syria to resume peace negotiations in Washington, D.C.

BY SONYA ROSS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Israel and Syria have agreed to resume peace negotiations, President Clinton announced Wednesday, cautioning that success is not inevitable but that peace appeared to be within grasp.

Clinton said the talks, to start next week in Washington, will resume at the point where they left off in 1996 and that he hopes they will lead to new negotiations between Israel and Lebanon.

"There can be no illusion here. On all tracks the road ahead will be arduous," the president said in a nationally televised news conference from the State Department.

"They face hard choices. They will have to stand firmly against all those who seek to derail the peace, and sadly there are too many of them."

Syria and Israel suspended negotiations 3 1/2 years ago amid a wave of terrorism against the Jewish state.

Clinton's announcement comes after Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's meetings in the region this week with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Syrian President Hafez Assad.

The president also said he hoped to see progress on Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.During Albright's Mideast mission, she brought Barak a clarification of the Syrian position on a broad range of issues.

"There clearly is a unique opportunity," the Israeli prime minister said.

The Palestinians this week walked away from their separate negotiations, demanding that Israel freeze settlement construction on the West Bank before talks could resume.

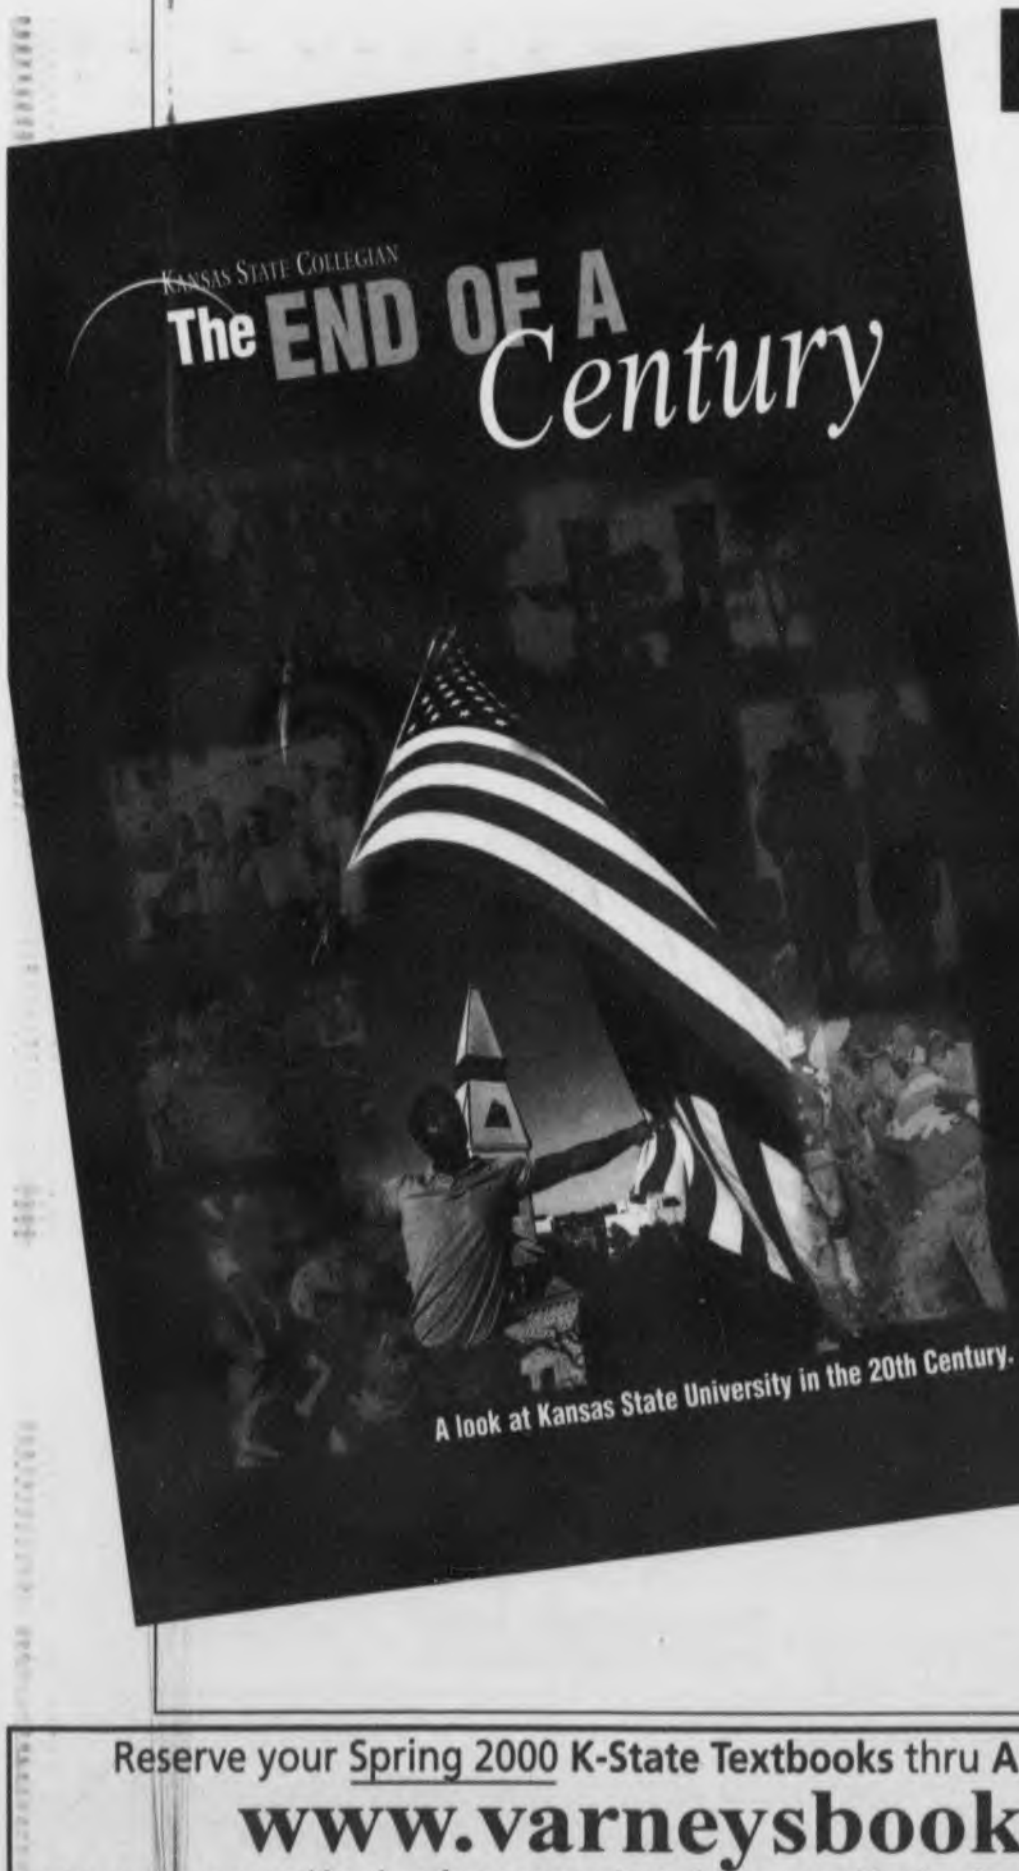
"We have so many other things to do than to be deployed for another generation or two along the borders and bury our youngsters."

As for Israelis and Palestinians, Clinton said he was determined that they should move forward in their peace talks.

They face a February deadline for devising a framework outlining a final settlement on such thorny issues as the future of Jerusalem and Palestinian aspirations for an independent state, problems that have stood in the way of a peace agreement.

"I'm convinced it is possible to achieve that goal — to put an end to generation of conflicts, to realize the aspirations of both the Israeli and the Palestinian people — and I will do everything I can to help them in that historic endeavor," Clinton said.

Clinton said the Israeli-Syrian talks would resume in Washington for one or two days next week between Barak and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, and then return to the region.



"These negotiations will be high-level, comprehensive, and conducted with the aim of reaching an agreement as soon as possible," he said. "Peace has long been within our sight," he said. "Today, it is within our grasp, and we must seize it."

Syria wants Israel to withdraw from both the Golan Heights and a stretch of land to the banks of the Sea of Galilee, from which Israel draws its water.

Israel has argued it needs to keep the Golan Heights for security reasons.

The Palestinians this week walked away from their separate negotiations, demanding that Israel freeze settlement construction on the West Bank before talks could resume.

Barak has said he would not stop the natural expansion of existing settlements but that no new permits for new settlements would be issued.

School-shooting cure lies in communication

A seventh-grade student in Oklahoma fired at classmates Monday morning.

Now the country is scrambling to figure out why students are taking up arms. Inevitably, they'll look to point blame at the media, at video games, at parents and at gun laws. The careful examination of the problem might lead to laws that strip us of our rights. That is unacceptable.

The desire of some school children to shoot up their schools can't be blamed on those things. If it were the media, other children privy to the same media would be doing the same.

Similarly, the problem can't lie exclusively with video games. If parents were solely responsible, then siblings of these shooters likely would also display similar characteristics towards violence. Gun laws also aren't to blame for these deplorable acts. It's illegal for children to purchase guns, but that didn't stop someone from selling to the Columbine gunmen. And it didn't stop the two from purchasing them.

Instead of finding fault in those things, people should quit pointing fingers and start looking inside their own communities and families for solutions.

That doesn't mean petitioning Congress for stricter gun laws or to not allow the media to cover violence. It means examining the youths in your family and in your community. It means getting involved in their lives and being a positive influence.

I think those who brought this petition against the city commissioner and wasted our tax dollars should have to pay what it cost for us to do this recall. I'd also like to say, "Ha, ha, and democracy for all."

I would just like to say that God wanted Karen McCulloh to stay in office tonight.

Congratulations to McCulloh and hooray that democracy and common sense won after all.

Who are you people who just sit in the back of class and talk as if no one else is even there?

I find it ironic that we're not allowed to burn candles for religious purposes but people are allowed to smoke and drop ashes everywhere.

Two thumbs up to the 4,400 voters who made the correct decision Tuesday. Let's all hope that the recall committee doesn't try to waste more money with future recall elections.

Could the Collegian please get some people who know something about college football to write their articles in the paper?

Dear Jon Balmer, why are you concerned with where K-State fans are going anyway? Won't you be in Dallas cheering on your Longhorns at the Cotton Bowl?

You know, the Fourum just hasn't been the same since the whole greek debate ended.

Recent murder causes questioning of purpose of Army's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy

The front page of the Sunday, Dec. 5 issue of The Kansas City Star told a story about 21-year-old Pfc. Barry Winchell.

According to the article, Winchell had struggled with torments his entire life.

He was diagnosed with dyslexia in his youth. He had to repeat kindergarten twice. In the third grade he finally learned his ABCs. His name was the only thing he could write in cursive.

All his life he struggled with being teased by his peers.

In the Army it was no different. Instead of being labeled "slow," he was labeled "gay."

So far, the truth behind this sexual accusation remains untold.

According to sources, Winchell constantly was ridiculed by his unit about being gay. It didn't help matters when Winchell formed a friendship with a man who was a drag queen.

The verbal harassment Winchell tolerated every day led to physical battery.

On July 5, at Fort Campbell, Ky., Winchell was murdered in cold blood.

He was hit three times on the head with a baseball bat. The injuries didn't just leave his eyes swelled tight and his head the size of a basketball. It left him "alive" on life support.

It left his parents with a choice to pull the plug. They decided to after saying goodbye to their youngest son, who had seen and experienced too much pain for his age.

The son had become homeless as a child for a couple of months after his mother left an abusive relationship. This son, previous to his mother's remarriage, lived in shelters or the family car.

Yet the issue here isn't necessarily about Winchell's troubled life before the Army. It is about the ridicule, the torment and ultimately his murder.

Winchell was harassed constantly prior to his death. It appears as if the Army looked the other way.

In the Army there is the "don't ask, don't tell" policy. This policy appears to be good at face value. Under this policy soldiers are not to be harassed, nor questioned about their sexuality. Yet is it actually true? Perhaps the latter is, but in this case he was harassed.

How much does one's sexual preference count when it comes to defending our country? When it comes down to it, does it really matter?

No, it doesn't.

Let's suppose that Winchell was gay. If he kept his sexuality to himself and only displayed sexual acts to those who were homosexual as well, why did he have to suffer?

Pvt. Calvin Glover, 18, and Spc. Justin Fisher, 25, both have been charged in connection with the murder. Regardless of what you think about homosexuals, no one deserves to die.

While Glover and Fisher have been charged with physically murdering Winchell, those in the Army previously murdered him emotionally.

Those peers called him names and made his life a living hell. He was let down by those who knew what was going on — knew deep down that it was wrong — but did nothing to stop it. It is their ignorance that needs to be replaced with acceptance and fulfilling one's duty.

The physical destruction, unfortunately, just shows the extent of the hate Winchell had to endure.

It is extremely sad that our own Army has such battles of hatred that literally can be its own worst enemy.

Blind PC adherance lacks reason, causes silence, not 'Silent Night'

Political correctness runs rampant through our society and through this university like an insipid virus that refuses to die. And to think of just one instance of political correctness to write about when so many are clamoring around in my mind screaming for attention, seems like an injustice in its own right. Frankly, I'm tired of all of it.

I'm tired of politically correct responses like the one that followed an incident at a Kansas City, Mo., Osco store Nov. 9. In that city on that day, a black man was chased, caught and held face down into the sidewalk by Osco employees for suspected shoplifting until police arrived. He died shortly after the police arrived. The medical examiner has yet to determine what caused his death. What followed is the typical reaction of people severely infected with PC.

Now Osco is going out of its way to hire more black managers and to stock more products made by black companies. Wrong. It won't bring back the fallen man, and stocking shelves with different companies does no good. Beyond that, the black community is using a senseless death to advance its cause. It would be wiser for that community to boycott Osco stores. Surely the chain of drugstores eventually would feel the sting financially. But that makes sense and therefore is not PC.

Beware that during this Christmas season, PC likely will reach epidemic proportions. For example, I listened to Christmas music quietly at my desk in the newsroom the other day when the politically correct virus struck again. I was listening to instrumental music that in no way said, "Come to the godly side," when another staff member told me he'd rather not listen to it. I got the distinct feeling his problem with my non-secular, instrumental music stemmed from the PC bug. Music just isn't something to take offense over, especially when there are no words that express religious beliefs with the music.

If I were to express offense at having to listen to Rage Against the Machine music for its foul language — which for the record I have had to listen to in the newsroom — I would be met with disdain. But asking someone to turn off the holiday music is met with cheers — even by people who like Christmas music.

I am a live-and-let-live person, although many reading this might not believe that. I don't care what you listen to or even if I have to hear it. As far as I'm concerned, a person's rights end where their fists and my face meet.

If you are like-minded, here's my advice: Refuse to be politically correct. Don't say things just because it's expected of you. Realize when others are doing and saying things only to be politically correct and call them on it. Lose the hanky and grab the Lysol. Political correctness is one disease we can conquer.

Article's inaccuracies lead to call for insurance talks

Editor,

Several inaccuracies were reported in the article Tuesday titled "Insuring Your Health," and caused me concern. I feel it is extremely important to be accurate in journalistic reporting, especially regarding health care and health insurance.

I recommend that students use the upcoming winter break as an opportunity to discuss health care and health insurance with their parents. Determine what coverage they have and what is needed. K-State, through Student Risk Managers Inc. — not Lafene Health Center — offers health insurance purchase options to students.

Secondly, most insurance coverage is not 100 percent. There usually exists a co-payment to the consumer. It's a good idea to comparison shop.

Lastly, access to or quality of health care never is contingent upon health insurance. All enrolled K-State students who pay the health privilege fee at enrollment are eligible to receive health care at Lafene Health Center.

Lafene Health Center's highly qualified and professional staff look forward to serving the students of K-State if needed. We are open during the semester and all other breaks. We only are closed on official university holidays.

American offers apologies over stereotyping by peers

Editor,

I would just like to take a second to apologize for all of the American students that stereotype Danica Coto on a regular basis. It saddens my heart to know that we are a nation that still is rather full of idiocy in many ways. Unfortunately, it is more or less a part of the American institution to make its people often unthinking, ethnocentristic and basically self-centered. Many Americans always tend to think that this culture is better and that people from other places are some how weird or lesser just because they are different. I apologize for this profusely, for it is the small-minded Americans that are wrong.

Personally, while I have never been to Costa Rica, I have read about and seen videos about its culture in previous Spanish classes I have had. The people of Costa Rica actually exude a great deal of warmth and caring, much more than we do hear in the states. Truly, the Costa Rican culture is something we should try to emulate, not make fun of.

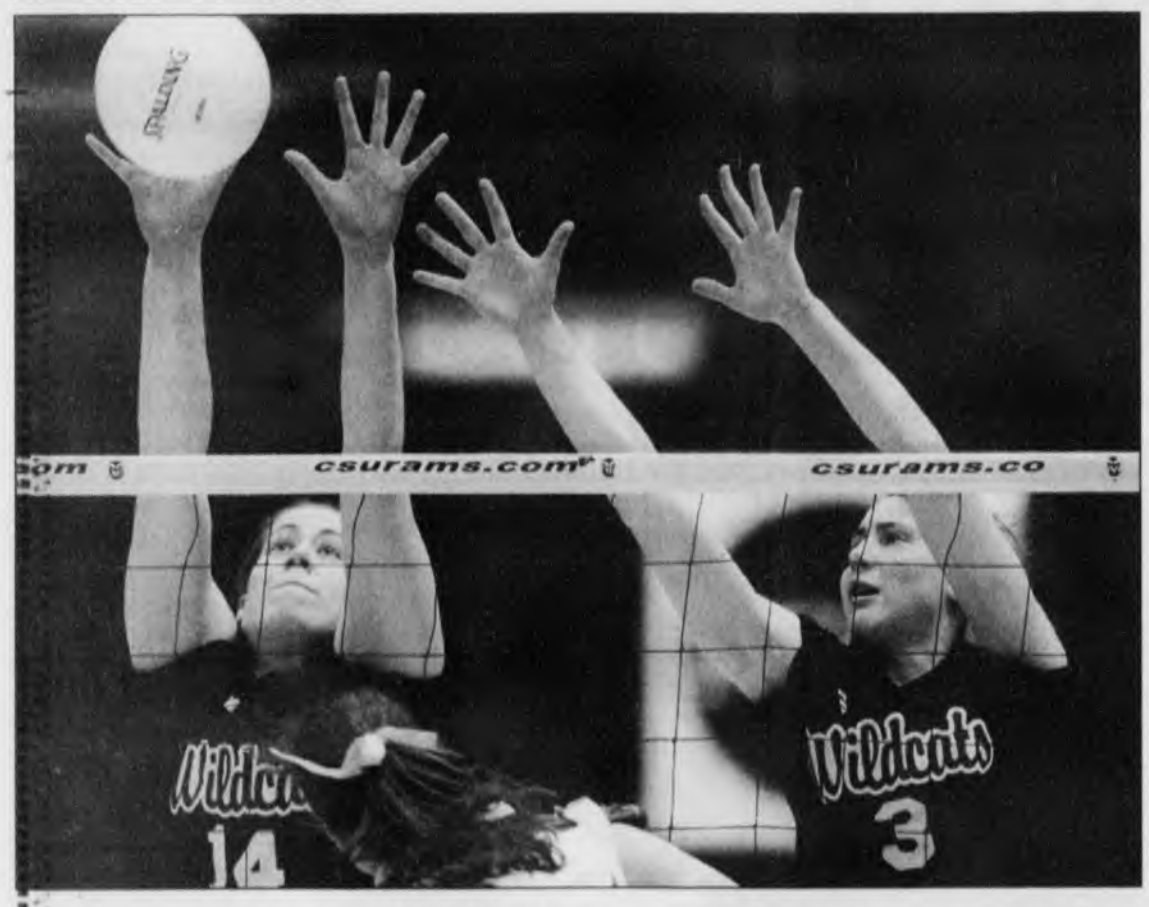
Change of advisers needed by those treated unpolitely

Editor,



In response to Shaun Huser's column on poor academic advising, I completely concur with his assessment of his adviser's stated behavior as "rude, unprofessional and completely unacceptable." There is no place for belittling a student in advising.

If any student receives this kind of treatment, he or she first should change advisers. It probably is easy, as in our department where it simply involves notifying the department office staff of your wish.

Next, inform the department head of the adviser's unprofessional behavior. Yes, sometimes students are unprepared, and this is frustrating. Yes, the system is complicated and sometimes advisers inadvertently give wrong information. These are regrettable, but are no excuse for sarcastically belittling a student. Let's hope Huser's unfortunate experience is a rare exception.

Volleyball team 'spontaneous' in 1999

By ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even without a Sweet-16 berth, K-State's volleyball team brought recognition to Manhattan in 1999.

The No. 19 Cats fell to No. 11 Colorado State over the weekend, 12-15, 15-8, 13-15 and 10-15, in the second round of the Mountain Regional of the NCAA Tournament. A win over the Rams would have advanced K-State (21-9) to the round of sixteen.

Head coach Jim McLaughlin said his team wanted the berth in the next round, but that's difficult to do when the opponent is a top-10 team playing with the home-court advantage.

"The only way we can correct that is by being a top-10 team playing on our home court," he said.

The loss in the NCAA Tournament brought the 1999 season to an end, but not before the Cats accumulated several conference honors.

In his third season as K-State's head coach, McLaughlin was named Big 12 Coach of the Year, while senior outside hitter Dawn Cady was a unanimous choice for the all-conference team. Sophomore setter Disney Bronnenberg also was named to the Big 12's top team and sophomore Liz Wegner was an honorable mention selection.

The Cats' 14-6 conference record earned them a fourth place finish in the Big 12, behind Nebraska, Texas A&M and Texas.

"Overall, 14 wins in the conference itself is a highlight," McLaughlin said.

Aside from conference honors, Cady received national recognition for her record-setting season. Cady was named the AVCA/Sports Imports National Player of the Week for Sept. 25, and she currently is an All-American candidate. She broke K-State's single-season record for kills and total attacks.

The 1999 season was marked by several highlights, McLaughlin said. He cited beating Texas A&M and sweeping Texas as two big K-State victories. He also highlighted the Cat's victory over Nebraska for the first time in K-State history. After 59 straight losses to the Huskers, K-State knocked off Nebraska in Lincoln on Sept. 22, which McLaughlin said was one of the biggest victories of the season.

Beyond records and awards, McLaughlin said he was impressed with his team's level of commitment and improvement. He said the team was strong defensively and was starting to become strong offensively as the season progressed. He called the 1999 team spontaneous, saying that the Cats created their own opportunities. He said he hoped that the next time his team was in control of the conference, K-State could keep control and bring a Big 12 volleyball title to Manhattan.

"I'm proud of what the girls did," he said, "and they did it under some very tough circumstances."

Oklahoma coach looks at job offer

■ Offensive coordinator offered job as Texas Tech's head coach.

BY PAM EASTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUBBOCK, Texas — During football practice Wednesday, teary-eyed Oklahoma offensive coordinator Mike Leach told his team he had been offered the top coaching job at Texas Tech when he visited the school Tuesday.

"He said that he went down there and was offered the position and now he just has to make a decision," said Mike Prusinski, Oklahoma director of athletic media relations. "He said there were strong things on both sides. He said he needed to talk to his family and there were a couple of other things he needed to take care of."

Prusinski said that before Leach announced having received the offer, he met with Sooners' quarterback Josh Huepel. Both emerged with tears in their eyes.

"I would be lying if I didn't say it wasn't emotional," Prusinski said. "He said the toughest thing about leaving Oklahoma is the people. He said it is not going to be an easy decision."

Tech Athletic Director Gerald Myers said no deal was in place. Late Wednesday afternoon, school officials announced a 10 a.m. news conference for today.

The university is searching for a replacement for Spike Dykes, the 13-year head coach who announced his retirement Nov. 20.

"We are still talking. We don't have a deal or anything," Myers said. "I would like to wrap it up as soon as possible."

Myers said he had a brief conversation with Leach on Wednesday.

"He's back home right now," Myers said. "Let's just wait and see what happens. ... He's an outstanding football coach. He's a fine person and I think that he would fit well here at Texas Tech."

After meeting Tuesday with Tech Chancellor John T. Montford in Dallas, Leach was flown to Lubbock for meetings, dinner and a tour of the campus.

Also present during the interview in Dallas were Myers, Tech regent Alan White and Tech regents chairman James Sowell.

Montford said Tuesday night the meeting went well, but there still are many details that need to be worked out.

The Lubbock Avalanche-Journal reported Tuesday that Leach was the leading candidate after Clemson offensive coordinator Rich Rodriguez announced he would no longer pursue the job. Montford said there are many applicants, when asked whether Leach is the only remaining candidate.

Leach started his coaching career as a graduate assistant at Cal Poly-San Luis Obispo. He then moved the following year to a full-time job coaching linebackers at College of the Desert in Palm Desert, Calif.

A year later, Leach was offered a chance to coach a team in Finland in the European Football League. In spring 1989, Leach took an assistant coaching job at Iowa Wesleyan, where he spent three years working on the team's passing game and setting school records. He then went on to Valdosta State in Georgia, where he spent five years. From there, Leach headed to Kentucky, where after two years, six NCAA records and 116 school records, Oklahoma head coach Bob Stoops swept him up.

The state-required 10-day posting period for the head coaching job expired Tuesday.

Barkley's career over after injury

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHILADELPHIA — Charles Barkley's NBA career ended right where it started, only not the way he wanted.

Playing in the city where his remarkable career began, Barkley ruptured a tendon in his knee Wednesday night and said his 16-year career is over.

"I guess the big fella in the sky wanted me to finish right where I started," said Barkley, the Houston Rockets forward who already had announced he is retiring after this season. "There were a lot of people here tonight who saw me play my first game and saw me play my last game."

Barkley broke down crying in the locker room after going down in the first quarter of what was to be his final regular-season game in Philadelphia. Barkley called his wife and told her his career was over.

"I do think it was supposed to happen like this," Barkley said. "It was supposed to end in Philadelphia."

Barkley was going up to block a shot by Tyrone Hill when he lost his balance and hit the floor hard with 4:09 left in the first. The tendon that attaches his thigh to his kneecap ruptured. The injury, rare in basketball, requires surgery and at least six months of rehabilitation.

Sixers team doctor Jack McPhilemy said it would be career-threatening even for a young player. Barkley will be 37 in February.

"I knew it was over as soon as I saw it," Barkley said. "I knew it was over when it first happened. I saw the way the kneecap was bulging through my leg, and I said, 'Well, it's been fun.'"

Memphis' James Harris is surrounded by K-State hands and arms as he comes down with a rebound in the second half of Wednesday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats won the game 62-61.

Late 20-7 scoring drive helps put lights out on Memphis in final seconds of game

The K-State men's basketball team used a late 20-7 scoring barrage to defeat the Memphis Tigers 62-61 Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

Senior forward Tony Kitt and junior forward Kelvin Howell acted as catalysts in the final 10 minutes of the game, combining to score 12 points.

After reducing a 12-point deficit with 10 minutes to go to just 5 points with a little more than four minutes left, the Cats (5-1) laid a defensive stranglehold on the Tigers (4-3), holding them scoreless for the rest of the contest.

With 2:13 remaining, Howell, who came off the bench in the game, scored the Cats' final 4 points, including two free throws that proved to be the difference with 1 1/2 minutes left.

In the Tigers' four-minute drought, they turned the ball over four times and missed all three field-goal attempts. In fact, senior guard Keiron Shine turned it over twice in the final 42 seconds.

Despite pulling off the second 1-point and come-from-behind victory in the past three contests, head coach Tom Asbury said it was a game in which everyone contributed — both in good and bad ways.

"Everybody that we played contributed to our effectiveness and ineptitude," Asbury said. "And that won't happen every time, believe me. Everybody was good and bad during the course of the game.

"Our defense tightened up, and we started to rebound a little bit better, and I thought Kitt and (Josh) Reid really picked it up down the stretch."

Compared to the Cats' other 1-point contest against St. Louis last week, Asbury said they played poorer basketball against Memphis.

"A week ago today, we had a similar game," Asbury said. "I thought we played better against St. Louis, but I think that game really helped us, because at the inside eight-minute timeout I could see in our guys' eyes that they were right there, ready and still very focused and very determined that we were not out of it."

Opening the game, both teams exchanged three-point baskets, but that was the only success the Cats were going to see early.

The Tigers came out of the gates shooting, and it led to an early first-half 22-9 lead aided by two treys and nine-of-16 shooting from the field, compared to the Cats' three-of-10 shooting and five turnovers.

With 8:28 left in the first half, K-State fought back and went on a 10-3 run, led by Kitt with 6 of his game-high 21 points. The Cats pulled within 6 at 30-24 but were still left with a halftime deficit of five.

"It gave us some confidence for the second half to be able to cut their lead down," sophomore guard Josh Kimm said. "I think in the second half, when we got down again, we knew had done it earlier so we could do it again by just working at it and chugging away."

Asbury, who now is tied Lon Kruger for fifth on K-State all-time win list with 81, will lead his troops to Illinois on Saturday to face Kruger's squad.

Cats strong inside despite Groves' absence

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was evident with the absence of senior guard Cortez Groves that the Wildcats needed to develop an inside game against Memphis to win.

That's exactly what they did, taking the game 62-61.

"We contributed a lot with Cortez being out and guys having to step it up," senior forward Tony Kitt said. "Everyone made an honest effort to get the job done."

Kitt led that Wildcat effort, leading all scorers with 21 points to propel K-State to its second 1-point victory in the past three games. He connected on nine of 12 field-goal attempts.

"Late in the first half, we saw they couldn't guard Tony inside," sophomore forward Travis Reynolds said. "So the second half, one thing we really keyed on was to pound the ball inside. He came through for us tonight."

Community-college transfer Kelvin Howell came up strong as an inside presence off the bench, scoring the last 4 points of the game to cap off the come-from-behind victory.

The 6-foot 9-inch, 240-pound forward finished with eight points and six rebounds in 21 minutes for the Wildcats, including six-of-eight shooting from the free-throw line.

Head coach Tom Asbury said he felt a number of players stepped it up late in the game for K-State. He also recorded a team-leading three steals, including one in the final seconds. Tiger point guard Keiron Shine's pass was deflected and recovered by Howell with one second left to preserve the Wildcat win.

"Kelvin was very effective down the stretch," Asbury said. "He made some big plays and did some very good things. And I didn't think Tony tore it up till towards the end, and I thought he was much more effective and focused."

Against a physical, athletic team such as Memphis, Reynolds said rebounding was a concern for K-State coming into the game.

The Junction City product responded with 10 of the team's 35 rebounds, seven coming on the defensive side of the floor.

"We just wanted to come out and hit both boards strong — the offensive and defensive end," Reynolds said.

Golfer has family for support as she follows dream after graduation

VIEWPOINT

SARAH CRAIG

Casually walking out of the K-State Student Union, Jane Yi tells me that when she grows up she's going to be a pro golfer.

Tempted to keep walking, I ask her when she's going to grow up.

She answers, "Well, I graduate next week, so I guess that's when I'll start."

After getting her degree in English, Yi is going home to study the game of golf with her father. Of course, this studying will be different from the studying she's been doing here; she's going to spend almost every day on the golf course.

And she really plans to go pro, too.

She's been saying that since she was 12. Now she's 24, and it's starting to seem like it's about time. Yi said that not too long ago she had to remind her mother what was going to happen when she graduates.

"My mom said, 'You're going to graduate soon, what do you plan on doing?' And I told her I'm going to be a pro golfer, and my dad says 'Yeah, she's going to do it, we're doing it together.'"

It's the classic story, father and daughter learning a game together, and Daddy will continue to guide the way to the pros. Yi said she won't be ready for the pros, though, until she can beat her dad.

It's funny the way fathers can make a goal seem so attainable by something as simple as the ability to defeat the one you've learned from all your life.

Yi doesn't know quite when she will be ready to win over her father, but she'd better do it soon—she says she sees herself "on tour" next year. That means a lot of business to take care of between now and then.

Yi will have to go to qualifying school, in which she competes in three levels, requiring a win at each level. Then she gets a card that says she's pro, and then she's pro.

And all because she liked to hit a ball around some green grass.

"I didn't know there were rules at the time, but I just thought it was fun because you take this stick and you hit this little white ball as hard as you can, and you chase after it and you hit it again," Yi said. "For an 8-year-old, it was pretty fun— all you did was hit the ball as much as you wanted, and when it went in the hole, everyone was pretty happy."

Aha, so that's how people learn to like to play golf. Get them while they're young and don't know any better. Yi, of course, learned later in life that there were rules to the game and that she had to get the fewest, not the most strokes.

But for some reason, she still likes it. She said she doesn't really know why she wanted, or still wants to play, but for whatever reason it makes sense.

"I guess the one thing that makes it make sense is something my high school golf coach told me once: 'No matter what you do in life make sure you love to do it.' No matter what, I love to play golf. I could be having the worst game of my life but there's still nothing I'd rather do. I just love to play golf," Yi said.

Of course, that all makes perfect sense. But there are plenty of people who love the game who probably won't make pro. Yi doesn't know yet which she will be.

But she's got two things behind her that should give her a pretty good shot at success: her family and her education.

If golf goes through for Yi, she'll be rolling in the dough and her face will be all over ESPN (or maybe just the golf channel. Does anyone know what that's called?), and if golf doesn't go through, well, she'll just have to get a real job like the rest of the world.

Not, of course, that golf is not a real job, but you know what I mean.

Either way, she had the sense to get her education first and put her game second. Now it's time for a reversal, and Yi seems a little bit nervous about it.

And why shouldn't she be? Who really wants to beat her hero at his own game?

Y2K eep your resolutions

Making a New Year's resolution to exercise more, whether to lose weight or just to stay healthy, could mean more trips to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. However, general physical activities, such as hiking outdoors, also could be beneficial.

Success of regular exercise decided by choice of daily regimen

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the ball drops and the confetti has been thrown, the new year might begin with a list of resolutions. For many, the desire to exercise regularly is at the top of the list.

However, it's important to stick to this list, David Dzewaltowski, associate professor of kinesiology, said.

"Don't make a New Year's resolution that you won't keep," he said.

Dzewaltowski said the first step toward achieving the goal of a creative exercise regimen is making the decision to do it.

He said the problem with people making decisions to exercise is that they often change their minds when it becomes hard.

"I think the major issue is not thinking about exercise as going to a fitness center, but thinking about exercise as physical activity," Dzewaltowski said.

He said physical activity is defined as movement and recreation.

"If you like outdoor activity, like gardening, then do those things," he said. "If you like skiing or hiking, do those things in your spare time rather than sedentary things."

Paul Estabrooks, assistant professor of kinesiology, said most people drop their exercise plan after three to six months, with a large proportion quitting within the first three weeks.

"People don't see results as quickly as they thought they would, or they might find exercise more demanding than they thought originally," he said.

Estabrooks said he recommends that people start off easy.

"You may just want to start with walking 15 minutes every other day, and then work up to 30 minutes, six to seven days a week," Estabrooks said.

Dzewaltowski said people should not get discouraged if they gain weight at first.

"When you step on a scale, you might gain weight," he said. "Don't worry about body weight — over time, you will reach a healthy body weight."

When someone starts exercising, Dzewaltowski said, the body retains water so that it won't dehydrate during physical activity.

He also said one will begin to gain muscle mass, which weighs more than fat, which will contribute to the weight gain.

"Just stick it out," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center. "It doesn't take that much to notice a difference. You might not see weight loss, but you would see an increase in cardiovascular health."

Kennedy said an exercise program, along with a reduced calorie intake, would allow one to see a reduction in weight much quicker.

"I mean not going on a diet, but just paying attention to what you eat," she said.

Dzewaltowski said weight loss is simple.

"The more you burn, and the less you intake, the more you decrease your body fat," he said. "Eat a high-carbohydrate, low-fat diet."

He said an easy way for college students to exercise is to walk to class rather than drive, or simply to park in a farther lot. That way, students can get in their 30 minutes of walking to and from class.

"All it means is you walk briskly and park your car in a different place," he said.

Estabrooks said people can stay motivated by doing an activity they like.

"I think the exercise should be matched to what you enjoy," he said. "People are more motivated to do something they enjoy if it's not thought of as a chore."

Kennedy said working out with others could help people achieve their resolution.

"For some people, it would be beneficial to have a workout partner," Kennedy said. "Fuel motivation for each other."

Estabrooks said getting involved with a group of people helps one stay motivated for several reasons.

"It enhances enjoyment if you do things with people you like. It also creates responsibility," he said. "If you don't go, you are letting down the whole group, not just yourself. It's motivation not only to exercise, but to meet with friends."

As the millennium parties end, the hard work of sticking to New Year's resolutions begins.

"Just get out there and try something you enjoy," Estabrooks said.

Small portions key to avoiding holiday weight gain

BY JENNIFER LAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christmas time is close. The parties have started, and the food is on the table, waiting to be eaten.

The belts also are waiting to be loosened.

This holiday season does not have to end in elastic pants, however. To keep a rein on holiday bingeing, there are a few simple things to keep in mind.

Deb Canter, professor of hotel and restaurant/institutional management and dietetics, said the best news is that all foods can be enjoyed.

"There is no such thing as bad food," Canter said. "It's in remembering that all food needs to be eaten in moderation."

Dianna Schalles, director of nutritional services at Lafene Health Center, said the key to watching out for fatty holiday foods is deciding what you want to eat before you fill your plate.

"Scan the whole array," Schalles said. "Fill your plate once, after taking small portions of the foods you know you will like."

Both Canter and Schalles said not to go to a party on an empty stomach.

"If you eat an apple and drink some water before you go, you'd be surprised at how much less hungry you might feel," Canter said.

Schalles said fasting before a big dinner party definitely isn't the way to go.

"Many people don't eat for the entire day before a party," she said. "Then they are ravenous when they get there, and all common sense is lost."

Canter said partygoers should speak with the host or hostess of the party to find out if any substitute low- or no-fat products have been used.

"Many of the low-fat dips can taste just as good with the right mix of herbs in it," she said.

Schalles said mixing fresh vegetables and fruit in between bites can help fill a demanding stomach.

Alcohol consumption should be treated the same way during the holidays as other times of the year. Both Canter and Schalles stressed the importance of keeping alcohol consumption in moderation.

Schalles said although there are only seven calories per gram in alcohol verses the nine calories per gram for food, holiday consumption of alcohol can hurt the intake of food calories if not watched carefully.

"Drinking beyond moderation defeats the purpose of watching what you eat, if nothing else because decision-making skills can become blurred where alcohol is concerned," she said.

The key is moderation and control when dealing with tempting holiday foods, she said.

"Above all, let yourself enjoy the things you crave, even if it's a little bit," Schalles said. "Otherwise, you will end up bingeing."

The name and age of the infant has not been released.

Fletcher said the two will be tried as juveniles, but there is a possibility they could be tried as adults.

KING

amount because what they wanted most was for the jury to find evidence of a conspiracy and lend support to their call for a new investigation into the killing.

"I'm just so happy to see that the people have spoken," King's son Dexter said. "This is what we've always asked for."

Ray confessed to killing King and was sentenced to 99 years in prison. He spent the rest of his life claiming to be innocent and trying to get a trial. He died from liver disease last year.

Ray's guilty plea was upheld eight times by state and federal courts. A congressional committee concluded in 1978 that Ray was the killer but he might have had help before or after the assassination. The committee did not find any government involvement in the murder.

William Pepper, the Kings' lawyer, told the jury that Jowers, 73, was part of a conspiracy involving the Mafia and agents of the federal government to kill King because of his opposition to the Vietnam War and plans for a huge march on Washington.

Pepper, who also represented Ray in his efforts to recant his confession and get a trial, said a cover-up following the assassination in Memphis in 1968 involved the FBI, CIA, the media and Army intelligence, as well as state and city officials. Pepper told the jurors they could rewrite history.

Juror David Morphy said he believed the assassination was too complex to be carried out by one person.

"We all thought it was kind of a cut-and-dried case, with the evidence that Pepper brought forth that there were a lot of people involved, everyone from the CIA, military involvement in it — Jowers was involved in it, we felt," he said.

Lewis Garrison, Jowers' lawyer, told the jurors that while they could reasonably conclude King was the victim of a conspiracy, his client's role was minor at best.

In 1993, Jowers said on ABC-TV that he hired King's killer as a favor to an underworld figure who was a friend. He did not identify the purported killer, but said it wasn't Ray.

Jowers, who has never repeated the claim but not recant it either, was sick for much of the trial and did not testify.

At the time of the killing, Jowers owned a small restaurant, Jim's Grill, across the street from The Lorraine Motel, where King was killed. On the day of the assassination, Ray, a prison escapee from Missouri, used an assumed name to rent a room in a rooming house above Jim's Grill.

Garrison told the jury it was hard to believe that the owner of a greasy spoon and an escaped convict could have pulled off King's assassination.

King's widow, Coretta Scott King, testified that her family believes Ray did not act alone.

"If we know the truth, we can be free and go on with our lives," she said on the trial's opening day.

In his closing argument, Pepper said King was killed because of his opposition to the war and his planned "poor peoples' march" on Washington.

The order to kill King, Pepper said, came from the head of organized crime in New Orleans to a Memphis produce dealer who got Jowers to handle the payoff and murder weapon. An Army sniper squad was in place to shoot King if the Mafia hit failed, Pepper said.

John Campbell, a Shelby County prosecutor who has investigated the assassination but was not involved in the Jowers trial, said the conspiracy claims have no merit.

Campbell said investigators talked to several of Jowers' friends and associates who said he was interested in getting a deal for a movie or book.

"We looked at this off and on for five years ... and I've still seen nothing that would change my opinion" that Ray acted alone, Campbell said.

REGENTS

Docking promised the regents would look closely at student financial aid programs to avoid preventing poor students from enrolling.

But he noted the regents' ability to set tuition rates gives them more flexibility in dealing with budget problems.

"It is imperative that we leave no stone unturned in our quest to maintain quality within the regents system," Docking said.

Graves has not said definitively yet whether he will include the extra $21 million the Legislature promised in his proposed 2001 budget. He has made specific promises to add money for some social programs.

Most recently, Graves told reporters: "We are attempting to have some money in the budget to show good faith on the implementation of higher ed reform. I will not go so far as to tell you that every dime that's desired is locked in — but that does not mean to assume that we might not get there."

House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said the regents' review of tuition rates is appropriate and shows the board is not ignoring the state's budget problems.

"I applaud them for having the courage to do so," he said of their review.

However, Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, said the regents should wait for Graves to make his budget proposals to the Legislature in January before making decisions about tuition rates.

"It's something they should hold off on," he said.

Patron's death sparks change at Osco Drug

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Osco Drug has agreed to hire more black managers and will increase diversity training at all its Kansas City stores following the death of a suspected shoplifter last month.

Demetrius Davis died Nov. 9 minutes after he was released by four Osco employees who chased him from the store and held him face down on the sidewalk until police arrived. The four employees were put on leave.

The FBI is investigating the incident to determine whether the civil rights of Davis, a black man, were violated.

Jackson County Prosecutor Bob Beaird also is awaiting medical examiner results to determine the exact cause of death, and Davis' family has filed a wrongful-death lawsuit against Osco and its store employees.

Tuesday's announcement by Osco calls for stores to pull all alcohol advertisements in black communities, to stock more products made by black companies and increase sponsorship of events in black communities.

"All these issues are hot spots that existed in our community," community activist Alonzo Washington said. He said Davis' death "was just the spark that lit the fire. And we took this opportunity to deal with these issues when this took place."

The agreement was brokered by the Ad Hoc Group Against Crime and signed by Osco officials and representatives from the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Project Neighborhood, along with several community activists.

Kansas gets $25 million from tobacco settlement

■ American Lung Association hopes to use 1/3 of state's payment to fund programs to curb smoking by children.

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Witnessing the death of a lung-cancer victim is a painful experience the American Lung Association of Kansas hopes to prevent, said executive director Judy Keller.

"If you've ever watched a child pick up his or her third cigarette, it's also very painful," Keller said.

Keller said it is hoped this will be prevented with help in form of a payment.

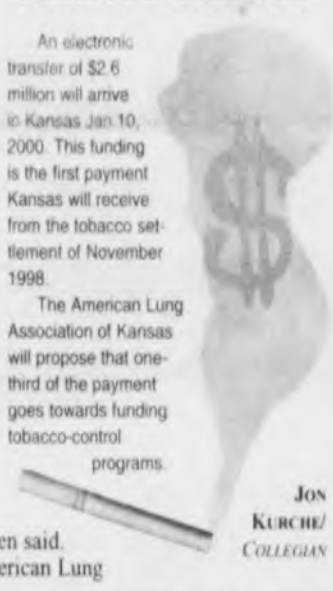
Kansas will receive on Jan. 10, 2000, an electronic transfer of $2.6 million from the tobacco settlement of November 1998.

Carolyn Rampey, principle analyst of the Kansas legislative research department, said another $50 million is expected to be paid during spring 2000. She said the state will receive an estimated $1.6 billion over a 25-year period.

"Kansas did not make these estimates, they are quoted from a national source," Rampey said. "The Legislature has said that with a few exceptions, the funding will be for children's programs."

Keller said the association will propose that one-third of the payment collected by Kansas go toward funding tobacco-control programs.

"From our perspective, it's crucial that a portion of the funding goes to tobacco control," Keller said.



State Sen. Lana Oleen said the settlement, which fulfills a contract between tobacco companies and state government, distributes funding based on state populations. She said the Kansas Legislature already has passed laws to establish children's trust funds and programs.

"Most people say it's an early Christmas gift," Oleen said. "I'm certain the American Lung

7 remain missing after helicopter crashes in Pacific

■ Marine Corps craft with 18 aboard sank fast; search for survivors goes on.

By MICHELLE WILLIAM
The Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — A Marine Corps helicopter with 18 people aboard crashed in the Pacific on Thursday, and seven were still missing hours later.

The CH-46 Sea Knight crashed about 1:16 p.m. PST, 25 miles southwest of San Diego. Eleven people quickly were pulled from the water.

As the sun went down, a dozen Navy and Coast Guard ships and six helicopters were searching for survivors.

Coast Guard Lt. Woody Woolridge, a helicopter pilot, arrived at the scene about 15 minutes after the crash and saw nothing but a smoke flare and an air crew helmet floating in the water. The fact that there was no large debris field, he said, suggested that the Sea Knight sank quickly.

"We were out there for about an hour and saw no one," Woolridge said.

The search would go on through the night if necessary, officials said.

Weather in the area was good with light winds and waves and clear skies. The water temperature was about 59 degrees.

"Obviously, we're concerned about hypothermia," Woolridge said about two hours after the crash. "Anyone we recover at this point will need immediate medical attention."

There was no immediate word on the conditions of those who were rescued.

The helicopter crashed after taking off from the Navy's USS Pecos, which provides fuel to ships at sea.

The helicopter was assigned to the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit at Camp Pendleton. The Marines use the helicopter as an all-weather assault transport.

Snyder not leaving Cats, officials say

■ Rumor of coach's departure unfounded; press conference not actually planned for today.

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State head football coach Bill Snyder is staying put.

On Thursday, KILT, a Houston radio station, reported that Snyder would be leaving K-State to became head coach at the University of Houston next season.

Without any official evidence, KILT reported that there's a Houston football press conference scheduled for today to announce the hiring of Snyder, but Chris Burkhalter, Houston sports information director, said no such event is going to take place.

"I don't know how something can get so blown out out of proportion so quickly," Burkhalter said. "Because a local radio station announces something, everyone thinks it's gospel. There is absolutely no press conference scheduled, and there isn't going to be one.

"I really feel bad for Coach Snyder right now. This kind of stuff causes a lot of distractions, and he doesn't need that right now. He's busy preparing for a bowl game, and I'm sure he doesn't need any more distractions at this time."

SNYDER

KILT declined comment early Thursday morning on the reports regarding Snyder.

Bob Krause, K-State vice president of institutional advancement, said the rumors are erroneous.

"I know Bill extremely well, and I just can't envision it," Krause said. "He would have called and informed us about something like this. It's just ridiculous, in all honesty."

Athletic Director Max Urick said these kind of rumors are really a compliment to Snyder.

"Its really a great complement to Coach Snyder," Urick said. "Every year at this time whenever coaching jobs open up, Bill's name is mentioned. And to be honest, I think that happens because I think Coach Snyder is the best coach in the country."

Urick attributes the circulation of rumors in Texas to people trying to discredit the K-State football program.

"A lot of of this gets started because people in Texas want to disrupt our recruiting down there," he said.

K-State-Salina major sees 1st women graduates

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Tina Higley and Michele Smith are two groundbreaking K-State-Salina students.

Saturday, they will be the first female students in the field of mechanical engineering technology to obtain degrees from K-State-Salina.

The degree, which has been offered at Salina since 1991, is predominated by males.

Smith said her motivation as a student was not paving the way for women, but rather obtaining a degree.

"I guess we are the first women since the program started," Smith said. "Neither one of us knew until a couple of days ago."

Higley said she was surprised to hear the news.

"I knew that I was the first in a long time, but I didn't know we were the first ones," Higley said.

The two women have taken different tracks toward the degree.

Smith is a single parent, and she spent nine years away from college before going back in 1996.

The time spent away from college gave her a strong desire to go back, she said.

"After I had gone back after nine years, there was no way that I was going to stop," Smith said.

As a single parent, Smith said she needed the help of professors and students along the way. She said professors were understanding when her personal life interfered with school.

She also said her classmates were willing to help her.

"It would not have been nearly as easy for Tina or I if the other class members hadn't been so supportive," Smith said.

Smith also said she is unsure what her son thinks of her graduating but that some day he will be proud.

Higley said the mechanical engineering technology degree requires a lot of dedication. She said it was hard for her at times to know what all of the different materials the students worked with were, and she thanks those associated with the program for their patience.

"We would have big study groups of 10 people sitting in a room working on one problem," Higley said. "And that way, I wasn't the only one who didn't understand."

The mechanical engineering technology degree is a hands-on curriculum, and it calls for a lot of time in the lab, both women said. Students in the major take skills they learn in the classroom and showcase them in lab situations.

Smith said the degree required a lot of prior knowledge, and she said some of it she didn't always possess.

"When you start off, they expect you to know things not taught in childhood," Higley said. "I didn't know what a clutch is, or how it works."

The degree is a lot like a mechanical engineering degree, Smith said.

"Mechanical engineering technology is like a mechanical engineering degree, but it is more hands on and less theory," Smith said.

The two said that after a while, class members become somewhat like a family. They not only spend time in class but in study sessions and social activities.

Both students said they have jobs lined up in their field after graduation. Higley will go to work in Colorado, and Smith will work in McPherson, Kan.

Higley said she encourages other women to study mechanical engineering technology.

"If I can do it, just about anybody can," Higley said. "A lot of times I didn't know if I could."

Online university president faces foreclosure attempt

OLATHE, Kan. — A Nebraska bank is the latest authority to come after the property of Leslie Edwin Snell, president of a controversial online university.

First Federal Lincoln Bank filed a mortgage foreclosure petition Wednesday against Snell, the president of Monticello University.

The bank asked a Johnson County District Court judge to authorize the sale of Snell's Olathe home at a sheriff's auction. First Federal seeks more than $114,000 in proceeds.

Snell is thought to be living in Dallas. His home is listed at more than $500,000 and has been on the market for months.

The state of Kansas also is after him. The attorney general's office sued Snell and his school in August. The state said he and the school violated the Kansas Consumer Protection Act.

The suit alleges Monticello misled students by promising real college degrees. The online school's degrees were not recognized by any legitimate accrediting agency.

The state seeks more than $1.5 million in civil penalties.

Florida man to be arraigned for murders in Juction City

JUNCTION CITY — A Geary County judge has bound over a Florida man for the 1994 deaths of a mother and her 11-month-old daughter in Junction City.

A Jan. 11 arraignment was set Wednesday for Artis Tremain Cobb, 25, of Jasper, Fla. Cobb is charged with one count of rape, one count of first-degree murder and one count of second-degree murder for the deaths of Kasey Blount, 18, and her daughter, Alannah Blount.

They were found dead July 24, 1994, after Pfc. Jade Blount called police to their apartment.

He told police he found his wife and daughter dead after returning from a week of training at Fort Riley.

Autopsies showed Mrs. Blount was suffocated and her daughter died of dehydration after being left alone.

Cobb was arrested last July 26 in Suwanee County, Fla., the Kansas Bureau of Investigation said.

Family in Topeka celebrates organ donation to daughter

TOPEKA — A picture of a young girl with blonde hair and a big smile sits on an end table in the home of Debbie and Ed Symsek. Jessica died 11 years ago.

Jessica is not the Symseks' daughter. Her parents live in California, and their decision to donate organs and tissue saved the life of Kaitlin Symsek, now 11.

The Symsek family did not know about the Thorson family until this year, a decade after Kaitlin had a heart operation.

The story is being featured in a national television Christmas special.

"Finally, we could say thank you," Debbie Symsek said.

Kaitlin's story will be featured on the "American Red Cross Holiday Music Spectacular," airing Christmas Eve on the Fox network. The Symseks gathered Wednesday night at a local hotel with Red Cross officials for a preview of the show.

Born without a pulmonary heart valve, Kaitlin was 15 months old when she underwent heart surgery that included a heart valve transplant.

Dogs' mauling elicits charge of manslaughter for owner

WINNSBORO, S.C. — An owner of two pit bulls was charged with involuntary manslaughter Thursday in the death of a man who was mauled by the dogs while taking a walk in the middle of the night.

The dogs owned by Frank Paul Speagle, 22, bit John Mickle, 45, more than 1,000 times and crushed his windpipe when they pulled him to the ground early Saturday, Coroner Joe Silvia said. Mickle was stripped of his clothes and flesh was torn from his left leg.

The dogs had been loose in Speagle's yard at the time of the attack, and Speagle also was charged with failing to keep a dangerous animal restrained. The involuntary manslaughter charge means authorities think Speagle should have known his dogs were dangerous.

In November, a 74-year-old man said the dogs bit him on the calf and thigh before he was able to get away by swinging his belt at them, Sheriff's Maj. Keith Lewis said. The man told the dogs' owner but not the authorities, Lewis said.

Rocket failures lead Japan to overhaul entire system

TOKYO — The Japanese government announced a complete overhaul of its rocket development program Thursday, raising questions about whether the technological powerhouse can extend its expertise into outer space.

The decision to halt the development of the troubled H-2 rocket — a key element of the space program — followed two failed launches this year.

The problems have dampened Japan's hopes of grabbing a share of the lucrative commercial satellite-launching market, now dominated by Europe and the United States.

Japanese media prominently reported the decision, with the nationally circulated Sankei newspaper calling it a huge setback.

The National Space Development Agency of Japan almost had completed construction of the last H-2 rocket, at a cost of about $155 million, the agency's spokesman, Toru Nakahara, said Thursday.

Music, lights on way to Union bowling alley

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new bowling experience is on its way to the K-State Student Union next spring.

Rock' It Bowling and Billiards is a sound and light show that features fog, black lights over the pins, laser lights and music while students, faculty and the Manhattan community bowl, Terri Eddy, Union recreation manager, said.

"It is a type of cosmic bowling, which is already available in town," Eddy said. "Students will like the new activity because it is an alternative to regular bowling."

Cindie Snyder, director of marketing and promotions for the Union, said the light show is the most impressive because it uses lasers to make patterns on the floor, ceiling and walls. She said a removable disk allows the patterns to be changed, and the lasers move to the beat of the music.

"Our target market is, of course, the K-State student," Snyder said. "When they walk through the door, they will see the lights and music and be in a party-type environment that includes bowling and billiards on the side."

Eddy said the equipment, which includes sound, light and fog machines, is being installed now. The project will cost about $17,000 but is not included in the 2000 Union renovation project.

"This type of bowling has been out in the industry for a while now," Eddy said. "We have also been asking for it because we hope that it will boost our income by having it at our non-peak times."

Rock'It Bowling and Billiards will be available from 11 p.m. to 1:30 a.m. on Friday and Saturday nights and will begin at the start of the spring semester. Admission will be $8 for students and $10 for the general public for the 2 1/2 hour period. Snyder said the admission will include bowling, billiards and shoe rental.

"It is going to be a new and fun recreational activity for students," Snyder said. "They will almost have to be there to actually experience what it is going to be like."

Gary King, employee at the Union recreation center, said he thinks the new bowling atmosphere will bring in more students from throughout campus as well as offer a fun atmosphere for families.

MORE INFO?
Rock' It Bowling and Billiards will be available Friday and Saturday nights from 11 p.m. to 1:30 p.m. and will begin at the start of the spring semester.

"I think by adding this kind of atmosphere for bowling, we're catching up with the rest of the area," King said. "It will be good for families, but also be fun for students and bring them back into the Union for recreational activities."

Both Snyder and Eddy said some of the equipment is being tested now so maintenance workers can see what it will be like during a slower part of the semester. Snyder said much of the equipment is impressive to see.

"If people are coming to bowl a real game, they might find that it will be difficult," Snyder said. "However, I think it will be another alternative to the bar scene for those who like to do things that involve loud music. It will be great for individuals as well as groups."

Regular bowling and billiards still will be offered throughout the week during operating hours.

Semester's finish line conjures up memories of high school races, Christmas's meaning

Though I'm not particularly good at it, one of my favorite sports always has been running. I ran cross country all four years of high school, and though I never once made it onto varsity and was getting trounced by the freshmen as a senior, I actually enjoyed it. Perhaps it's because it takes relatively little coordination as opposed to other sports — just one foot in front of the other, over and over again. At least that's within my athletic ability. Or perhaps it was because of the challenge of pushing myself, always striving to get better, trying to conquer a grueling course.

During a 3.1-mile race, there were plenty of times when I felt I rather would be sitting on the grass in the shade and watching. I continually had to choose to keep running my hardest, not to back off because I felt like I was about to die. But there was one part of the race where all of that — the pain, the heat, the exhaustion — faded away. As I would come onto the final leg of the race, with the finish line in view, I would begin sprinting with every last ounce of energy I possibly could muster and then some. It didn't matter how tired I was; the end was in sight and I was determined to finish strong.

That's somewhat how I feel at the end of a semester. Right now, I constantly am tempted to just start celebrating winter break immediately. But I remind myself that the end is in sight. If I slack off now, I will regret it later, but if I push to finish strong, I have four weeks to recover.

Which is part of why I am looking forward to winter break so much.

I dream of sleeping in (without missing class), of playing Axis and Allies with my younger brother for hours, of playing games and watching movies with my little sister for hours, of talking with my parents, of seeing my old friends. I plan to read several books (for enjoyment), practice my guitar until my fingers are sore, and play endless games on the fabulous Commodore 64 computer I bought over eBay (64K of RAM! Wow!). I'm looking forward to spending time with my extended family, building giant snow towers in our yard for no particular reason, and playing with fire — literally.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

I must say that most of all, though, Christmas for me is a time of awe and of worship.

It is a time of awe because the infinite God became a finite man. The source of wisdom and truth itself had to obey his parents and be taught by other teachers. The king of kings had to have his diaper changed. The creator of the universe had to learn how to walk. It is at once fascinating and mind-boggling, the sort of thing you believe not because you fully understand it, but because you are absolutely convinced it is true.

It is a time of worship because I celebrate something that had been anticipated and predicted for more than 2000 years. It was predicted that the Messiah would be a descendant of King David (Isaiah 11:1-5, Jeremiah 23:5), born in Bethlehem (Micah 5:2), born to a virgin (Isaiah 7:14), born within 490 years of King Artaxerxes' decree to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Daniel 9:24-26), and born while the temple, destroyed in A.D. 70, was still standing (Malachi 3:1, Psalm 118:26, Haggai 2:7-9).

Ultimately, the meaning of Christmas, which literally means "Christ come," is summed up by the prophet Isaiah:

"For to us a child is born, to us a son is given, and the government will be on his shoulders. And he will be called Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there will be no end. He will reign on David's throne and over his kingdom, establishing it with justice and righteousness from that time on and forever (Isaiah 9:4-7)."

That is what Christmas is all about. It is an invasion of love into a world of hate, of light into darkness, of freedom into oppression. And it is hope — hope because Jesus Christ is coming again to establish peace and justice over all the earth.

So as I sprint down the final stretch of this semester, I am keeping in mind that there are even greater things to look forward to than four weeks of vacation.

Education key to dealing with people of other cultures

We used to call the photographer "Slick Rick." It was the way he leaned in a little too close to arrange your blouse or how he would insist that you had to be the most exquisitely beautiful subject ever caught on film. His favorite conversation topics were his libido and his fledging film production company.

One muggy August afternoon, as I suffered through the rite of passage known as composite pictures, Rick, as expected, was telling me I had developed nicely over the past two years and that he was looking forward to seeing my "playful" side during our session. Considering that I was outfitted in Angora and could feel my upper lip starting to sweat, I was having a difficult time being civil to this pervert, much less playful. As he continued to fiddle with his camera lens, he said he wanted to capture my "exotic beauty."

At this, I couldn't suppress a droll smile, while Rick gleefully clicked away. I am a white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant female. There is nothing remotely exotic about me.

Several months later, I was rushing through my closing duties at work while my boyfriend waited at the bar. One of my coworkers gave me a sidelong glance after observing my visitor and said, as though he was incredulous, that he had no idea my taste in men was so exotic.

"Exotic, as in remarkable or fascinating in nature?" I asked.

"More like as in foreign or not native," he replied. Almost as an afterthought, he asked me if we were living la vida loca, à la Ricky Martin.

My boyfriend is Hispanic. To be exact, his father is Mexican and his mother is Caucasian. He is used to such thoughtless remarks, to having his life so myopically defined in terms of a pop star because of his olive complexion. He has grown accustomed to people asking him if he speaks Spanish, as though we all speak the native tongue of our ancestors.

I am not used to it, and because of this, I get angry more easily. After all, I am just a white girl from sheltered suburbia, and I've never had anyone make presumptions about my life based upon my last name or the color of my skin. I take my whiteness for granted. I've found that people don't ask you "what you are," a crude way of inquiring about your lineage, when you are white.

Growing up, he would sometimes get into name-calling games with friends, trading barbs. However, the final name, the triumphant blow, would be "spic."

I hate that word. I hate that it is meant as a disparaging remark, and that someone could use it as a trump card to win a match. People don't make belittling remarks about other cultures unless they consider it inferior to their own.

When he was in college, he never was a member of Hispanic American Leadership Organization. His name was pronounced in the appropriate Americanized way. I speak more Spanish than he does, and he's never been outside the United States. He progressively distanced himself from what often is perceived as a social stigma of being Mexican. His only connection with his race is when he has to check a box on a form. And so people who know him, including myself, completely disregard the fact that he is Mexican American.

And perhaps by doing so, I miss something. By failing to recognize his ancestry, am I forsaking the significance of his heritage? Am I trying, too expediently, to homogenize him with the rest of the general population?

Because the facts of the matter are that I very well might marry him someday, and should we have children, they will be considered minorities. They, too, will check the box that says Hispanic on their applications for college, a job, an apartment and a loan. And if they get into a fight at school and some ignorant fool should call them a "spic," how will I console them? How will I help them to become proud of their heritage when their father and I know virtually nothing about it?

There actually was a girl, someone I considered a friend, who was outraged when I said I probably would take his last name when we married. She insinuated what an atrocity it would be to have an obviously Hispanic last name when my skin is such a pretty white.

I am ill-prepared for this bigotry, because I have spent my entire Caucasian existence thinking I should consider my peer and colleagues as white as I am. While reasoning that there was no way I could be prejudiced or racist because I saw everyone as balanced equals, I was really just exercising prejudice in a different manner.

It seems nonsensical for me to assume his culture is irrelevant, whether or not it manifests itself in the tangible form of language or religion. And so we've tried to take steps to discover his Hispanic heritage. It seems bizarre to have to take classes or workshops to learn about something that should be inherent.

However, if his heritage is something we're going to pass on, we have to educate ourselves first.

Collegian to be commended for work on century series

Editor,

The staff of the University Archives wishes to congratulate the Collegian, its reporters and editors for the excellent "End of the Century" series published this semester.

The reporters spent hundreds of hours in the University Archives researching each decade of the 1900s in addition to interviewing individuals who knew about the period. The result was a series of enlightening articles about the history of K-State. Not only were they interesting to read each Wednesday, they produced an important body of information for University Archives to preserve. We are pleased that the University Archives could serve as a laboratory for these journalists to practice their future profession. As these articles reveal, K-State has a fascinating history, and we invite others to visit the Archives to learn more about their university for a class assignment, scholarly research or pleasure.

Effort on Memorial Stadium deserves praise, applause

Editor,

I have been doing some research recently considering the area in and around Memorial Stadium. I have learned that the university is planning some improvements for the old stadium with the help of the KSU Alumni Association.

Memorial Stadium was built in memory of the K-State students who fought and died in World War I.

It was used as the football stadium and track facility up until they built KSU Stadium and the current track facility.

It once was a great facility, but now stands as an eyesore, wasting away for all to see from Anderson Avenue. However, it appears this is all going to change over the next couple of years as the university and the Alumni Association have teamed up to make this area look great again.

First, the Alumni Center will plug the south end of Memorial Stadium, giving Anderson a new view.

This also will give the Alumni Association a reason to refurbish Memorial Stadium. It will be staring at old Memorial Stadium out its back curtains, having no choice but to see it wasting away.

This has prompted the Alumni Association to put up $150,000 to revive Memorial Stadium.

This money will go to the track to add a synthetic surface and add landscaping to the surrounding areas within the stadium.

K-State also has allotted money to reinvent the field of Memorial Stadium. The university even is contemplating the use of turf instead of grass to accommodate the club sports such as soccer and rugby, not to mention the amount of wear and tear the field gets from the K-State Marching Band practicing on it. K-State also plans to renovate the classrooms in both East and West stadiums, including other facilities, such as Telecommunications.

If the current plan is followed through, the university and the Alumni Association will have saved Memorial Stadium from its current path to deterioration.

Surely Memorial Stadium could not handle too many more years of maintenance-free usage. The parties involved should be applauded for their effort to restore Memorial Stadium to its former glory.

Alliance calls for U.S., Russia to stand down

BY DAVID BRISCOE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Worried that the world could be blasted into a nuclear disaster within minutes, a new alliance is trying to persuade the U.S. government to take 5,000 nuclear weapons off hair-trigger alert to prompt a similar step by Moscow.

"Many of our citizens believe we already have done this," said Bruce Blair, a nuclear control expert who joined politicians, former military control officers and other antinuclear experts to announce a campaign Thursday to get U.S. nuclear weapons off alert status.

Despite a 1994 pact by President Clinton and Russian President Boris Yeltsin not to aim nuclear missiles at each other's cities, 5,000 warheads on each side remain loaded for wartime targets that can be activated in seconds, Blair said. A launch order would take only about 2 minutes to execute, he said.

The alliance is taking no position on a proposed national missile defense system, focusing instead on trying to prevent accidental or unauthorized launch from Russia or a U.S. launch facilitated by a dangerously mechanized system.

The campaign, dubbed "Back from the Brink," includes a Web site — www.dealert.org — a video describing a near-launch of Russian missiles in 1995, and grassroots organizing to expose the issue and try to inject it into the 2000 presidential campaign.

Blair, a former Air Force missile control officer and now a defense analyst at Brookings Institution, proposed that Clinton unilaterally de-alert all U.S. missiles, including those aboard submarines that are on 15-minute notice to fire.

Then, Clinton and Yeltsin could work out a full-scale de-alerting of all nuclear missiles with a verification regime and guarantees from China, Britain and France to follow suit, Blair suggested.

Despite the end of the Cold War and progress in disarmament, "we're still allowing ourselves 15 to 20 minutes to determine whether or not the planet Earth will be extinct," said former Democratic Sen. Dale Bumpers of Arkansas, an alliance leader.

Despite a 1994 pact by President Clinton and Russian President Boris Yeltsin not to aim nuclear missles at each other's cities, 5,000 warheads on each side remain loaded for wartime targets that can be activated in seconds.

"It's like walking along a cliff performing for your girlfriend and saying, 'Look how close I can get to the edge and not fall off,'" Bumpers said.

School's gun raffle expected to bring in 5 times original estimate

BY MARTHA WAGGONER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RALEIGH, N.C. — A private school's raffle of five guns has been far more successful than the school expected because gun advocates from around the country responded to criticism of the event by snapping up hundreds of tickets.

The Hobgood Academy expects to clear $23,000 instead of the hoped-for $4,000, as 2,500 tickets were sold for $10 each.

The proceeds will help pay for an FFA building at the school, which is in rural Halifax, 70 miles northeast of Raleigh.

Doug Abernathy, owner of Doug's Guns in Williamston, which supplied the five guns at their $1,800 cost, said bake sales and barbecues can't even come close to raising as much money as a gun raffle in an area where hunting is popular.

"This being a strong sporting community, any time you give anybody a chance to win a firearm, then obviously, Bubba's willing to shell out five or 10 dollars," said Abernathy, who has supplied guns for other raffles.

Gun-control advocates have said the raffle is inappropriate and insensitive, especially because of Columbine and other school shootings.

The 306-student school, which is kindergarten through 12th grade, is raffling one shotgun or rifle every day this week.

The money will help pay for the FFA building to be built this summer and buy saws, machinery and other equipment, Headmaster John Hardison said.

Ticket sales exploded when Fred Bonner, a syndicated columnist and editor of a hunting, fishing and boating publication, sent information over the Internet to gun advocates and hunting friends across the country.

People from all over the United States, including Alaska, bought tickets. Some included notes of support, which the school since has thrown away, Hardison said.

"They felt like it was a worthy cause with the FFA," Hardison said. "And they were supporting our right to do this."

Hardison said the guns being raffled never were stored at the school. Abernathy will keep them until winners clear the required background checks.

Joe Leonard puts defensive pressure on Memphis' Kelly Wise in the first half of Wednesday night's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats came from behind to win in the closing seconds, 62-61, to improve their home-court record to 5-0.

Wildcats look to continue momentum in battle with former coach Kruger

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Cats' 62-61 come-from-behind victory over Memphis Wednesday night was head coach Tom Asbury's 81st career win at K-State, tying him for fifth on the all-time coaching list with Lon Kruger.

Asbury will meet this former Wildcat coach and player Saturday night when K-State (5-1) travels to Champaign, Ill., to battle Kruger's No. 22 Fighting Illini (4-2).

"I know they're solid," Asbury said of Illinois. "They're a Big 10 team, and they'll be physical — they're a very fine team.

"You can take it to the fact that Lon Kruger is going to want to beat K-State real badly, and so we've got our hands full. But I think we're going in with a better mindset than if we lose by one (to Memphis). I think it's going to be much easier to prepare this team coming off the win."

Kruger, in his fourth season as Illinois head coach, has a rich basketball history at K-State.

"He's a Hall of Famer around here," K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said. "He was a great player, a terrific student-athlete and a great coach. It's definitely going to be a special game."

In his playing career as a Wildcat (1971-74), Kruger led K-State to back-to-back Big 8 Conference crowns in 1972 and 1973.

After being touted as the Big 8's Sophomore of the Year in 1972, he was honored as the Big 8 Player of the Year in both 1973 and 1974. He finished his Wildcat career with 1,063 points, the 14th-best total in K-State history.

As a head coach at K-State for four seasons (1986-90), he compiled a 81-46 career record after replacing his mentor Jack Hartman at the Wildcat helm.

Despite K-State's lofty reputation in NCAA Tournament play, he became the first coach in school history to take the Wildcats to four consecutive NCAA Tournament appearances, as well as the first to win 20 games in his inaugural season as head coach (20-11).

His best-remembered Wildcat team came in the 1987-88 season, the final campaign for Ahearn Field House. That team, led by All-American Mitch Richmond, went 25-9 for the season, tying the school record for wins. The squad advanced all the way to the Midwest Regional Final of the NCAA tourney.

However, his vast accomplishments at K-State thicken the plot for Saturday's matchup, when Kruger's Illinois team will face a Wildcat squad that is on a five-game winning streak.

To thicken the K-State connection even further, Steve Henson, former two-time honorable mention All-American selection as a Wildcat guard, joined the Illini coaching staff last summer.

Yet, Asbury said the players can't fully ascertain how much Kruger meant to the Wildcat basketball program.

"I don't think any of our players probably know," he said. "We'll tell them, but it isn't going to be Lon and I playing one-on-one."

However, satirically speaking, if it was a battle between the two coaches on the court, Asbury said, "I'd kick his butt, cause as great as he was I'd take him right to the block ... but in my physical condition, you might have to wheel me down there."

On Saturday, the Illini will be led by sophomore guard Cory Bradford, one of 25 preseason candidates for the Wooden Award All-American team.

Last year, Bradford was named Big 10 Freshman of the Year, averaging 15.4 points per game and hitting a school record for three-pointers in a single season.

"He's a great shooter, the best we've seen to this date," Fox said. "He's going to be one of the keys to the game."

On the Wildcat side of the ball, Asbury said a lot of different players have contributed to K-State's success this season.

"The nice thing is that nobody is tightly intertwined into a rotation, but nobody's out of it either," he said. "I think our strength is going to be in our numbers, maybe in our flexibility."

Track to return to action today

BY ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is back on the track.

Its men's and women's track and field teams open indoor competition, playing host to the KSU All-Comers meet today. K-State also plays host to the KSU Winter Pentathalon on Saturday.

Head coach Cliff Rovelto estimated that fewer than one-third of the collegiate track and field programs compete in December, but this early competition gives his athletes a chance to see where they are.

"We've always done this as a test before the Christmas break," he said.

Rovelto said the K-State team traditionally performs at the level he thinks it is capable of at this point in the season. He also said the Cats historically have been successful in winning events, but the meet has not been scored because it is too early in the season.

"If 'well' is defined as winning a lot of events, then we traditionally do well," he said.

The KSU All-Comers meet and the KSU Winter Pentathalon will feature partial teams, including the University of Wyoming, Missouri-Kansas City and several smaller schools, such as Emporia State and Bethany.

K-State will enter partial teams in both the men's and women's meets. Rovelto said none of the distance runners who competed this fall would be entered for the women. Only a couple, members from the men's squad will run, because these athletes need to rest.

For the women, Rovelto said he expects good things from senior thrower Anna Whitham and senior pole vaulter Erin Anderson. He said both are capable of achieving NCAA qualifying marks, even this early in the season.

"We have a pretty complete women's team," he said. "We've got some pretty good gals."

On the men's side, Rovelto said there are a lot of newcomers, and that he is eager to see them compete. Roberto Carbajal, a transfer from Mexico, will compete in sprints and hurdles for the Cats, and Sean Redmond, a junior transfer from Johnson County Community College, will compete in the 400.

Aside from K-State's entries, Rovelto said several accomplished athletes will compete unattached. Former K-State high jumper Charles Burney will compete, as will several All-Americans and an American record holder.

Women to face No. 13 Oregon tonight

■ Opening-round game set to tip off at 7 p.m.

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's women's basketball team competes this weekend in the Women's Sports Foundation Classic in Springfield, Mo., opening against the No. 13 Oregon Ducks at 7 tonight.

The Cats (5-2) return to the court after a 66-57 victory Wednesday night at Wisconsin-Green Bay. Senior center Angie Finkes' 17 points and nine rebounds led the Cats. Teammate Nicky Ramage also had 12 rebounds and 13 points.

Oregon (5-0) returns to the court after a 90-58 triumph last Saturday over Colorado.

If they win, the Cats will face the winner of Southwest Missouri State (3-4) and Texas Christian (6-3) on Saturday. The championship game will be at 8:05 p.m., and the consolation match will be at 6:05 p.m.

If the Cats compete against Southwest Missouri State, they will have to find a way to shut down Kansas product Jackie Stiles, who averages 25.7 points a game, the highest in NCAA Division I.

If they face TCU, they will have to shut down senior guard Diamond Jackson, who leads the Horned Frogs with 15.5-point average.

Wahington coach sings secrets to his success

As a youngster, seemingly every adult I knew tried to convince me of the age-old saying, "There's something positive in everything."

With K-State's recent Culligan Holiday Bowl invitation, one would think that only stacked up another piece of evidence against the saying.

Then I thought about it for a while, and I came up with something. Despite the fact that K-State isn't in a Bowl Championship Series bowl, despite the fact that San Diego is a huge drive from Manhattan, despite the fact that the trip will be quite costly ... K-State will get the chance to destroy a certain coach whom every single Big 12 fan has grown to hate over the years.

Heck, even the school where he previously coached has a strong dislike for the guy.

If you don't know who I'm talking about, here's the scoop: This person was a quarterback at UCLA a few years back. After failing to stick in the NFL, he got into the coaching ranks and progressed until he became head coach of a football program in the state located directly west of Kansas, despite the fact that he didn't deserve the job. After having one successful year and a few terrible years (by that football program's standards), he was rewarded with a huge contract to coach a college football team located in the northwestern-most state of the continental United States.

Oh, yeah, he plays the guitar quite annoyingly, too.

In my effort to be the best columnist writing for the Collegian on the sports page on Fridays, I thought it would be good to interview the head coach of the team K-State will play in the Holiday Bowl.

For some strange reason, this person did not want me to reveal his name, so I will refer to him from now on as: "Mr. So-what-if-I'm-a-terrible-football-coach-who-lacks-any-dicipline-and-gets-premier-head-coaching-jobs-even-though-I've-never-actually-proven-myself."

Me: I just wanted to say thanks for letting me do this interview.

Mr. So: No problem. I hope you don't mind that I brought my guitar along, I actually thought it would be hip and cool to answer each of your questions with a sweet folk lullaby.

Me: Do you really have to?

Mr. So: (playing) Yes, I'm afraid I must/ because in me you can trust.

Me: What does that mean?

Mr. So: (playing) It's obvious you don't understand/ and can't comprehend me, my man.

Me: OK/ how do you think K-State matches up with your team?

Mr. So: (playing) Thanks for reminding me/ I forgot to look at the scouting report, you see/ So I can't predict a final score/ because that's what my assistant coaches are for.

Me: So are you saying that you make them do all the work?

Mr. So: (playing) Now you're starting to feel/ just what is real/ I don't know what I'm doing/ except for how to do some coffee brewing.

Me: I see. Well, take me back to the days when you were coaching in the Big 12.

Mr. So: (playing) They were pretty tough, man/ that conference is tougher than eating Spam/ If you look at my record you'll see/ I got my butt kicked frequently.

Me: Why do you think that was so?

Washington running back attack poses challenge for Cats' defense

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the No. 7 K-State Wildcats take on Washington in the Culligan Holiday Bowl on Dec. 29 in San Diego, they might see a running attack that looks familiar.

By using a variety of running backs and a quick, athletic quarterback, the Huskies resemble a Nebraska running threat that handed the Wildcats a 41-15 thrashing last month.

Although the Huskies are far from being identical to the Cornhuskers, K-State still might have its hands full.

"We've looked at them a couple of times," sophomore linebacker Ben Leber said. "They're different than I expected. I don't know how they ended up with that many losses. They run the ball a lot more than I expected. It will be a good game."

The Huskies have made a habit of running the ball often in 1999. Washington has rushed the ball more than 50 times in five games this season. By averaging 44.6 carries a game, Washington topped the charts in the Pac-10 in time of possession with an average of 32.57 minutes a game.

Washington ranks No. 21 in the nation in rushing, averaging 189.7 yards a game. Five Huskies have rushed for 100 yards in games this season. Washington rushed for 2,087 yards, including a 368-yard performance against Stanford.

"They use a variety of running backs," defensive end Monty Beisel said. "They remind me of when we use to have Eric Hickson, Michael Lawrence and Marlon Charles. They throw a lot of adversity at you."

Sophomore tailback Willie Hurst anchors the Huskies' rushing attack with 546 yards this season. Maurice Shaw has rushed for 440 yards.

Leber said the Huskies are effective because they change formations and use a variety of options.

"They have an I-team power-up-the-middle attack," he said. "But, they can use the option. They use a variety of options to beat you."

Still, Washington's biggest running threat might be junior quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo.

"They have two or three good running backs, but basically they leave it in the hands of their quarterback," Beisel said. "Their biggest running threat is at quarterback."

Tuiasosopo, a second-team All-Pac-10 selection, passed for 2,221 yards and rushed for 541. His biggest game was against Stanford, when the 6-foot-2-inch Tuiasosopo passed for 302 yards and rushed for 207 more, leading the Huskies to a 35-30 victory.

He became the first Division I player to pass for more than 300 yards and rush for 200 in a game.

"He understands lanes," Beisel said of Tuiasosopo. "He makes things happen. We will have to attack him from all directions. He's got great feet and great athleticism."

Fletcher said Moretti and Lytle will make their first court appearance at 9:30 a.m. Wednesday.

The infant's name and age have not been revealed.

Women should take extra care to ensure health

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students usually aren't concerned with their health unless they are sick, but health is important to consider when looking toward the future.

Carol Ann Holcomb, associate professor of human nutrition, said health later in life is especially important to women.

"It is important to the future of health in women to do as much as we can to prevent or slow down the progression of illnesses," Holcomb said.

A hindrance to women's health care is the lack of study on the effects of certain drugs on women. Holcomb said women were excluded from studies about risk factors for health prior to 1990.

"There are some diseases that are unique to women," Holcomb said. "If a new drug was tested, women would usually be excluded because there would be a chance she would be pregnant, which would have a different effect than on a normal body. We still do not know what effect some drugs have on women, and most studies take what they have learned on men and apply it to all women. However, this is not accurate."

She said, however, that in modern times, women can live beyond 100 years, which means half of their lives is post-reproduction, eliminating need for caution to avoid causing birth defects.

Holcomb said many diseases are gender specific, such as cervical cancer in women and prostate cancer in men. She said, however, that contrary to what most people believe, the No. 1 cause of death in older women is heart disease.

"It gets to be the idea that breast cancer is the main cause of death in women because of the media attention it attracts," Holcomb said. "However, although symptoms will vary, women are in just as much danger from dying from heart disease as men."

Holcomb said another condition that is specific to women is the responsibility to care for their parents and children at the same time. She said this generation, or the sandwich generation, defines those in middle-age who are taking care of their parents and children at the same time.

She said women usually are the ones who are expected to retire early, which has a huge effect on their economic security.

Studies also have shown that women make up 80 percent of the nursing-home population, which makes aging largely a women's issue.

"It is important to study this demographic impact on women and its effects on older women's health," Holcomb said. "Because we see people living longer, we also begin to see people spending more time living frail and disabled lives."

Holcomb said there are several things young men and women can do to age successfully — maintain a well-balanced diet; avoid substance abuse, such as tobacco and alcohol use; increase physical activity; and visit the doctor regularly.

"Women are much more comfortable going to see a doctor when they are older because of prenatal care, taking a child to see a physician and going to a gynecologist early in their adult life," Holcomb said. "If men paid more attention to regular physical exams and screenings, they could narrow the gender gap to three or four years instead of seven."

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center, said Lafene has implemented a top-10 prevention program that is applied to all healthy adults between the ages of 18 and 40. Such things as tobacco use, well-women examinations, sexually transmitted diseases and nutrition are included in the program.

She said the risk of STDs is important for college students to be aware of because of the consequences untreated diseases could have in later life.

"Just because you get tested and are disease free the first time, doesn't mean you don't have one," Kennedy said. "The reason STDs can cause trauma is because in many instances, if left untreated, they can led to infertility in women."

Kennedy said it can be hard to eat right and make healthy choices because of the fast-paced lives of many Americans, especially students.

"In the United States, our lifestyles are so fast. We rely on fast food, so it is difficult to make healthy choices," Kennedy said. "However, many restaurants are trying to incorporate more healthy options into their menus, but it can still be difficult for students to change their habits."

Lesley Stipetic, sophomore in public relations and member of STD, HIV/AIDS, Peer Educators, said students tend to forget about their future and only think about the here and now.

"Students don't realize the results of what they are doing now could drastically effect and change their future," Stipetic said. "Unless it is effecting them within the next year, it is not a possibility of what could happen later."

Honor society helps Habitat for Humanity park almost $2,000

By LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Carrie Burgardt needed a way to raise money for the K-State Habitat for Humanity chapter. It's a good thing she had a friend who was majoring in grain science.

"I just asked my friend, 'do you think they would let us park for one game?'" Burgardt said.

Alpha Mu, the grain science honor society, parks cars during football season to raise money for scholarships and community projects. Burgardt said she thought it would be a good idea to get the two organizations together.

"I just contacted Dr. Fairchild and we got together," Burgardt said.

Fred Fairchild, associate professor of grain science and industry, said Alpha Mu often works with benevolent causes.

"Primarily, we support students," Fairchild said.

In fact, Alpha Mu helped out other Manhattan organizations, such as Flint Hills Breadbasket, this semester.

Kaleb Beyer, president of Alpha Mu, said he couldn't turn down Burgardt's cause.

"I thought it was a good idea because they're building shelter for the homeless. This was a good opportunity to give them a donation and help them out," Beyer said.

"Everyone told me, 'oh they won't do it,'" Burgardt said.

But they were wrong. Alpha Mu worked with Habitat and parked cars on game day. Habitat earned $1,760.

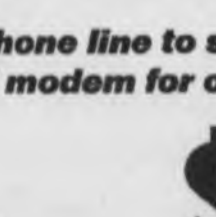
The money was given to Habitat in a small ceremony Thursday morning.

"This is awesome. It's probably our biggest fund-raiser ever," Burgardt said.

The donation will go to Habitat's new project, to begin April 2000.

Burgardt said the K-State Habitat for Humanity chapter works with Manhattan Habitat for Humanity. The Manhattan chapter is allowing the K-State chapter to build an entire house by itself, which is not something it does often, Burgardt said.

In order to start the project, the K-State chapter needs $10,000 by the groundbreaking day, April 1.



"We already have about $7,000, so this will help a lot," Burgardt said.

The group might be nearing their April goal but still has a long way to go to reach its October 2000 goal of $38,000. Burgardt said her organization doesn't have permanent plans for fund raising yet, but it might sell T-shirts or sponsor a benefit concert.

Justice not likely to prosecute in King conspiracy

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON D.C. — Although a civil jury has concluded there was a conspiracy to kill the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., a 1 1/2-year-old Justice Department investigation is not likely to produce any criminal charges, Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder said Thursday.

Declining to release specific findings of the probe by the department's civil-rights division, Holder told reporters, "I would not expect that there would be any criminal prosecution out of our report."

Holder said the report on the new field investigation ordered by Attorney General Janet Reno in August 1998 is almost complete and could be released within weeks.

Because the Justice inquiry was limited to examining two conspiracy allegations that emerged in recent years, including the one examined by the civil jury in Memphis, Tenn., Holder said he doubted the report would put to rest speculation about the 1968 assassination of the civil rights leader.

The Justice report is not a broad-based look at all the possibilities, Holder said. "I suspect that given the verdict yesterday, this will renew interest the King assassination, and I suspect plant in the minds of many people doubts about some of those conclusions that were reached.

"We believe that this case is over. ... We know what happened. This is the period at the end of the sentence."

— Dexter King, son of Martin Luther King Jr.

Dexter King, a son of King, told a news conference in Atlanta on Thursday, "We don't care what the Justice Department does." Because of information that came out in the Memphis trial, he said, "We believe that this case is over. ... We know what happened. This is the period at the end of the sentence."

Although Justice conducted a criminal investigation, statutes of limitation would bar prosecution of many crimes that are 30 years old, with the possible exception of an ongoing conspiracy. Holder did not say whether Justice investigators found no conspiracy or found no crimes previously unknown.

Meantime, the King family finally has what it has sought for years — a jury verdict saying the civil rights leader was the victim of a conspiracy, not of a lone gunman.

"I'm just so happy to see that the people have spoken. This is what we've always asked for," Dexter King said Wednesday after a jury ruled in his family's favor on a wrongful-death lawsuit.

The Kings had sued Loyd Jowers, a retired Memphis businessman who claimed six years ago that he paid someone other than confessed killer, James Earl Ray, to kill King.

The trial for the first time gave a jury the opportunity to hear theories of a murder conspiracy in the 1968 assassination at a Memphis motel.

Ray pleaded guilty to the murder in 1969, so he did not go to trial. He tried for 30 years to take back the guilty plea and died in prison of liver disease last year. His plea was upheld eight times by state and federal courts.

The six blacks and six whites on the Chancery Court jury deliberated only about three hours before returning Wednesday's verdict and awarding the Kings $100 in damages.

The Kings has asked for minimal damages, saying they were more interested in a verdict that would support their belief of a conspiracy.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., an associate of King, told WSB-TV in Atlanta that he will ask President Clinton and Reno for a thorough investigation of the assassination.

The King family stressed the desire for closure.

"We are prepared now to move on with our lives and hope that other people will join us in this process so that the nation can move on with the healing that is so necessary," King's widow, Coretta Scott King, said Thursday on CNN.

The suit named Jowers and other unnamed conspirators, so the verdict did not identify anyone else who might have been involved. A civil court jury finding a defendant like Jowers at fault requires only a preponderance of evidence. In a criminal case, a defendant must be found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

William Pepper, a lawyer who represented Ray and now represents the Kings, told jurors that Jowers, 73, was part of a vast conspiracy involving the Mafia and agents of the federal government. He said King was targeted because of his opposition to the Vietnam War and plans for a huge "poor people's march" on Washington.

He asserted that a cover-up following the assassination involved the FBI, CIA, the news media and Army intelligence, as well as many state and city officials.

Juror Robert Tucker said the assassination was too complex for one person to have carried out.

He noted Pepper's assertions that King's police guard was pulled back shortly before the murder and that Army agents had King under surveillance at the time he was felled by a single rifle shot.

"All of those things added up, it wasn't just one guy acting alone," Tucker said.

A U.S. House committee concluded in 1978 that Ray was the killer but mighthave had help before or after the assassination. The committee did not find any government involvement in the murder.

Jowers owned a small restaurant, Jim's Grill, across the street from The Lorraine Motel, where King was killed. On the day of the murder, Ray, a prison escapee from Missouri, rented a room under an assumed name in a rooming house above Jim's Grill.

In 1993, Jowers said on ABC-TV that he hired King's killer as a favor to an underworld figure who was a friend. He did not identify the purported killer but said it wasn't Ray.

Jowers was sick for much of the trial and did not testify.

Lewis Garrison, Jowers' lawyer, told jurors they reasonably could conclude King was the victim of a conspiracy but said his client's role was minor at best.

He said it was hard to believe that "the owner of a greasy spoon and an escaped convict" could have pulled off King's assassination.

The order to kill King, Pepper said, came from the head of organized crime in New Orleans to a Memphis produce dealer who got Jowers to handle the pay-off and murder weapon. An Army sniper squad was in place to shoot King if the Mafia hit failed, Pepper said.

Association will get a portion of the funding."

Oleen said the money can be used only to enhance and create programs. She said the children's cabinet was established to evaluate programs that possibly will be sent to Gov. Bill Graves.

"The cabinet has been meeting for a year and has high-profile legislators on it," Oleen said. "At this point, they're looking at programs to establish statewide."

To receive funding, the association first will have to make its plea to the children's cabinet, Oleen said. She said it is appropriate that a portion goes to programs designed to curb tobacco use.

Keller said tobacco use is the single leading predictable cause of death in Kansas. In addition, she said the state must pay for long-term, expensive health-care costs for people who lack insurance.

"The purpose of the lawsuit was to recover costs due to tobacco," Keller said. "We and the public health community believe that tobacco control should be first priority."

The population of children who smoke in Kansas is 20 to 25 percent, Keller said. She said education and research are necessary to help decrease this statistic.

"If in 25 years we have as many children using tobacco as now, then the settlement is for naught," Keller said. "When you're up against an industry that spends $13 million each day on advertising, it's going to take a complicated approach."

Although the full payment is estimated to be received within a 25-year period, Rampey said payments probably will not stop by this time. She said there is a possibility that the tobacco companies could go bankrupt.

"There's been talk that tobacco consumption is down," Oleen said. "We can't assume we'll have enough money for the next 20 years, and need to be prudent with the tax dollars."

Clinton pushes to expand Internet access

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton said Thursday he wants to slam shut the digital divide and make access to computers and the Internet as common as the use of the telephone for all Americans.

"It's clear we need to keep working until we reach that goal," Clinton said.

He spoke in the Rose Garden after meeting with leaders of the communications industry and civil rights movement. The president was to have addressed a technology conference but abbreviated his remarks to fly to Massachusetts to deliver the eulogy for six firefighters killed in a blaze last Friday.

The conference, presided over by Commerce Secretary William Daley, continued without the president. Its aim was to push government agencies and private companies to do more to narrow the growing digital divide in which minorities are falling behind in their access to computers and the Internet.

"I believe that we should set a national goal of making computers and Internet access available for every American," the president said in a memo to executive agencies. He directed Daley to devise a national strategy to achieve that goal.

Clinton also said federal agencies will expand a growing network of community technology centers primarily for use by low-income Americans.

He said the United States already has connected more than 50 percent of schools and more than 80 percent of classrooms to the Internet and will have all schools wired by sometime next year.

"There's still a lot more to do," Clinton said. "We must connect all of our citizens to the Internet, not just in schools and libraries, but in homes, small businesses and community centers, and we must help all Americans gain the skills they need to make the most of the connection."

Clinton said he will devote his next "New Markets" poverty tour in the spring to highlighting the problem and plans to issue a number of directives aimed at increasing government efforts in this area.

Daley will follow up with his own schedule of 12 regional trips next year to highlight the need for action in different parts of the country.

"Closing the digital divide is an essential part of President Clinton's initiative … to bring America's prosperity to economically underserved areas," Daley said.

Thursday's conference was expected to attract more than 600 participants, ranging from some of America's biggest high-tech companies to state and local governments, education groups and civil rights organizations.

Corporations participating include AT&T, BellSouth and America Online.

In a statement, American Online announced it was helping create the "Digital Opportunity Partnership" to provide online assistance to the nation's civil rights organizations.

The America Online partnership will be with the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of 180 of the nation's largest civil rights organizations. The partnership will provide technical assistance, training seminars and establish a group of "circuit riders," teachers committed to promoting Internet use among their students.

In addition, the Benton Foundation of Washington, D.C., will announce it is creating a clearing house for governments, foundations, nonprofit organizations and private companies to get information on work being done in this effort.

"This will be a clearing house where people will share things that have worked and take advantage of information on what is going on," Daley said.

The Commerce Department last summer issued a report, "Falling Through the Net," which showed dramatic gains in the number of Americans who own computers and use the Internet but a wide disparity between groups.

The report found that about 47 percent of all whites own computers, but fewer than half as many blacks do. The report said that a child in a low-income white family is three times more likely to have Internet access as a child in a comparable black family and four times more likely than a Hispanic child.

Bring in the New Year with a BANG

Aggieville businesses sponsor millennium festivities, furnish private parties

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While people all over the world watch as Dick Clark rings in the new year in New York's Times Square, the city of Manhattan will be celebrating in its own little ways.

Although many K-Staters and community members still will be in San Diego for the Culligan Holiday Bowl, area merchants will be sure to ring in the New Year with style for those still in town.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said there are many events going on in Aggieville, yet not many people know about them, probably thanks to the recent announcement of the Holiday Bowl game.

"Some of the bars are having parties, and a lot of them haven't advertised it yet, and I'm sure it's because of the bowl game," Sieben said.

Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky Brewgrille, said Lucky's annual New Year's festivities are sure to draw a large crowd.

"We're doing a small semi-private party with a buffet and appetizers, and we'll be doing a champagne toast at midnight," Leetch said.

He said a disc jockey also will be present.

Leetch said Lucky's is offering a package for those who come in from out of town; through Lucky's and the Ramada Plaza Hotel, out-of-towners can get discounted rates at several area hotels and motels.

Leetch said several alumni already are planning to rock Aggieville on New Year's Eve.

"We have plenty of K-State students coming, but this year we're also having a group of about 100 graduates," Leetch said. "They're our old regulars, and that's why we put the package together. They just want to celebrate the millennium together, and that will be the fun part: hanging out with your old friends as you ring in the new millennium."

Leetch said the hotel and party package is being offered for $110 per person and $45 for the party only.

Bars in Aggieville aren't the only places that are preparing for the new year. Kent Dean, owner of Dean Liquor, said his establishment enjoys large increases in sales at this time of year for people planning their own personal get-togethers.

"We have a huge jump in sales around Christmas and New Year's," Dean said. "Last year was completely nuts, and this year we're expecting a big New Year's crowd."

Dean said he expects those enjoying their own parties will not go overboard on the drinking simply because this New Year's Eve will be a special one.

"I don't think that just because this is a new millennium, people will tend to be more hammered," he said.

However, those who do choose to include alcohol in their festivities tend to go all out, Dean said.

"This time of year, we generally sell more wines and champagnes," he said. "A lot of people are buying things that are nicer and of better quality to take to parties and to furnish for parties."

'The Sixth Sense' manifests to dominate summer movies

BY KEN WELLS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What a summer, huh?

Okay, so "The Phantom Menace" was neither all that nor a bag of chips, and "Eyes Wide Shut" wasn't quite the transcendental Kubrick we'd been clamoring for, but quite a few movies came out of nowhere to represent on the silver screen. "South Park" proved surprisingly superior to its small-screen counterpart, "The Blair Witch Project" was an innovative and daring low-budget success story and "The Sixth Sense" quietly walked up and dominated the post-"Menace" box office, and rightly so.

Movie Review

The Sixth Sense

At first glance, "Sixth Sense" reeks of "Mercury Rising," but hold your nose. There is no bodyguarding of a child protégé here. Bruce Willis plays a child psychologist come to the aid of a young boy named Cole (Haley Joel Osment, formerly Forrest Gump Jr.) who is particularly troubled. Of course, being inundated with advertising, you probably know: He sees dead people. Uh-oh, another horror movie à la "Blair Witch," right?

Nope.

Don't like scary movies? "Blair Witch" succeeded by relying on two things: a surface level of pure terror of the unknown, and in the broader sense a very relaxed, open-ended "screenwriting" project of letting actors wander and panic without assistance. "Sixth Sense" is not "scary" in the flat-out terror "Blair Witch" vein, but it is certainly "creepy," as the ghosts chill the room via their presence, and when you can see poor Cole's breath as he shivers in dread, well, that's completely removed from the bucking back-and-forth of poor Heather Donahue's handheld camcorder.

This is not a horror movie in the truest sense. There are only a few scenes of "gore," few shocks — it feels and plays out like a mystery more than anything else. While the initial mystery already is obvious (dead people), this movie has even more tricks up its sleeve, and they all play themselves out very well.

"Sixth Sense" derives its strength from this carefully crafted structure, as opposed to "Blair Witch's" openness. You will not appreciate or understand this, I think, until one complete viewing. Several moments in the film stand out as awkward or discontinuous for various reasons, and the film's resolution welds them together in such a way that one can't help but admire it.

The performances are (sigh) dead-on: Bruce Willis turns in quite possibly his best performance since (including?) "Moonlighting," nailing everything about Dr. Malcolm Crowe that we're supposed to notice and empathize with. It's not exaggerating to say that Haley Joel Osment is the core of this film, and it's all on his tiny shoulders if the audience buys into any of this supernatural claptrap. Osment sells it like a pro, giving a genuinely (sigh again) haunting performance and making this movie work.

The screenplay and directing both come courtesy M. Night Shyamalan, a relatively young and new filmmaker whose attention to detail make a good movie easily one of the year's best.

There's a lot of whispering about Oscar nominations surrounding this movie, and while Osment and Willis are potential nods, Shyamalan deserves serious attention by the Motion Picture Academy of America for his excellent work.

I have to say that I hate — HATE — giving five-star reviews. But this is a movie well worth it at full movie price, and at $1.75, it's well worth your time. Go. Even if you hate Bruce Willis or horror movies or whatever, just go. I can't remember a movie I enjoyed as much or on as many different levels as this one. Go on Friday, because you'll want to see it again on Saturday.

"The Sixth Sense" is being shown at 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday in the K-State Student Union's Forum Hall. The screening is sponsored by Union Program Council's Feature Films Committee.

Local artists drop prices to make work affordable

BY SARA MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From paintings and prints to basketry, blown glass and ceramics, the options are endless at the Manhattan Art Center's Wrap it Up holiday art sale and exhibit. More than 40 local artists have joined forces to display and sell their work to the public, at prices the public can afford.

"This is different from other exhibits," said Kathleen King, co-curator of the show. "If someone comes in and falls in love with a piece of art, they can buy it and take it home with them right then."

Wrap it Up, King explained, is geared toward people who are looking for a variety of items as inexpensive holiday gifts. People can come to the gallery at the art center and simply take the painting they wish to purchase off the wall, or pull off the pedestal the glass vase they have their eye on. Every time there is an empty space in the exhibit, another work by that artist goes up in its place.

"If someone came the first week and now comes back to look again, it's a completely different exhibit," King said. "It has surprised people how much it changed just in the first week."

Artists invited to participate were encouraged to submit their less expensive work so people who generally don't buy artwork can afford to do so at the exhibit.

"There's really art that's very affordable. The lowest-priced pieces are a dollar," said Susan Oviatt, curator of Wrap it Up, detailing the postcards, magnets and other curios that are on the less expensive end. In general, none of the art will be priced higher than $500.

Oviatt, who proposed the exhibit idea, was involved with a gallery in Salt Lake City, that did a similar show. She said the idea was greeted with much enthusiasm, since local artists don't have many exhibit outlets in the area.

■ The exhibit is in the Manhattan Art Center, Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Saturday and from 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday. The exhibit runs through Dec. 30.

CHELSEA SCHMIDT/COLLEGIAN

"There is just a lot of talent here. I see slide packets all the time and I'm just really impressed with the number of artists who don't have any place to exhibit their work," she said.

Oviatt also has several of her own watercolors for sale in the exhibit, and said it is nice for artists to be able to have their work visible to the community, instead of sitting in their studios.

"It's very rewarding to sell work, and more so to have people appreciate it and afford it. It feels good," Oviatt said.

She also said she encourages people not to be afraid about investing in artwork. She equates the purchase to buying a home appliance, but with art, she said, the person is making an even better investment in something they will truly enjoy for long time.

"It's something you'll look at perhaps for the rest of your life. It's much more lasting," she said. "It might seem like a luxury to some, and some can't live without it."

So far, King said the exhibit has been very successful in bringing in large numbers of people. About 150 pieces have been sold.

"It's going very well," King explained.

"We've had a really enthusiastic response. We've been selling steadily every single day since we've opened."

Soldier gets life with parole, apologizes to slaying victim's parents

BY JAMES PRICHARD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky. — An Army private convicted of bludgeoning a fellow soldier to death — a crime prosecutors blamed on his hatred of homosexuals — was sentenced Thursday to life but with the possibility of parole.

Pvt. Calvin N. Glover, 18, was found guilty of premeditated murder Wednesday in the beating death of Pfc. Barry Winchell. The guilty verdict carried a mandatory penalty of life in prison, but military jurors were asked to decide whether Glover would be eligible for parole.

Glover did not respond to the sentence announcement, which does not specify when he could be paroled. He also will receive a reduction in rank and a dishonorable discharge.

Winchell's family, however, called for the end of the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy for homosexuals.

"This has been a horrifying experience for our family. Words cannot begin to describe our pain over losing our son," said Pat Kutteles, Winchell's mother, reading a statement.

"'Don't ask, don't tell, don't pursue,' did not protect our son. ... It won't protect anyone else's child. This policy must end."

Post commander Maj. Gen. Robert Clark will review the trial and sentence. He can uphold or change the verdicts but can't increase the penalty.

Earlier Thursday, Glover apologized to Winchell's family.

"If I had acted as half the man, even half the soldier as Barry was, he'd be with us right now," Glover said, his voice cracking.

"I have to apologize to Barry's parents," he said. "I'm deeply sorry for the pain I've brought your family. This is something that I'll have to remember for the rest of my life."

Glover, who had been drinking before the July 5 attack in a Fort Campbell barracks, said he's a recovering alcoholic and that he had found God during his five months in jail.

Before the court-martial, Glover admitted to a lesser charge of unpremeditated murder in hopes of receiving a lighter sentence. But prosecutor Capt. Gregg Engler went ahead with the court-martial on a charge of premeditated murder.

When he offered his plea Tuesday, Glover sobbed and said he did not know why he hit Winchell at least two or three times with a bat as Winchell slept.

"I wasn't really mad at him, sir. It was just a mistake, sir. I was really drunk," Glover told the judge, Col. Gary J. Holland.

Glover of Sulphur, Okla., never addressed the allegation that he hated homosexuals.

The court also heard from Winchell's mother and stepfather, Wally Kutteles. They described their son as a loving, compassionate man who enjoyed the Army and looked forward to becoming a helicopter pilot.

A high school dropout, Glover got a graduate equivalency diploma, then asked his mother to declare him an adult at age 17 so he could enlist in 1998.

Defense attorneys argued that another soldier, Spc. Justin R. Fisher, 25, of Lincoln, Neb., who is charged as an accessory, goaded Glover into the attack.

Under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, gay members of the military can continue to serve — and their superiors cannot investigate and expel them — as long as they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

U.S. to expel Russian diplomat over State Department bug

BY GEORGE GEDDA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Russian diplomat was caught gathering information from the State Department with an eavesdropping device and ordered to leave the country after his repeated visits outside the building drew suspicion, officials said Thursday.

Investigators said the case underscores that the United States is still a desirable target for spying by the Russians and other nations.

The diplomat, who was arrested Wednesday on a bench outside the department headquarters, was declared unwelcome in the United States and ordered to leave within 10 days.

The State Department identified the diplomat as Stanislav Borisovich Gusev, and said he was detained for a period by the FBI. He first was identified as a second secretary, but the department said Thursday that he was an embassy attaché with diplomatic immunity.

Officials said he subsequently was turned over to the Russian Embassy after invoking diplomatic immunity.

"This episode should be a stark reminder to all of us in government that despite the thawing of tensions between competing nations, government facilities and personnel remain a desirable target for foreign intelligence services," Assistant Secretary of State David Carpenter told reporters.

FBI Assistant Director Neil Gallagher said this an important story of Russian intelligence activity within the United States.

"This is obviously a very serious breach," said Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder. "Certainly our relationship has changed with the Russians. ... Our relationship is not as adversarial as it was. But yet we can't leave our guard down. I mean, there are nations all around the world that are, for a variety of reasons, trying to gain access to information from us, and we just can't let our guard down."

Wednesday's arrest was the third espionage incident between Russia and the United States in recent weeks. Russia expelled a U.S. diplomat last week after accusing her of spying. Also last week, the Navy disclosed it had charged a petty officer with espionage for allegedly providing Russia with highly classified information about U.S. eavesdropping.

Gallagher and Carpenter said security officials this summer noticed the diplomat standing in the vicinity of the State Department, and it took them as odd. A surveillance operation increased their suspicion, as the diplomat routinely walked around the building and parked his car in a way that was a little bit unusual.

They carefully documented his activities and closed down the operation Wednesday, after establishing whether there was a technical penetration by the Russians.

The search was literally an attempt to find a needle in a haystack, and was carried out in a way that was designed not to compromise the investigation, Gallagher said.

The survey was performed with the help of sophisticated, sensitive, technical equipment and turned up what we believe to be a listening and transmittal device, he said.

He declined comment about the whereabouts of the device in the department but said it was extremely sophisticated and professionally introduced.

Gallagher said officials found the device several weeks ago but kept it in place during the inquiry to avoiding tipping off the diplomat. Security teams swept the department for other devices and were careful to make sure sensitive conversations didn't take place near the bug.

They said there was no record of Gusev entering the State Department, but did not indicate whether an accomplice was suspected of planting the bug. Though Gusev entered the United States in March, officials said they didn't know when the device was planted.

They said the it was not found in the offices of Secretary of State Madeleine Albright or other senior officials.

In Sharm el-Sheik, Egypt, Albright said Undersecretary Thomas Pickering summoned the Russian ambassador to his office Wednesday to protest the eavesdropping.

"Counterintelligence agents of the FBI and the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service have worked together and very closely to neutralize this intelligence-gathering effort, and I am very appreciative of the professional and effective efforts of these two agencies," Albright said.

Neither Albright nor officials in Washington gave indication of what secrets might have been compromised.

In Moscow, the Russian Foreign Ministry refused immediate comment on the detention. Boris Labusov, a spokesman for the Foreign Intelligence Service, said he, too, wouldn't comment on the case, but added that the accusations sounded far-fetched.

GRADUATION guide '99

Involvement, making friends important after graduation

STORY BY BRYAN SCRIBNER

Big cities, suburbs or small towns — it doesn't matter. Wherever graduates go, they should find friends and become involved in interest groups that will help them adjust to their new lifestyles, said Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services.

"It's important to not just have friends at work," Schuley said. "Students should follow their interests, allocations and should enter professional organizations where they can meet people."

Locating K-State graduates and alumni when moving to a new area is one way Schuley said students can adapt. She recommends that students consult an alumni directory and participate in "Catbacker" functions.

"The farther you go from Manhattan, the deeper the purple runs," Schuley said.

Another factor graduates should consider as they leave college is their financial position. Schuley, who works with engineering and architecture students, said students often take advantage of high salaries.

"People come back and say 'watch out,' because you can quickly spend your earnings," Schuley said.

David Butts, senior in mechanical engineering, plans to access his budget and expenses in order to invest his money properly.

"I plan to sit down and talk with my dad for a long time about my financial responsibilities," Butts said.

Schuley said students find it helpful to purchase a budget book, set up a budget using a computer software program or estimate expenses on a spreadsheet. She said there are many Internet resources available to help students calculate future debts.

In the workplace, Schuley said being the new person often is a difficult problem to overcome. She said listening, observing and finding a mentor all are important resources that will help students perform their jobs well.

Finding financial institutions that will fit students, needs might require a bit of research. Schuley said automated banking, location, monthly fees and Internet accessibility are all concerns, especially in large cities.

Students concerned with investing for the future can use the Internet as a resource. Schuley said many sites on the Internet do a good job of evaluating certain investment firms.

"Students should do their research and be cautious at first," Schuley said.

Ryan Frost, senior in chemical engineering, said his main financial concern is paying off his credit card bills. When these are paid, he said he will sit down and research investment funds.

"After I get settled down and find a place to live, I will start saving 10 percent of my earnings each year," Frost said. "I'll probably take advice from people my age who I will be working with."

Both Frost and Butts said the companies for which they will be working offer good benefits and 401K programs. Frost said he picked a good major that will help pay for all his expenses.

"I think one of the biggest challenges I faced in college was getting my chemical engineering degree," Frost said. "I'll be able to afford a steak every once in a while."

Choice of major affects post-graduation salary

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graduation marks the end of many students' college careers. And graduation means one thing — time to get a job and start paying off student loans. This, however, might be an easier task for some than for others.

According to the May 1999 Salary Surveys provided by K-State Career and Employment Services, the top-10 highest average starting salary offers are in the College of Engineering, with chemical engineering topping the list at $47,156. However, the highest reported salary offer was $62,000 for one computer-science graduate. The average salary offer for computer science ranked fourth overall on the survey at $43,046.

"Technical skills are really sought after," said Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services. "But that doesn't mean that we should all be engineers."

Students should enroll according to their own values and talents, Schuley said. Many of the freshmen this year decided to enroll in electrical engineering, which ranked third on the list at $44,564. She expects many of those students will discover it might not have been their best choice.

At the bottom of the list was one human-ecology general major with an offered salary of $12,000.

"You have to be careful, because that $12,000 offer is not representative of the college at all," Schuley said. "That was the only salary offer reported at the time, and she may have accepted another offer."

Schuley said the service industry is the market that is really hot. According to Job Outlook 2000, an annual publication measuring the hiring intentions of employers, service-sector employees anticipate increasing college hiring 17.5 percent, compared with a 6.1-percent projected increase in the manufacturing sector. Public accounting, financial services and consulting firms were projected as hiring the most graduates, with marketing, liberal arts or economics/finance following close behind in job opportunities.

"There are some hard realities students have to face," Schuley said. "The pay will vary for people that work with people, like working for a nonprofit agency. The pay is higher for people that work in manufacturing.

"You have to ask yourself if you do it for the money, or if you do it to help someone," she said. "You have to follow your values."

KSU Alumni Association provides graduates chance to stay connected

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A few December graduates probably are relieved to be leaving K-State behind forever. But most graduates are hoping to keep in contact with the university and the friends they've made.

The KSU Alumni Association offers discounted membership rates to recent graduates and offers an easy way to stay in touch with events and happenings on campus. The Alumni Association has more than 35,000 members.

"The main thing is that graduates can keep in touch with K-State and what's going on," said Karen Shafer, Alumni Association director of communications. "Some do it just to give back to K-State."

Shafer said many students become members right away after they graduate.

"We'd love for them to get joined up early so they maintain that connection to K-State right away," said John White, director of membership and marketing. "We want to have as many members as we can, because more numbers allow us to do more things."

Shafer said several colleges buy memberships for each of their graduates, and memberships are becoming popular graduation gifts from family members.

Members of the Alumni Association get together for functions throughout the year and all over the world. Shafer said there are about 50 K-State alumni clubs around the country and about 28 in Kansas. She said the clubs often get together for watch parties, and they also organize trips overseas. The Alumni Association keeps members up to date on the functions closest to them.

■ ON THE WEB
For more information about joining the Alumni Association, visit www.k-state.com.

Shafer said the membership offers more than the opportunity to stay connected with K-State. The membership includes a yearly calendar and a subscription to the K-Stater magazine, which keep alumni up to date with campus events. Members receive discounts at the K-State Union Bookstore, at the K-State Child Development Center during home football games and for Powercat Illustrated, a sports magazine.

Members receive access to all campus libraries, and they have access to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and the Natatorium for additional fees. They also can apply for credit cards, life and health insurance and telecommunications services offered through the Alumni Association.

Union offers graduates free meal, celebration

By JENNIFER KEHLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Student Union will have a commencement buffet Saturday, offering December graduates of K-State a free meal and the opportunity to celebrate with their families.

Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager of the Union, said the buffet, which takes place each December and May, offers students, families and friends a dining experience that is not only attractive and pleasant, but convenient as well.

"This is an opportunity for families and friends of graduates to come to Manhattan for graduation and not have to worry about making reservations and finding a place to go and eat," Snyder said.

Paul Stolle, director of dining services, said the commencement buffet is a chance for the Union to serve K-State students.

"The K-State Student Union wants to be a part of students' lives," Stolle said. "This is another service we can offer them while bringing their family into the picture as well."

For the first time, Stolle added, the Union will be offering a free meal to December graduates. While reservations are encouraged, they are not required for the buffet. Snyder said students wanting to eat for free must call ahead at 532-6580.

The buffet will take place from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the Union Ballroom, located on the second floor. The cost is $10.95 for adults and $4.95 for children ages 5 through 12.

With end now in sight, senior recalls memories of video games, friends

GUEST VIEWPOINT
Amy MARSH

Well, I made it. The endless hours of cramming after playing Dr. Mario all night the night before an exam, geometric note-taking — a.k.a. doodling in the margins during the sporadic moments of consciousness — and generally perfecting the art of procrastination are over.

Three-and-a-half years, gone so unbelievably fast.

First, there was freshman year and the K-State rite of passage, getting "weeded out" of engineering.

You know, no matter what your reason for leaving that program (Mine was simple: Calculus for the rest of my life = boring), you never will convince the powers that be that it is not merely because you couldn't cut the proverbial mustard.

That year also included braving the minefield affectionately referred to as "the Derb" and stockpiling laundry for a month until you could go home and do it for free. And let us not forget the multitude of greeting cards from the Parking Nazis, because let's face it, no one deserves to be forced to park in a lot so far away that it now is called "Z."

Then there was sophomore year. I am unable to discuss this period in any great detail as much of the time was passed in an alcoholic stupor.

I do seem to remember a large number of parties and only being awake in time for breakfast when my best friend and I were just coming home from the night before. In retrospect, I think that probably was my favorite year here.

Next came junior year and my first serious relationship. It was so serious that 9 1/2 months later — no, not that — bells were ringing and rings were zinging. Not much to say about that year except that most of it was spent in anticipation of my senior year ... well, senior semester.

Finally, the culmination of my hard work and dedication — graduation— despite wasting my first year, spacing out my second year and glossing over the remainder. Despite not-so-wonderful study habits and more interest in friends than school, here I am with a G.P.A. above 3.0 and about to be awarded a bachelor of science in criminology.

And I'm even a whole semester early.

As I head toward an illustrious career as a Russian spy (don't tell anyone, I might have to kill you later), I'll think back and remember all the laughing and crying.

Each month as I mail in my student loan repayment, I'll remember everything. Maybe I'll even miss it. As a Shakespearean lover once said, "Parting is such sweet sorrow."

Ahhh ... NOT! I'm outta here! Later, chumps! Peace.

Amy is a senior in criminology. You can e-mail her at amm3485@ksu.edu.

Tuition-rate hike to take effect in fall 2000

■ December regents vote yields $3.20 per-credit-hour increase.

By ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents passed a tuition increase that will go into effect in fall 2000.

This is the second tuition increase the board has approved within the past six months.

At the December regents meeting, the board unanimously voted to increase tuition $3.20 per credit hour at K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University.

This increase will be in addition to the 2.5-percent per-credit-hour increase the board passed in June for all six state universities.

Neither of these tuition increases includes the $1 per-credit-hour tuition increase that will go toward library funding.

Kim Wilcox, regents executive director, said the second tuition increase was passed after the state became increasingly aware of the budget shortfall it was facing, and the Legislature started the process of implementing a 1-percent budget cut for this year. The regents were concerned that the budget cut would continue into the next year.

"They raised tuition sufficient to generate the money that would be equivalent to the 1-percent budget cut," Wilcox said.

The decision to increase tuition was made so late because the regents didn't know about the budget cut until late in the fall 1999 semester, Wilcox said.

"It was important that we moved quickly, because so many decisions have to be made on campus," he said.

Wilcox said administrators and students needed to know of the increase quickly because it would affect financial aid decisions that would need to be made soon.

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate governmental relations chair, said his committee was concerned that the board made a hasty decision for such a large increase. He said the decision was made during finals week and the students had no warning that this was happening.

Before the proposal went to the regents to be voted on at the Dec. 16 meeting, the Budget and Tuition Development Committee voted on it Dec. 15, and it passed 9-2. The two against it were students.

"Students voted against it when they had the opportunity," Lenkner said.

One justification the board gave for raising tuition at the regents meeting was that K-State students pay less in terms of tuition than students at peer institutions — Colorado State, Iowa State, Oklahoma State, Oregon State and North Carolina State universities. Peer institutions have similar missions and similar responsibilities as K-State.

Even after the tuition increase, K-State students still will pay less than students at peer institutions, Wilcox said.

Lenkner said peer-institution comparisons are sometimes deceiving.

"We may pay less, but the state of Kansas offers a lot less financial aid," he said.

Lenkner said his committee is going to lobby for more grant programs and state financial scholarship programs to try to ensure the tuition increase doesn't deprive students of an education.

Although the Governmental Relations Committee was opposed to the tuition increase, Lenkner said he and his committee understood the logic behind the quick decision.

He said the committee is going to lobby the Legislature to keep the rest of the funding in place for things such as faculty salary increases because K-State is helping itself by paying higher tuition.

"Tuition increase is a done deal," Lenkner said. "It's not the best thing in the world, but we're going to try and make lemonade from the lemons we were dealt."

tuition hike

The scheduled increase in tuition for the next academic school year includes a $3.20 per-credit-hour raise approved in December, a 2.5-percent per-credit-hour increase approved in June and a $1 per-credit-hour increase for library funding.

Baseball player charged

■ Student to face charges of sexual battery, released early Wednesday on bond.

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

K-State baseball pitcher Brett M. Reid was dismissed from the team Wednesday due to pending criminal charges and violating team rules, assistant athletic director Jeff Steele said.

Reid is facing a preliminary hearing today for one of two sex crimes with which he is charged.

Today's hearing will address charges of aggravated sexual battery, which allegedly occurred Nov. 1.

He was arrested Tuesday on a warrant for a charge of attempted rape. The alleged incident occurred Oct. 2, Bernard Irvine, assistant county attorney, said. Reid was released on $5,000 bond early Wednesday morning.

Irvine said he did not know when Reid would be in court on the attempted rape charge.

Reid's attorney could not be reached for comment.

Reid was suspended last fall from team activities pending resolution of the Nov. 1 charges, Kent Brown, K-State sports information director, said.

Throughout last semester, he could not practice with the team, but he retained his scholarship and academic aid, Brown said.

"He was not a part of the team per se," Brown said.

Brown said that a few hours before Reid's dismissal, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics was trying to get to the bottom of the story concerning the charges and that the charges possibly could result in dismissal.

THE LONG HAUL

Tammy Okonek, freshman in animal science and industry, walks back to her residence hall room carrying her box of books from the K-State Union Bookstore. Okonek preordered her books for spring classes during fall finals week.

Dana Bailey, textbook buyer for the Union Bookstore, said about 750 students preordered books for the spring semester. The bookstore has been offering students the opportunity to preorder textbooks for about 10 years.

Varney's Book Store's textbook manager, Dan Walter, said about 1,500 students preordered textbooks for the spring semester. He said the number has doubled since spring 1996, when Varney's made preordering textbooks an option.

"It seems to be a real convenience for many students," he said.

A K-State student died after her Jeep slid off the road and overturned several times while driving home to Carl Junction, Mo., for winter break.

Kaitlin K. Nicholas, senior in public relations, was driving on U.S. Highway 71 in Nevada, Mo., Dec. 17 when the accident occurred. According to the Nevada police officer's statement, Nicholas slid off the roadway and struck a road sign. She was ejected from the car when it overturned into an embankment. Pepsi's choice of plastic bottles leads to recycling effort

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

Discovering the replacement of canned-cola machines with those containing bottles was not upsetting for Greg Eiselein, associate professor of English.

Even the price on the machines — $1 for a 20 oz. bottle — doesn't seem to faze Eiselein.

"A dollar does seem like a lot for bottled sugar water," he said. "It's massively overpriced, but there's nothing you can do."

This change to bottled-soda machines is a result of the exclusive contract K-State signed with PepsiCo Inc. in early November. The agreement between the university and Pepsi specifically stated that the majority of pop machines on campus would contain bottles, said Bill Wisdom, acting liaison between Vending Services and Pepsi.

The 16 remaining can machines on campus are located in areas where the machines are used less, as cans have a longer shelf life than bottles.

"Someday, we might put a list of the machine locations out for people that would prefer a can," Wisdom said.

One issue that has been addressed due to the change from aluminum cans to plastic bottles is that of recycling.

John Woods, director of facilities custodial services, said students returning from break still should take advantage of the recycling bins placed in high-profile areas around campus.

"Students should go ahead and put the plastic pop bottles in the bins marked for the aluminum cans," Woods said. "You can include your aluminum cans in the same bin along with the plastic bottles."

Woods said an important point to remember was that the plastic lids on the bottles should be removed before the bottles are placed in the designated bins, as they cannot be recycled.

"Make sure the beverage containers are empty and the tops are thrown in the trash," he said.

Pepsi will be taking the initiative to help with recycling efforts on campus, Jake Wassenberg, Pepsi representative, said. The family-owned franchise has enlisted the aid of the National Association for Plastic Container Recovery, a nonprofit organization based in Charlotte, N.C.

"We've got 50 bins coming that will be shipped on January 17, and we hope to have them put out on campus within the week," Wassenberg said.

A meeting of K-State's Recycling Committee on Jan. 21 will address Pepsi's plans for dealing with the excess plastic, Woods said. Another change resulting from Pepsi's appropriation of K-State's vending machines is the displacement of K-State's Vending Services' employees.

Wisdom said the division's seven employees were guaranteed positions with Pepsi through the contract.

"Three people went to work for Five Star, Pepsi's company that takes care of the snack machines on campus," he said.

Five Star Vending, located near the Manhattan Regional Airport, will stock and repair K-State's vending machines.

Vending Services employees who made the switch to Pepsi started work Jan. 4 and have made the transition easily, Wassenberg said.

"When we offered the Vending Services employees positions with us, we wanted to make sure they weren't taking a step down," he said.

Two more of the division's employees chose to move to the K-State Union Bookstore this semester, and one worker chose to leave the university altogether.

"I'm just trying to facilitate the transition from the old way to the new way — that's my main focus," Wisdom said.

Wassenberg said one concern that has been raised was the absence of a lemon-lime beverage on campus.

"All of the 20-ounce machines have nine

Wefald undergoes surgery, expects full recuperation

K-State President Jon Wefald is recovering at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for an undisclosed medical condition, Cheryl May, director of news services, said.

WEFALD

Wefald was admitted to the hospital Sunday for surgery, said John Fairman, assistant vice president of institutional advancement.

"It was a routine surgery for an internal problem he was experiencing," he said. "Nothing life-threatening."

Wefald should be released from the hospital within the next couple of days and, it is hoped, will be back to work within two weeks, Fairman said.

"I wouldn't be surprised to see him in and out of the office for a while," he said.

Until that time, he said Wefald needs rest to recuperate.

The family has requested no visitors, but cards and flowers are welcome and can be sent to the family's home.

Donors fund scholarships worth more than $200,000

Four new scholarships and one renewal were made possible by donors.

The Megan Elizabeth Taylor Memorial Scholarship in Modern Languages was made possible by Bill and Marilyn Taylor, of Overland Park, Kan.

The recipient of this scholarship will be a student majoring or minoring in Spanish, with preference given to female students. Faculty awards also will be given.

The couple donated $120,000 to the KSU Foundation in memory of their daughter, who died in a bicycle accident while touring Germany.

Doug Hill is a 1968 graduate of K-State and is the chief operating officer for Edward Jones, an investment firm in St. Louis.

The College of Business Administration received another gift of $50,000 from Jeffrey Gates of New York.

Gates graduated in 1984 from K-State with a degree in finance.

The Spirit Foundation of Westwood, Kan., has given $16,500 to the Foundation to establish 10 scholarship funds with 33 awards benefiting students in the colleges of Engineering, Business Administration, and Arts and Sciences.

Research suggests tall men reproduce more than short

If it seemed as if the tall guys got all the girls in high school, it wasn't your imagination. New research suggests taller men are more likely to marry and tend to have more children than short guys.

What's behind the phenomenon — whether women prefer taller men or those men are simply more outgoing — is up for debate. But the numbers clearly stack up against shorter guys.

Polish and British scientists studied the medical records of about 3,200 Polish men ages 25 to 60 and found that childless men were on average 1.2 inches shorter than men who had at least one child.

Bachelors were about an inch shorter on average than married men. That was true even after researchers took into account the fact that men's heights increased in recent decades because of better nutrition and health care.

The records, which were collected in Wroclaw, Poland, from 1983 to 1989, showed that tall men in their 20s, 30s and 40s all had more children than their shorter peers.

Height didn't seem to matter for men in their 50s. Robin I.M. Dunbar of the University of Liverpool said that is because those men came of age after World War II — a catastrophe that claimed the lives of many Polish men and reduced women's mating options.

However, Dunbar said the numbers clearly show that women favor taller men — something that other research suggests is true across all cultures.

"Basically, height is a proxy for other variables that women find desirable — men who can protect them, provide them with resources, have good social status and aren't easily dominated by other men," said Dunbar, a professor of evolutionary psychology and the study's co-author.

The findings were published in today's issue of the journal Nature.

Out of the military service records of 4,400 men, the researchers excluded men who were abnormally short or tall. The average height of the 3,200 men whose records were part of their final sample was 5 feet 6 inches.

The researchers meant to study men whose height and reproductive success were not so gargantuan, or so small, as to have skewed their results. Their methodology would have excluded someone like Wilt Chamberlain, the 7-foot-1-inch basketball star who bragged of sleeping with 20,000 women.

Mugger escapes with life after leap from 19th floor

NEW YORK — As if following a scriptwriter's cue, a mugger chased by police ran into an office building, jumped out of a 19th-floor window to the building next door, stole a delivery man's uniform and vanished through a busy lobby.

"Spiderman. That's what we call him," said Anthony McGrath, manager of the building where the suspect landed.

Police sparked the stunning chase when they responded to a report of a street robbery in midtown just before noon Tuesday.

Officers chased the suspect six blocks until he ran into an office building and jumped into an elevator. He arrived at the 19th floor a step ahead of police, who had to take another elevator.

The mugger, who is believed to have committed seven other knifepoint robberies and a stabbing since Saturday, darted through an office and jumped out an open window.

Witnesses thought he had plummeted to his death. But the nimble crook landed on an air conditioner unit on the 18th-floor setback of the adjacent building.

It was a 15-foot leap across and a 35-foot drop, McGrath said.

"The air conditioner is totally smashed to pieces," he said.

McGrath said the man went to a slightly opened window in a law office, climbed inside and dashed to an elevator.

There, he encountered a delivery man from Checkerboard Gourmet deli, took the delivery man's hat, shirt and apron by knifepoint and put them on in the elevator, police said.

He emerged in the lobby in his disguise and sauntered out of the building.

"I think the most incredible part is that there was a whole lobby full of police looking for him and he walked right out through them," McGrath said.

Graves wins Holiday Bowl bet

BY DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A dozen ears of corn. A basket of apples. At one time, even Kansas beef was part of the bet.

But this year, something different was chosen to represent the state school playing in a bowl game.

It was 8:30 a.m. Dec. 28 when Gov. Bill Graves decided to make the bet. His staff rang up that of Gov. Gary Locke's in Seattle.

Locke agreed to it, and the bet was on. The governor of the Culligan Holiday Bowl loser's state was required to buy his children's favorite books and donate them to the public school or library of the winner's choice.

"He was delighted to accept this challenge," said Barbara Dunn, Locke's deputy communications director. "In doing so, children were the ultimate winners in this game. It helps them get exposed to books."

Both governors have young children, and this has been the topic of their conversations whenever they have met.

GRAVES

"It's a unique friendly wager," Don Brown, Graves' press secretary, said. "It's a way to have some fun with his friend, who happens to be the governor in Seattle."

Locke is collecting the favorite books of his two children, a daughter who is almost 3 and a younger son.

Graves has a 4-year-old daughter, Katie, whom he dressed up in a miniature K-State cheerleading outfit for the bowl game. It was her first-ever football game, and Graves thought it only right that since she was affected by the bet, she was involved with the game, Brown said.

These bets aren't anything new. In the past, it's kind of been expected — it's a friendly wager between governors, Brown said.

In past years, Kansas has bet bread products made of Kansas wheat and gift boxes containing Kansas products.

Graves came up with the idea this year. After he made the bet, he flew out to San Diego with his family. Brown said the governor tries to make it a point to go to the bowl games.

"He commented that it was a little closer game than he anticipated," Brown said. "He was impressed with what has become a tradition with bowl games."

Although Locke wasn't able to go to the Holiday Bowl, Dunn said he watched the game with his family in Seattle.

"He would have liked to see our team win, but different games have different outcomes," Dunn said.

While Locke is busy collecting books, Graves still is weighing his options. Brown said that at the end of the month, a public school or library will receive the donation.

House proposes eliminating Board of Education

BY TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The end might be in sight for the Kansas Board of Education.

House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, with the support of House Education Chairman Ralph Tanner, R-Baldwin City, and House Education Ranking Member Henry Helgerson, D-Wichita, proposed that the Board of Education be eliminated. If passed, the amendment to the Kansas Constitution would replace the board with a secretary of education appointed by the governor to oversee Kansas public schools.

"Education is our biggest budget item," Jennison said. "I feel education needs to be on the governor's cabinet."

Under its present status, the board can operate however it wants without having to answer to anyone, he said. The governor has little effect. Under the proposed system, the people would have more influence. Education would gain more prominence in gubernatorial elections.

Jennison has attempted to change the system several times in the past, with no success. The board's decision to de-emphasize evolution in the school curriculum gave him an opportunity to try again.

"Education decisions should not be made in the political arena," he said. "The evolution decision has shown the board to be a very political entity."

The intent of the bill is to preserve, if not return, power in local school boards, he said. The board, which consists of 10 elected members, now makes public education decisions for 2.5 million Kansans, which is what he intends to change.

Because the change requires a constitutional amendment, it must pass with a two-thirds majority vote in both the House and the Senate. It then would be brought to vote before the public during elections in November.

"Getting support will be tough," Jennison said. "We first have to get people aware it and to help them understand the issue and what's going on."

House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said the board acts as a fourth branch of government, which was not the intent of the framers of the amendment in 1966.

An even-numbered board makes it easier for the members to reach an impasse, he said. An 11th member, appointed by the governor, would solve that problem. Glasscock said limiting the self-executing powers of the board is also a viable option. By limiting its powers, greater latitude would be allowed for the Legislature and the governor.

Joleen Hill, president of the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board, said the decisions of education should not be party politics.

"I'm very disappointed about the representation from our district," Hill said. "Those sitting on the board have responsibilities to the public, and they have not met our expectations. I find that most disconcerting."

Although she said she is not sure that Jennison's proposal is the best solution, Hill said she does believe something should be done about the state board of education.

Like Glasscock, Hill proposed that there be an odd number of members on the board. She also said she believes the elections of the board members should take place during the same time as local school board elections in April, not in November, which coincides with state elections.

Much of the controversy has risen from the evolution decision, she said.

"The recommendations of the experts were ignored," Hill said. "I find that suspect."

Hill said since the controversial decision, Kansas has earned the image of being backward. However, good things have resulted from the controversy.

"We now have increased awareness," she said. "It brings awareness to this body of people whose decisions affect a great number of people."

Wildcats look to strengthen future schedule

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although the football season is over, a whole new game is underway — the game of scheduling.

K-State is looking into the possibility of a 2001 and 2002 matchup with the University of Southern California, and then a later series starting the 2004 season with Michigan.

"There is dialogue with USC, and Coach (Bill) Snyder is taking that under advisement," said Associate Director of Intercollegiate Athletics Jim Epps. "I don't know when he will make a decision on that."

Despite becoming the butt of nearly every scheduling joke the past two seasons, K-State's pursuit of USC and Michigan isn't a direct response, Epps said.

"It wasn't a reaction to the criticism at all," Epps said. "In regards to the criticism, there are just some things you can't control."

Although Epps said nothing is finalized with USC, he said if the two-game contract did work out, it would be a home-home agreement with K-State traveling to Los Angeles in 2001, and then USC coming to Manhattan in 2002.

As far as Michigan is concerned, Epps said negotiations with Michigan have been off and on, and the issue remains up in the air.

Epps also said another matchup that was pursued by K-State was Notre Dame, but the history-rich program declined.

Epps said schools like USC and Michigan are intriguing, and he feels K-State fans would approve.

"There are certain teams that have a marquee quality about them, and USC is one of them," Epps said. "It think it could generate some excitement. It's certainly heightened, and I have a hunch that the fans would like it."

The Wildcats already are committed to play the Iowa Hawkeyes next season. The game will be part of the Eddie Robinson Classic to take place at Kansas City, Mo.'s Arrowhead Stadium on Aug. 26.

Tickets for the contest will be divided down the middle between the two schools. In the event that one of the respective institutions couldn't purchase all of the allotted amount, the other school would have the opportunity to buy the remaining tickets. Chiefs season-ticket holders will have the last opportunity to purchase tickets after K-State and Iowa purchase tickets.

K-State's largest criticism of late has been the less-than-stellar non-conference schedule they've boasted during the first two years of the ABC Sports Bowl Championship Series poll. The poll determines the two participants of the National Championship contest each year.

The BCS is the compilation of rankings from various computer polls. And one aspect that has had a significant effect on the composite BCS poll has been the strength of schedule — something in which K-State hasn't fared too well. This season, K-State's schedule toughness was ranked 63rd.

Terry Bowden, ABC Sports college football studio analyst, and Roy Kramer, BCS and Southeastern Conference commissioner, said in a teleconference when the polls were released that it was the intention of the BCS poll system to encourage coaches to make out-of-conference scheduling more difficult.

"A football program that looks at where they want to be at the end of the season, to be a contender for the No. 1 or 2 spot or the BCS rankings, they're going to take that into consideration two or three years ahead and schedule accordingly," Bowden said.

"I think what I would say is, it now at least has the awareness of coaches and athletic directors around the country depending on where they want to be with their program and what they want to have opportunities to do."

Kramer said the incentive for scheduling tougher opponents is having the chance to play for the whole bag of marbles if they win out.

"If you don't get there either as the one or two, you won't have the opportunity to play for the national championship," Kramer said. "That's obviously the incentive."

However, Snyder does not agree. He said earlier last season that he would do what is best for his program, and that is all that counts.

"I think that when I say this is based on a year-in, year-out deal, what I think is best for 1999 football team might not be the same for the 2000 team or the 2001, or the 1998, or 1997. So, it changes year-in and year-out."

Pepsi fails to show commitment to students

The joy of cola might wear off sooner than expected.

After assuming the role of K-State's sole soft-drink supplier on Jan. 1, Pepsi Cola has not made any overwhelming moves to endear itself to the K-State campus that it now monopolizes.

In fact, it has begun to prove that maybe we don't have the right one, baby.

One of the company's initial moves was to replace many of the 12-ounce can machines with 20-ounce bottle machines. This means that to have any soda at all, we must shell out $1 rather than only 55 cents.

While the advantages of cans vs. bottles are debatable, forcing bottles onto campus clearly is the wrong answer. Although the cost per ounce is very close, a $1 bottle costs slightly more.

While the cost increase is subtle, it is nothing more than a sneaky way for Pepsi to hike soda prices.

The only can machines remaining on campus are in low-traffic areas and in places that are difficult to maintain supplies of 20-ounce bottles.

Pepsi's contract with K-State called for at least half of the machines to be for bottles — and now only 16 can machines remain, all for the benefit of the distributor.

So far, Pepsi has done nothing to show its commitment to K-State. Thus far it has shown only a commitment to money, and is not making itself a welcome entity on the K-State campus.

▶ OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

If Pepsi intends to remain the choice of a new generation at K-State, it is time for it look at what is best for students, not only what is best for Pepsi.

NOW & Then

'New' millennium causes remembrance of popular 20th century practices

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

In continuance with the celebration of the new (or the approaching) millennium, I propose that we introduce a new calendar. I propose this since the calendar we now use, introduced by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582, had no year 0 and, thus, for the purist, the new millennium really starts with the year 2001. This also might be proposed because of the year 1997, since this whole business is supposed to be the 2000th anniversary of Jesus Christ's birth and biblical scholars tend to believe that he was born in the year 4 B.C. Now, you say, that would make the year 1996 the 2,000th anniversary, but you forget, there is no year 0 (Thinking about it, being that this calendar was introduced by a pope and is supposed to start with the year in which Jesus was born, this means that the use of this calendar by our government is in violation of the First Amendment, which separates church from state).

Thus, I propose that we introduce a new calendar. We can refer to it as the Daveian Calendar (it is my idea, of course), with the year 0 being July 4, 1776 (I figure this will be well received since Americans believe that our society is the alpha and the omega of all civilizations and after this calender is accepted here at home, we easily can impose it upon the rest of the world, either through our economic or military might). Or better yet, year 0 can fall on Oct. 19, 1963, the year I was born (it is my idea, of course ... Excuse me for a second while I contact the American Civil Liberties Union so I can start suing the government as soon as possible ... but I digress), or the year 2003 (since it's completely arbitrary when the new millennium starts).

Well, it looks like we've come a long way throughout these past 1,000 years. Anyway, have a happy new year and remember: this millennium is the first millennium of the rest of your life.

Millennium bug causes worldwide frenzy, proven unnecessary

We are living in a false millennium.

I say false because the millennium does not begin until 2001. However, I enjoyed the change from 1999 to 2000 and played along with everyone else.

New Year's Eve always has been a time when family and friends gather to celebrate the past and look to the future. This year, while celebrating the past, I fell victim to worry about the future.

I caught the Y2K bug.

My cupboard was full of canned goods and old milk containers washed out and filled with clean water. My husband graciously allowed me to spend extra money in our tight budget on food and other non-perishables I felt necessary to survive in the new millennium. He joked with me about my fears and more than once told me nothing would happen. When I questioned my friends, they seemed very calm about the impending destruction of the world at 12:01 a.m. Jan. 1.

New Year's Eve arrived, and we celebrated with friends and family. In all the excitement of the coming year, I rarely gave a thought to the bug eroding the lifestyle around me. In the end, when New Year's Day arrived and the power didn't go off, I assured myself I was in no way like the zealots who built bunkers and rented generators.

Or was I? Was I the object of a technological joke?

Recall the commercials that ran on the radio: "Don't be left in the cold, get your Y2K preparedness packs." The preparedness packs only cost $1,000. If the year had changed as the doomsdayers said, would all the money they made selling those preparedness packs be worth anything? The people who sold their homes and moved to North Dakota to live in a computer-free community must feel gullible. They invested so much money, time and effort and now have nothing but overanxious neighbors to show for it.

The average Joe was not the only one bitten by the infectious Y2K bug. First-tier governments like the United States and Great Britain poured billions of dollars into the accounts of computer experts who saved them from folly and anarchy. It is estimated that the cost to federal and state taxpayers in the United States could exceed $100 billion dollars. That would mean a $395 bill for each resident.

In Great Britain, the Y2K experts hired to get the country through the millennium still are at work. Their work now revolves around the upcoming leap year. If nothing happens Feb. 29, they receive a pat on the back and start working on the closing of the fiscal year in June. I am glad I am not a taxpaying citizen of Great Britain.

Closer to home, the State of Kansas Year 2000 Awareness Center warned Kansans to back up all their computer files. Resources were available to local governments and small business owners to help them become Y2K compliant. The center also encouraged residents to construct a contingency plan to deal with issues arising from a Y2K epidemic. The center's Web site offered reassurance that those in government were on our side and able to deal with the issues as they arose.

There only have been a few glitches in computer systems, but nothing to cause public concern.

Of 36 state governments surveyed by the White House on Jan. 3, 18 reported no glitches, small or otherwise. The other 18 states reported a wide range of small non-disruptive Y2K problems.

Nothing arose that made the billions spent worthwhile.

After I endured a few days of jokes, I dumped out the water I carefully and wisely had saved. I started looking for recipes that used the canned goods in my cupboard. I felt safe to drive knowing there would be no riot or looter to impede my journey. Life was back to normal — or so I thought.

When I checked KATS for my semester grades, I knew the bug was alive and kicking.

My grades were posted, and they were much higher than usual. The Y2K bug did not bring destruction or ruin as I had thought. The bug just managed to infiltrate and make me look a lot smarter than I am.

I will be careful, though. If I really did earn those grades, the bug could hit on the real millennium — New Year's Day 2001.

Wefald receives praise for salary-hike support

Editor,

The Leadership Council of the K-State Faculty Senate would like to express its appreciation to President Jon Wefald for his persistent dedication to the goal of raising faculty salaries.

The average faculty salary at K-State is 21.7-percent below that of the average at our peer institutions. Wefald understands the negative effect this has on the university's ability to fulfill its missions and achieve excellence.

The Kansas Board of Regents has endorsed a plan to raise faculty salaries to the average level of peer institutions. This goal was put in jeopardy by recent projected budget shortfalls and the state budget director's recommendations of no raises for faculty and a permanent cut in the higher education budget.

Working closely with local legislators, Wefald appealed to Gov. Bill Graves to ignore the budget director's recommendation and to fund higher education properly. We are pleased that the governor responded by recommending a 5.9-percent increase in faculty salaries next year and recommended no overall reduction in the university budget. We hope the legislature will follow Graves' recommendations.

The 5.9-percent salary increase is gratifying in a year when the state will be cutting its allocations in many areas. However, we cannot be satisfied with this, for it still will leave us far behind our peer institutions in salaries. Moreover, our university suffers because of its low level of state funding in the other operating expenses part of the budget. We know Wefald and others who understand the importance of higher education to our state will continue to work on behalf of university funding.

Graves promises to raise salaries

BY DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas Gov. Bill Graves proposed to fatten the wallets of K-State professors by raising faculty salaries by 5.9 percent next year.

It could be a difficult goal to attain because the state generated less money than expected to fulfill its financial obligations for this fiscal year. The governor recommended the increase in his budget recommendations released after his State of the State address Jan. 10.

K-State faculty salaries now lag behind those of faculties at peer institutions by about 21.7 percent. That percentage translates into an approximate $11,000 difference between K-State faculty salaries and those at peer institutions.

GRAVES

Even with the proposed increase, salaries will continue to lag. For that reason, Marion Gray, Faculty Senate president and professor of history at K-State, said he believes the faculty isn't satisfied, though they are pleased the governor recognizes the need for higher faculty salaries.

"We're the lowest paid in the Big 12 and among our peer institutions. The 5.9-percent increase will not close the gap," he said. "We still have a lot of work to do."

Although the governor's proposed increase will not close the gap, Travis Lenkner, Student Senate Governmental Relations chair, said he thinks the increase will be a step in the right direction.

He said one reason low faculty salaries has continued to be a problem is that some members of the Kansas legislature and Kansans don't understand the impact of low salaries on state schools.

"When people see a professor with a $60,000 salary, it's hard for them to see and believe their salaries are so much more behind," Lenkner said.

Gray said he agreed that legislators might not realize the importance of raising salaries.

"Sometimes people think faculty members just want more money for ourselves. But it's really for the university as a whole," he said. "When we don't pay as much as other states, we lose our best faculty, researchers and scientists. Students suffer when they leave."

Lenkner and Gray said they agree the increase is necessary, but for now it is only a proposal. For K-State faculty to get the raise, it must be approved by the Kansas Legislature. Gray said faculty leaders will visit the legislature next week to stress the salary increase's importance.

Lenkner said the governmental relations committee is planning to send students to the capitol to lobby for the same thing and other student concerns. He said he thinks the faculty raise has a good shot at passing.

"I'm confident we'll get the increase," Lenkner said. "In terms of closing the gap, it will help."

Provost James Coffman said he agreed.

"Given the study the legislature gave these issues in developing senate bills, I think they understand the problem," he said, "and we'll be able to get support in the future as well."

However, he said, the university still has a long way to go before faculty salaries can compete with the faculty salaries at other universities.

"There's still going to be a large gap to close between Kansas universities and their peers," Coffman said. "But it's a very significant step. We very much appreciate that Kansas universities are benefiting more than we might have in this current budget situation."

K-State well-prepared; Y2K problems avoided

■ Problems avoided with research, new software.

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One thing was apparent after the turn of the century.

K-State was Y2K compliant.

"Everyone is a little disappointed that nothing interesting happened, but when you go through all of the trouble to be prepared, nothing should happen," said Ann Kosch, technical adviser with Computing and Network Services.

She said K-State experienced small glitches, but they were self-contained and treated as normal problems.

"There was a lot of preparation," said Catherine Lindquist, user-support coordinator at Hale Library. "It felt like we spent more time on researching than fixing the actual problem."

She said that in order to prepare they had to research and identify what software packages they had and how to make them compliant with the new year.

"In December, we put the final patches on," Lindquist said. "We had one software problem that had problems, but it is still functioning."

The problem was in their help-desk software, she said, but because new software can cost anywhere between $2,000 and $20,000, the support group is trying to provide a solution using the current software.

"K-State had people on site and off site for the few hours before and after midnight in case something happened," Kosch said.

She said many people were on call for the turnover. K-State Police, who also were in contact with the county, the Division of Facilities and all information technology units, were on call in case of any problems.

"Everybody that needed to be was paying attention," Kosch said.

Fred Damkroger, director of K-State Telecommunications, said they have not encountered any problems.

"We had a procedure that we formed over the last two years," Damkroger said. "We either had the vendors of our areas of responsibility certify them or tested them ourselves."

K-State Telecommunications' areas of responsibility include telephone service, voice mail, cable television, hand-held radios, dial-in Internet accounts and a paging system.

He said actual testing took about 15 minutes and all tests went fine.

"So far, everything is OK. We're not scared anymore," Damkroger said.

John Streeter, director of information systems, said their transition into the new year went smoothly due to preventative measures.

"We fixed it in advance. ... We started reviewing all programs and working with vendors," Streeter said. "They fixed theirs, and we fixed ours."

About four years ago, the Office of Information Systems spent $30,000 to $40,000 on software that would have fewer transition problems.

"We spent some time on it, but not a lot of money," Streeter said.

He said there were some problems that could have occurred but were halted due to prevention.

"You can't go and buy software and use it for 20 or 100 years and not ever have problems," Streeter said.

Damkroger said he felt the university did a pretty good job.

"It's not that it didn't happen, it's that we were prepared," Damkroger said.

Manhattan hires commission to search for new city manager

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The hunt is on for Manhattan's new city manager.

Tuesday night, nearly two months after Gary Greer announced his resignation from the job, the Manhattan City Commission chose the group Paul A. Reaume Ltd., based in Lake Bluff, Ill., to help find a replacement.

In a memo to the commission, PAR President Paul A. Reaume outlined the extensive process the firm would follow to attract and screen applicants, advising city officials throughout the process.

From such a careful process, one applicant will emerge to run the city of Manhattan. Under a city-manager form of government such as Manhattan's, all levels of local government are answerable to the city manager. However, the manager serves under the direction of the five-member elected commission, which appoints and has the power to remove the city manager.

GREER

Commissioner Karen McCulloh said hiring PAR will cost the city about $12,000, which is several thousand dollars more than the offer from the League of Kansas Municipalities to perform a similar process. PAR was chosen, she said, because it offered more tasks, such as applicant background checks, and because of its previous experience with the city.

The search will be a slow process, Commissioner Bruce Snead said, but it is under better circumstances than the last search: Greer left for a position with Manhattan Steel and Pipe Supply Company, whereas when Snead came on the commission in April 1995, one of the group's first tasks was to replace fired City Manager Jim Pearson.

"It was a more arduous process because the city manager was fired and there was some anxiety in the community," he said.

Snead said the mood appears different in the city this time.

"People are wondering, but I don't sense any anxiety," he said.

In the meantime, McCulloh said commissioners each will look over the recruitment profile, a mix of job description and community information, over the week and return Tuesday to suggest revisions to PAR. The original profile was created for the 1995 search and should need very few changes, she said. Within two weeks, she said, the profile should be done and PAR can begin looking for candidates.

Snead said the city would be doing well to have the new city manager in position by July. McCulloh said she hopes a replacement can be selected within three to four months.

At least one candidate close to home is interested. Assistant City Manager Ron Fehr served as interim city manager in 1995 but didn't apply. He now is serving again as interim manager but plans to try for the permanent position.

Fehr said Greer's greatest contributions as city manager were establishing the corporate technology park, his work in the City Hall renovation and being at the leadership forefront for computerizing the city system.

The duties have changed very little, Fehr said, but the scope has increased.

"I think my greatest asset is having lived here for 17 years," Fehr said. "I tend to do a lot of listening to folks' input."

Fehr said he hasn't heard of any other city employees applying for the position so far.

Departments work to reduce number of students on waiting lists

By TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

Enrollment peaks at K-State each fall semester. And more and more students find themselves on endless waiting lists and not in the classrooms.

Enrollment numbers reached an all-time high of 20,620 last semester, which meant bad news for Sarah Gordinier, freshman in business administration.

"I'm having to wait for my core classes to open up," Gordinier said. "I wanted to take some of my electives later, but I have to take them now."

Gordinier had plans to save some of her elective classes for her junior and senior years to lighten the load of her later years in college. Her plans were foiled, though, when her requests for needed classes were denied. There was a 230-person waiting list for Accounting 231, Accounting for Business Operations. She will have to postpone business school for a semester.

"The classes are as large as we feel they can be while still providing a good education," said Stan Elsea, assistant dean of business administration. "It's not as big of a problem as students make it out to be. The people on the waiting lists that absolutely need the class to progress get contacted."

The department is discussing ways to increase seating and sections, Elsea said. In order to do that, it must hire more faculty. To hire more faculty, it must have more funds, which is up to the provost.

The dean is talking with the provost to increase funds and to figure out ways to help out, Elsea said.

There are a number of other factors that affect how many seats the department can provide, he said. Although available funds is a main reason, there is no single controlling factor.

"We've had problems of students on multiple waiting lists because they couldn't decide which section they wanted," Elsea said. "They are only tying up seating for other students."

One student had enrolled in five different sections of the same course, holding the seats for friends.

"This doesn't happen a lot, but it shouldn't happen at all," Elsea said. "If we stop abusing the system, it will help out a lot of people."

While many students might feel they have been cheated out of a class they needed, the university is making many efforts to increase availability of classes, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

"We've added several sections and seats, especially in the colleges of Arts and Sciences and Business, to accommodate the growth in enrollment," Bosco said. "K-State has done what they can to increase seating without decreasing the quality of education."

Enrollment for the fall 2000 semester is expected to be comparable to the fall 1999 semester, he said. However, many options still are available to students if they cannot get their requested classes.

"Students shouldn't overlook classes outside the 9:30-2:30 time frame," Bosco said. "They can continually check KATS for updates for additional seating, take evening classes, courses from Fort Riley, classes over the Internet and classes through Continuing Education."

As for Sarah Gordinier, she still plans to complete college in four years, even if it means taking summer classes.

"With the 29 hours I had coming in as a freshman, I planned on taking about 15 hours per semester," she said. "But I'm not so sure about that now."

Reno postpones deadline to return Cuban boy, directs complaints to federal court

Florida governor disagrees, says issue would be dealt with best in state court

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Brushing aside a Florida court ruling, Attorney General Janet Reno said Wednesday any challenge to the government's decision to return Elian Gonzalez to his Cuban father must come in federal court.

To give the 6-year-old boy's Florida relatives time to challenge the decision, Reno postponed the federal government's Friday deadline for turning him over for return to Cuba. But initial response from family lawyers appeared to spurn Reno's suggestion that they argue the case in federal court.

"We have a (Florida) court order that says the boy stays for now," Jose Garcia-Pedrosa, one of the family's attorneys, told WTVJ-TV in Miami. "We have a subpoena that requires him to appear in February. The boy isn't going anywhere."

"I think the attorney general should re-think her position very, very, very quickly," Garcia-Pedrosa said.

Reno did not give a new deadline or say what steps the federal government might take next to enforce its decision if the Florida relatives refuse to seek a federal court ruling. Federal officials have said they have no plans to send Immigration and Naturalization Service agents to seize the boy.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said the boy's future could be decided best in state court, and he said he was disappointed by Reno's decision.

"I just think it's not a cut-and-dried issue, and I think the tie should go to Elian, not Cuba," Bush said.

Sen. Connie Mack, R-Fla., said he was pleased the deadline had been pushed back. He said that when Congress returns in two weeks he would push for quick action on his bill to give Elian immediate U.S. citizenship.

Leaders of Cuban-American groups that have protested against returning the boy to Fidel Castro's Cuba doubted federal agents would try to take the boy but said other steps also could trigger more protests in Miami's streets.

"We trust that they will not do that," said Ramon Saul Sanchez, head of Democracy Movement. He called Reno's decision disappointing and said more protests will occur if the boy's great-uncle, who is seeking custody, doesn't get his day in court.

Another Miami protest leader, Jose Basulto, president of Brothers to the Rescue, said, "If there is no hearing, be prepared to see massive demonstrations. We are talking about a build-up of emotions, of years of political frustration having to do with the foreign policy of the U.S., especially with (President) Clinton. This child has become a symbol of many frustrations."

At the White House, spokesman Joe Lockhart said Reno has Clinton's backing in seeking to ensure the case goes through proper judicial channels.

Lockhart reiterated that Cuban officials have been told a nonimmigrant visa would be expedited for Elian's father should he wish to come to the United States to press his claim for custody.

Elian's mother, stepfather and others died when their boat capsized as they fled Cuba. He survived along with two adults.

Writing to lawyers for the Florida relatives, Reno said a Florida court's ruling Monday that the boy must remain in the United States until a March 6 hearing has no force or effect on the Immigration and Naturalization Service's decision in the case.

"The question of who may speak for a 6-year-old child in applying for admission or asylum is a matter of federal immigration law," Reno wrote.

The question of who speaks for the boy remains one of federal, not state, law.

Meanwhile, a Miami TV news crew filmed Elian on Tuesday as he made a comment about his sentiments while playing outside with a friend. But an airplane was passing overhead, and the boys words, spoken in Spanish, were in dispute.

It was unclear whether he said he wanted to stay in Miami or go home to Cuba. A family spokesman, Armando Gutierrez, said he didn't know what the boy said.

Lawyers for the family visited Reno here last week to press their argument that she overrule the INS decision. Weighing their arguments, Reno wrote, "I am not currently aware of any basis for reversing ... (that) decision."

Indeed, Reno added that the federal ruling "may be challenged, if at all, only in federal court. We are prepared to litigate in that forum."

Reno wrote that INS decided its Jan. 14 deadline for turning the boy over "should be extended to accommodate any federal court proceedings."

Finally, Reno appealed for a quick resolution.

"It is my strong hope that we can work together to resolve this child's status as soon as possible," she said.

Reno's position won support from David Abraham, a professor of immigration law at the University of Miami.

"Immigration law is an exclusive federal monopoly," Abraham said. "The judge had no authority to hear this case to begin with, apart from the fact that her ruling was entirely at odds with Florida law."

Cards to replace certificates, link Union

BY GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Electronic gift cards possibly will provide more purchasing power for K-State Student Union consumers.

"The Union has always had gift certificates," Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager, said.

"We saw the gift card as a way to link the entire Union together. The gift card makes it easier for us, the giver and the receiver."

With the numerous renovations taking place at the Union, gift certificates with an electronic gift card can now be used in various locations around the building.

One benefit of the card is that it can be used in 14 locations throughout the Union to purchase food, gifts, school supplies, Copy Center services, souvenirs and recreation activities such as bowling.

Snyder said purchases are subtracted from the original balance, allowing the purchaser to make multiple transactions in different areas.

Snyder said once a card's balance has expired it cannot be recharged.

Instead, the card will be resold to another customer.

Kay Farley, bookstore manager, said the gift card will be more beneficial than paper gift certificates of the past.

"Before, a gift certificate purchased in the bookstore had to be used in the bookstore," Farley said.

"Now, the recipient has the flexibility to use it in one of the 14 locations."

A $5 minimum is required for activation of the card.

Snyder said there is no maximum amount that can be placed on the card.

If the card is lost, though, Snyder said the remaining balance could be used by anyone who finds it.

"One of the most important benefits of the card is that a person can add any value to the card, instead of purchasing a certificate with a preset value," Don Becker, campus card manager, said.

The gift card is available for purchase in six different locations in the Union, including the Union Bookstore, Copy Center, the ID Center, Union Food Court, Cats' Den and the Union's recreation center.

"The gift card is great for people who are dificult to buy for," Farley said.

"A person can give a game of bowling in the recreation center, a sandwich in the food court or a K-State sweatshirt in the bookstore."

Registrar recommends quick schedule changes

BY GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the first week of classes, students are required to consult with instructors if they need to join a class, Registrar Don Foster said.

"The semester has already begun, so every day you wait, you are behind in your classes."

— Don Foster, registrar

Foster said that until Friday, students will be able to add classes on KATS or at Enrollment Services.

"There are a few classes that are filled across the university, but we are in good shape to make room for students who want to add classes," Foster said.

Foster said dropping classes is an option students can choose. Students are allowed to drop a class 25 days after the beginning of the semester without being subject to a withdrawal.

Once this time period has expired, students still may drop a class but are forced to accept a withdrawal on their transcript.

After the 10th week of classes, students no longer will have the opportunity to withdraw from a class, Foster said.

Associate Registrar Gunile DeVault said that when dropping classes, students need to keep in mind how it affects other areas.

"Dropping a class affects financial aid and a degree," DeVault said. "Students are responsible for checking and making sure it is the best thing to do. We encourage students to stick with the process and make a connection with their advisers."

Students also must be aware of the refund schedule that goes along with dropping classes, Foster said. In order to receive a full refund, a class must be dropped by Jan. 21.

For classes dropped between Jan. 24 and Jan. 28, the refund drops to 90 percent. Between Jan. 31 and Feb. 11, the refund is 50 percent, and beginning Feb. 14, no refund will be given for dropped classes.

"The quicker you finalize your schedule, the better," Foster said. "The semester has already begun, so every day you wait, you are behind in your classes."

If students are unable to pick up their financial-aid checks in the K-State Student Union at the beginning of the week, they will be available in the Cashier's Office in Anderson 212.

Jack Taylor, assistant director of services, said students should start thinking about financial aid for the fall semester.

"It is important that students start getting things in order, such as filling out the application and gathering tax information," Taylor said.

New Multicultural Student Honor Society recognizes scholastic achievements

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lakeisha Jackson did not believe her grades were good until she received a letter from the Multicultural Student Honor Society asking her to become a member.

"I think the organization is great, because people need to be recognized for doing something good once in a while," Jackson, senior in elementary education, said.

"It gives us something to look forward to and allows for multicultural students to receive the recognition we need."

Carla Jones, associate dean of student life and chairwoman of the honor society's advisory board, said the honor society was created in November to recognize black students at K-State for outstanding scholastic achievements.

Jones said the society is also a way to retain quality students at the university by giving them recognition for their hard work.

"It is important for students to be recognized for their hard work throughout their time here at the university," Jones said. "This is a way for them to receive acknowledgement that is important to them."

Jones said 182 students were eligible for the first induction into the organization.

However, only 65 students expressed interest and were inducted at its December meeting.

MORE INFO?
Contact Carla Jones, associate dean of student life, at 532-6432 for more information about the Multicultural Student Honor Society.

Students must have attended K-State for three semesters and have a cumulative grade point average of at least 3.0 to be eligible, Jones said. However, transfer students can be eligible if their K-State GPA is at least 3.0 after their first semester. The induction fee is $25.

"This society is looking at students who persist and continue to be successful," Jones said. "These are the students who demand success."

Katrina Lindsey, junior in mechanical engineering and society member, said the organization recognizes students for their achievements when other groups on campus have overlooked their hard work.

"I am privileged to have been inducted into the first class of this society," Lindsey said.

"I am one of the students who sometimes gets overlooked for the work I do, and this society gives more recognition to outstanding students."

Jones said the society has yet to establish a constitution or organize any activities.

During its first meeting, Jones said activities such as mentoring, reaching out to high school and middle school students and becoming involved in the community were discussed.

Jackson said mentoring to younger students will be a positive experience.

"By mentoring and helping high school students, we will be serving as role models," Jackson said.

"We will be showing them that they can get to college and do well."

Lindsey said the mentoring program, which will be targeted toward incoming freshmen, will show students that people they know can achieve their set goals.

"It is easier for someone to have and reach for a goal if they see someone actually living that goal," Lindsey said.

"Their goals and aspirations are more attainable if younger students can see someone there striving to accomplish these goals."

The society will have its first meeting of the semester Jan. 20.

Union Program Council sponsors free T-shirt tie-dye for students

BY CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Julie Peterson, her arms stuck in a bucket of blue dye, was bubbling with excitement Wednesday.

"I have a tie-dye T-shirt that I made when I was in the sixth grade that I wear to bed. It is so soft, but it is full of holes," Peterson, sophomore in architectural engineering, said. "I am so glad they did this. Now I have a tie-dye T-shirt to replace it."

About 400 people joined Peterson in making tie-dye T-shirts for free as part of a Union Program Council event Wednesday in the Union Courtyard.

"They are the artists. They get to decide what they will be," Aaron Sefton, UPC Outdoor Adventure Committee chairman and sophomore in music, said of the participants and their choices of styles for the shirts.

Besides creating a fun activity to welcome students back to campus, UPC members said they hoped to make students more aware of UPC's existence and activities.

Many students simply asked what UPC was about, said Matt Hupp, Promotions Committee chair and junior in management. The UPC members also handed out calendars of UPC events.

Kelly Stoker, sophomore in secondary education, said she stopped by the event and had never been involved with a UPC event before.

"I decided to do this for the fun of it. I haven't ever done it before," she said.

Paige Crowson, freshman in architectural engineering, was trying in vain to make purple for her shirt using blue and red dye. She stopped by the event as she was getting her ID made in the Union Courtyard.

"I really didn't know much about UPC," she said.

Heather Hall, junior in horticulture, was with some friends who had just stopped by the Union. She was just learning about UPC.

"I didn't know about them, but now I think they're real cool," she said.

Tim Yeaglin, UPC president and senior in management, said the tie-dye event was a relatively inexpensive activity.

The T-shirts were purchased through the K-State Union Bookstore at cost, and the dye was ordered over the Internet, he said.

UPC's next event is a ski trip to Snow Creek that leaves Friday.

Hornets guard killed in car accident Wednesday

BY PAUL NOWELL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Bobby Phills of the Charlotte Hornets was killed Wednesday when he wrecked his speeding Porsche after a morning practice at the team's arena, police said.

Witnesses said teammate David Wesley, driving another car at the scene, also might have been speeding, police spokesman Keith Bridges said.

Phills, a 30-year-old guard, had just left a shootaround at Charlotte Coliseum at about 11 a.m. when the three-vehicle accident happened, club spokesman Jonathan Supranowitz said.

Phills was traveling at a high rate of speed when his black Porsche collided with a car headed toward the arena, Bridges said. A minivan then rear-ended the other vehicle. Phills' car came to rest in an oncoming lane, and the team said he was killed instantly.

Two other people were taken to Presbyterian Hospital, where they were listed in stable condition.

Police identified them as Robert Woolard Jr., 31, of Cornelius, the driver of the car; and Yao Agbegbon, 33, of Charlotte, who was driving a minivan taxi.

Wesley, a Hornets' guard, was listed on the accident report and questioned at the scene, seated in a white Porsche. Bridges said he didn't know if that was Wesley's car but said it appeared he was driving fast.

The Hornets' game against the Chicago Bulls on Wednesday night was postponed.

"This is the ultimate tragedy, and our immediate thoughts and prayers are with his wife, Kendall, children and family," Hornets owner George Shinn said.

He and other club officials and teammates went to the crash scene.

"Not only was Bobby a tremendous person, but a great husband, father and role model that everyone respected and admired," Shinn said.

"He was someone that you would want your children to be like."

Phills, a 6-foot-5 defensive stopper and a team leader, was one of the Hornets' top reserves.

He joined the Hornets in 1997 after six years with Cleveland. He was in the third year of a seven-year, $33 million contract.

He averaged 10.9 points, 3.2 rebounds and 2.7 assists a game for his career at the end of last season.

He was fourth on the team in scoring this season.

One of the most active Hornets players in the community, Phills was a tireless volunteer for children's charities and related organizations.

"He touched all of our lives," said Bob Bass, the Hornets' executive vice president of basketball operations. "It's shocking."

Phills is survived by his wife, Kendall, and two children.

Phills attended Southern University, and his father, Bobby Phills, is dean of agriculture and home economics at Florida A&M University.

This was the second fatal traffic accident in the past nine months involving a professional athlete from North Carolina.

Carolina Hurricanes defenseman Steve Chiasson was killed in May after he lost control of his pickup truck in Raleigh. Tests showed he was legally drunk.

This was also the second serious traffic this season involving Hornets players.

In October, Eldridge Recasner of the Hornets was left with a broken shoulder and partially collapsed lung after an accident. Derrick Coleman, driving the sport utility vehicle in which Recasner was a passenger, was arrested on a drunken driving charge.

A female passenger was hurt in that collision with a tractor-trailer. Recasner remains on the injured list.

Union renovations to add dressing room, office space to bookstore

BY JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Increased space is expected to make books, supplies and other merchandise easier to purchase when the renovated K-State Union Bookstore reopens in February.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said workers expect the renovated Bookstore to make the move from its temporary location to its permanent location between Feb. 1 and Feb. 14. The renovation is part of the multi-million-dollar Union enhancement project scheduled to be completed in May.

The bookstore will carry the same products as before, with some additions. With about 3,000 to 4,000 square feet added to the original location, shopping will be much easier, Connaughton said.

"Product-wise, it will be similar to what we had before, only it will be presented differently," he said.

Bernard Pitts, Union director, said the extra square footage was created in three ways. He said a vending and storage area for the bookstore was moved to a warehouse off campus, a smaller dish-washing machine and dishwashing room were installed and the maintenance shop was relocated.

"We reclaimed space in the building in order to add space in the bookstore," he said.

Some of the many changes to the renovated Union Bookstore include a new entrance on the ground level, new carpet and a handicap-accessible elevator to the second-floor textbook area, Connaughton said.

The customer service counter at the bookstore also will be expanded, Pitts said. It still will offer its usual services such as balloons, key making, gift wrapping, ticket office and lost and found, but also will serve as the information center for the Union, where people can get information about campus.

A dressing room and more office space also were created, he said.

The Copy Center and the bookstore will work together to have course packets and syllabi available on the bookstore shelves, Carrie Mitchell, assistant book division manager, said. A window will connect the textbook area and the Copy Center, which students also can use to obtain their packets.

The bookstore will continue to have annexes in Seaton Hall and Hale Library at least until later this semester, Kay Farley, bookstore manager, said. The annexes, which carry a limited selection of paper, pencils and other general supplies, were created for students' convenience as the bookstore is being renovated.

"We feel that Seaton was very successful," Farley said.

Merchandise division manager Kathy Yates said it is uncertain whether the annexes could become permanent because planners have not had a full semester to evaluate the annexes' success and the need for them.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said many people are hoping the Hale annex in will become permanent.

"Until there is a decision, the current arrangement is sort of experimental," Hobrock said. "We are interested in maintaining it as a permanent fixture."

He said, the store isn't getting as much use as it should, because of limited publicity, but if it becomes permanent, there will be more effort to make students aware of it.

"I'm not sure if students really know it's there," he said.

Winter break allows Union to make changes

BY SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While students took time off from class during winter break, K-State Student Union construction changed the location of the Copy Center, ID Center and Commerce Bank.

The three offices now are located on the southeast end of the Union's first floor.

"It took us 4 1/2 years to plan this," Bernard Pitts, Union director, said. "Seeing it come out the way we wanted is exciting."

Carrie Mitchell, assistant book division manager, said the Copy Center now is equipped to do various types of binding. The addition of new computers, the ability to send documents over the campus server and IBM /Macintosh compatibility are among some of the other advantages.

"Students simply have to log on to the Copy Center's Web page and download the driver which will send pictures or documents to the Copy Center to be printed," Mitchell said. "Students may also bring documents on a disk to the center to be printed."

"It took us 4 1/2 years to plan this. Seeing it come out the way we wanted is exciting."
— Bernard Pitts, Union director

The K-State ID Center is located temporarily in the Union Courtyard. Campus card manager Don Becker said it will be open for business in its new location Tuesday.

Becker said he is excited about the new location. Before the project is complete, he said a few interior details must be addressed.

Commerce Bank has been in its new location for a week. Chad Ernzen, a part-time financial services representative, said it will offer the same services as before and will operate during the same business hours.

The bank will have its grand opening Jan. 24-26.

Reviewer hopes to offer eccentric perspective of movies shown in Manhattan

When the Collegian hired me to be a movie reviewer, I must admit I had to take a lot of guff.

What are the benefits to the Collegian of having a movie reviewer? After all, students can check out reviews from other reviewers, such as Roger Ebert, Tom Shales and Joel Siegel. Even local newspapers such as The Wichita Eagle and The Manhattan Mercury have art critics.

Moreover, what is the benefit of the Collegian having only one movie reviewer?

The answer to all these questions — perspective.

Not all movie reviewers think alike. The reason many newspapers have their own critic is because that person critiques with the perspective of the community being represented. That's a long, drawn-out way of me saying I'm from a Midwestern four-year university, and so are you.

Plus, by only having one movie reviewer, the Collegian presents a more-or-less uniform view of the movies being reviewed. As a reader, you will learn pretty quickly if you agree with my taste in movies. Such a luxury was not available when the Collegian ran movie reviews by different people at random times.

As a reader, if you choose to read my reviews, you will be able to read reviews for each movie knowing that I have seen every other movie that has played in Manhattan this semester. Although I will write reviews for each of these movies, the Collegian will not be able to run them all. You will be able to find all reviews at collegian.ksu.edu.

So, now that I've answered why the Collegian has a movie reviewer, the next obvious question arises — why me?

I do love movies, although that alone is not a qualification for reviewing them. I like to think that I can analyze many different aspects of movie — from acting to directing to sound to editing. I also like to think I can tell not only if I enjoy a movie, but also why I enjoyed that movie.

When I tell you what I think about a movie, I'm going to give it a thumbs up or thumbs down, none of that sissy ranking with stars or popcorn boxes. Sure, some of those movies I give thumbs up to will be mediocre compared to others with the same rating, but my job as a reviewer is to tell you whether you should see a movie, rather than to rank it with every other movie ever made.

I hope what I will accomplish will not be the reiteration of what you hear from other critics, but reviews with a unique and eccentric style. I hope I can sway you into seeing good movies you would not have seen regularly, and steer you away from bad movies that just had good trailers.

With luck, I will bring a perspective close to yours, but I hope that when you disagree, you will let me know.

'Stuart Little' offers good effects, poor acting

BY KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

moviereview

"Stuart Little"
Showing: Seth Childs Cinemas at 7:20, 9:20 p.m.
Starring: Geena Davis, voice of Michael J. Fox

When actors are cast into a movie with a fantasy-like theme, they must decide whether their character is going to accept the fantasy.

The actors in "Stuart Little" failed to do this before filming.

Hugh Laurie and Geena Davis play Mr. and Mrs. Little, parents who are looking to adopt a young boy. When they arrive at the orphanage, however, they are so taken aback by an outgoing mouse named Stuart (voiced by Michael J. Fox) that they decide to adopt him instead.

So, for the record, Laurie and Davis are supposed to accept the fantasy of a talking mouse.

Conflict arises in the movie when the family gets home and is greeted by the cat (voiced by Nathan Lane), who promptly tries to eat the new member of the family. Plus, the older brother, George, (Jonathan Lipnicki of "Jerry Maguire" fame) has a hard time believing his parents just adopted a mouse.

So, for the record, Lipnicki is not supposed to accept the fantasy of a talking mouse.

The movie has several cute scenes when Stuart gets into trouble in predictable mouse fashion, but overall the poor acting does the film in. Every role is so dry and unemotional the viewer never can tell if the characters are trying to decide if they believe in a talking mouse or if the actors are even interested in being in the movie. Laurie and Davis have so little chemistry the viewer does not even believe their characters actually are married, let alone that they have a natural-born son. Even Lipnicki, who did such a great job of stealing the show in "Jerry Maguire," seems less cute in this movie and doesn't carry any depth into the role. (Yeah, OK, he's 9 years old. But still, he doesn't add much to the movie.)

Without a doubt, the best acting in this movie is the computer-generated Stuart, who is voiced perfectly by Fox. The expressions on his face tell more about what is happening in the movie than any of the other characters. Considering Fox spent his entire time with the movie in a sound booth, his voice captures the paranoia and vulnerability of the little mouse extremely well.

The movie is worth seeing, and children especially will enjoy the action sequences and the message that, "It's not what you look like, it's what's on the inside that counts."

Plus, the movie really is an amazing work of technology. It's amazing just how realistic Stuart looks in his real-world environment. He casts shadows (and has shadows cast on him). He leaves indentations when he walks on soft ground. But while Stuart does such a great job of interacting with those around him, it seems the actors in the movie cannot do a good job of interacting with him, with the exception of a well-trained cat.

The biggest problem with the movie? Humans.

'The Talented Mr. Ripley' among best thrillers ever

BY KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

moviereview

"The Talented Mr. Ripley"
Showing: Seth Childs Cinema at 7:10, 10:05 p.m.
Starring: Matt Damon, Gwyenth Paltrow, Jude Law

Many would argue Anthony Minghella could not possibly have topped the acclaim he received after his direction of "The English Patient."

However, "The Talented Mr. Ripley" not only shows Minghella's stamina as a great director, but his breadth of abilities.

Minghella is able to create not only a dynamic story line (his own adaptation of Patricia Highsmith's novel), but is able to direct among the best set of actors this year.

Matt Damon plays Tom Ripley, who, after a case of mistaken identity, is sent to Europe to try to convince Casanova Dickie Greenleaf (played by Jude Law) to come back to America. But Ripley falls in love with the European lifestyle and when beckoned back, ends up killing Greenleaf and assuming his life.

The main three actors in this movie — Damon, Law and Gwyneth Paltrow (who plays Greenleaf's girlfriend) — fill the screen with a tension unlike any other movie this year. Each fits the bill so perfectly, and each shows a tremendous amount of growth as the movie progresses.

The talented Mr. Damon creates the performance of his life in this movie — far outshining his Oscar-nominated role in "Good Will Hunting." In a role that requires impersonating the performances of other actors, Damon shows a tremendous amount of depth and, well, talent.

Both Ripley and Greenleaf are disturbingly compelling characters — the viewer both hates and pities them. And characters so disturbingly created are performed as such.

In fact, anyone who watches this movie is unsure who to root for. In one sense, Ripley is likable, almost innocent in his intentions. Then the movie makes him incredibly dark and despicable, and viewers have trouble deciding whether they want him to be caught for his crimes.

The entire movie is as unsettling. Few of the characters are completely likable, including Paltrow's character, who is probably the biggest victim in the movie.

Paltrow herself is terrific as the warm, compassionate girlfriend at the beginning of the movie, but the viewer begins to turn on the character as she becomes suspicious of Ripley, including an extremely powerful and well-acted confrontation scene when Paltrow's character finds Greenleaf's rings in Ripley's possession.

If the movie has a flaw, it is the length. It feels longer than the actual 2 1/2 hours, largely because of the amount of details, as well as the attention to those details, the movie affords.

However, the movie is a definite for Oscar contention and easily is one of 1999's 10 best movies.

New restaurant offers fine dining, student discount since setting up shop in Aggieville

STORY BY ERIN SCHNEWEIS

LEFT: Santa Fe's chicken is offered on the Earth menu at lunchtime for $6.50. The grilled chicken breast is topped with chipolte red pepper spread, avocado, tomato and jack cheese. The chicken is served sandwich style on a house-made bun with grilled red-chili polenta and a pappardella of squash.

TOP: Both lunch and dinner menus feature the spring salad for $4.50 and a small serving for $2.50. The house salad is a mix of greens, tomato, mushroom, green onion, carrot and red bell pepper.

RIGHT: Bliss, a dessert, is served on two Elements of Taste menus and costs $3.25. The dessert is a slice of triple-layer cinnamon chocolate cake topped with chocolate glaze and served with vanilla ice cream.

Where there is conversation, carefully selected music and well-prepared food, there is Elements of Taste.

The 10-percent student discount doesn't hurt, either.

Jennifer Irsik is manager and owner of Elements of Taste, 1131 Moro St. The restaurant is located in the former Eclipse Brewhouse and opened for business on New Year's Eve. The location is the same, but the style and decoration are completely different.

"The only thing original from the Eclipse is the ceiling and floor," she said.

Location wasn't a problem for her to consider.

"What's better than Aggieville?" Irsik said. "If you had a place to chose in Manhattan, this is it."

Cheryl Sieben, director of Aggieville Business Association, said the restaurant adds variety to the district.

"We are delighted to have another new restaurant that offers a different venue," Sieben said. "I think it helps round out the kind of dining we have in Aggieville."

Elements of Taste is open from 11 a.m. to 2 a.m., similar to most Aggieville establishments. Food is served until 9:30 p.m.

Irsik eventually plans to stay open until 4 a.m., when she will offer a late-night menu.

Even though Elements of Taste is in Aggieville, there are some things that set it apart from the other area restaurants. Irsik said the atmosphere and the food offer something new.

"It's more of a fine-dining experience," she said. "The waiters go through hours of training because there are so many steps involved."

Sherry Irsik, Jennifer Irsik's mother, helps her daughter by doing everything from keeping books to washing dishes.

Jennifer Irsik describes the food as American Regional, but she said it was hard to characterize her restaurant under one description. Specialities include steaks, martinis and an extended wine selection.

The menu also has different selections for lunch, dinner, dessert and children's fare. The staff is working on an afternoon menu that will be served from 2 to 4 p.m.

Utley Bush, K-State academic adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences, said word of mouth is why he decided to dine there.

"One of my colleagues went here a few nights ago and said it was pretty good, so I decided to check it out," he said.

Bush said he was impressed with the atmosphere and the service.

"It's pretty trendy," he said. "It reminds me of a restaurant that I went to in Philadelphia."

Owning and managing her own restaurant had been Jennifer Irsik's dream since she saw her parents cater events and parties as a child.

"When I was a kid, I'd imagine doing it, but I never thought I would," she said. "It's been a dream for a long time."

After graduating from high school, she attended Garden City Community College and then came to K-State. She then decided to go to culinary school in Denver. This gave her the means to make her childhood dream a reality.

Aside from her degree at the culinary school, there was a large amount of time, work and planning that went into Elements of Taste.

It took two years of work, hours of thought, lots of money and lots of patience, Jennifer Irsik said. She said she is determined to keep her customers safe and satisfied.

After 9 p.m., only those 21 years old and older are allowed in the restaurant, unless accompanied by a parent. Sherry Irsik said they have a Bisage, a scanner that is used for checking identification for age and legality, that makes it impossible for minors to enter the business after hours.

Even though Jennifer Irsik has reached her goal of owning her own restaurant, there are other goals that she has set for herself.

"My goal is to bring up the standard of dining in Manhattan," she said. "There is no reason why we shouldn't bring it up a little bit."

Sherry Irsik said she wants everyone who enters the restaurant to be pleased with their dining experience.

"Our goal is for everyone that walks out the door to be satisfied," she said.

Elements of Taste waitress Dawn Gilson, freshman in psychology, takes an order from customers Tuesday. The new Aggieville restaurant requires servers to go through extensive training before their first day of work.

Appearance, content of arts and entertainment page to change

I considered taking the crossword puzzle from the arts and entertainment page. Then I decided that in my first semester as a desk editor I did not want to be hunted down by the students in biology lecture who use the crossword as an alternative to No-Doz.

As arts and entertainment editor for the semester, I have adjusted the content of the page in a way I hope will serve Collegian readers better. Some elements of the page will remain the same.

Each day the crossword is there for you. Above the fold.

"The Gongfarmers" will continue to run each day, as will "Dilbert."

Aside from these consistencies, almost anything is fair game. I will continue to run the page with a theme to coordinate with the days of the week.

Each Monday the focus will be on reviews of movies, compact disks and an occasional book or two. One movie reviewer, Kelly Furnas, will write as many of the reviews as humanly possible. The idea is to keep the voice of all reviews consistent.

Tuesday will feature stories related to health, fitness and sex. Each week a health question will be answered by a professional in the field.

The Wednesday page is when confusion might begin. It is intended to be the catch-all page. The page will cover events at museums, live theaters, gardens and things that fit nowhere else.

Every other Wednesday, beginning Jan. 26, a separate page will be added featuring a city or town and the surrounding area. The page will be known as Kansas Road Trip and will provide information on tourist attractions, a restaurant and place to spend the night in and around the area.

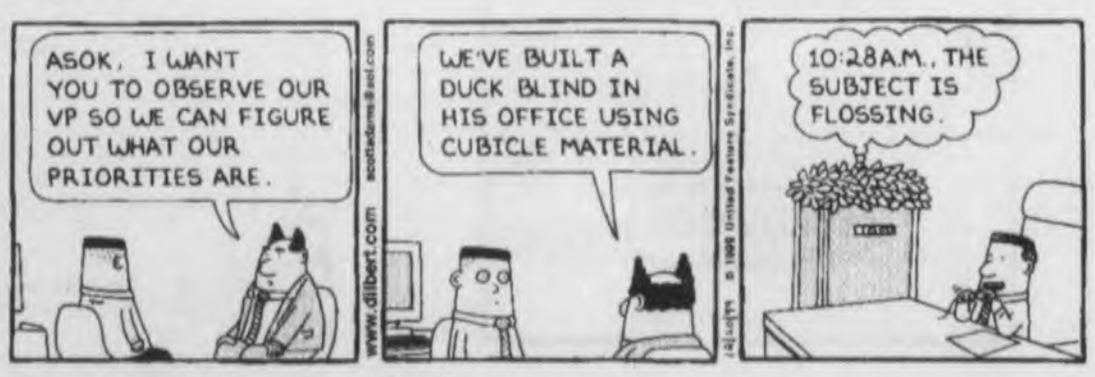
As indicated by the "Food & Drink" heading, Thursday pages will bring none other than stories related to the topic of food and drink. Each week a different bartender from the area will be showcased as the mix master. They will provide the ingredients to one mixed drink they have created or are experienced in making.

Friday will continue to feature stories of events to liven up one's weekend. Many of the events will be covered at least one week in advance, giving time for readers to purchase tickets and make plans.

To bring more diversity to the page, I have decided to cover more events from Topeka to Kansas City to Wichita and beyond.

Writers from the arts and entertainment desk also will cover events and issues in the way of faith and values, money and other areas that might not be covered on other desks.

These stories will appear on pages other than the daily page set aside strictly for arts and entertainment.



As arts and entertainment editor, it is my goal to provide the best, most accurate coverage of events from the area. If at anytime there are questions, concerns or suggestions, I hope they will be directed to me at arts@spub.ksu.edu.

selections, and we're finding out from faculty that one of those should be some sort of lemon-lime drink," he said.

Slice, Pepsi's lemon-lime drink, possibly will be placed in campus machines by the end of the month, Wassenberg said.

Now that Coca-Cola has disappeared from the campus, concerns over the absence of juice products can be laid to rest.

Besides the addition of Fruit Works, a type of fruit drink produced by PepsiCo, Ocean Spray juices will take over the spot left by Coke's Minute Maid.

Wisdom said no significant changes with the snack machines would occur.

"The biggest, most obvious change is that this campus has a lot of brand new Pepsi Cola, Mountain Dew, Aquafina, Fruit Works-fronted machines," he said.

Wassenberg said he was excited to see how those visiting the campus would react to the new machines when classes resume today.

"I'm going to go on-route on campus, so we'll see what kind of feedback we get," he said.

Friends remember her as an independent, outgoing girl.

"Even if it was just her and you, she would always make you have a great time," Beth Sell, junior in finance, said.

She said Nicholas was planning to go to law school, something she always had wanted to do. Nicholas also was involved with children, teaching them gymnastics.

Marie Jensen, junior in social sciences, went to the hospital after the accident and learned that Nicholas had not been wearing her seat belt.

"That's something I'm really big on now. Whenever someone leaves, I make them wear their seat belt," Jensen said.

She said Nicholas had an off-the-wall personality and never held anything back.

Sell said she agreed.

"She was a very independent girl who had her opinion, and it did not matter what you would think," Sell said. "She would love to friendly debate your opinion with her. She didn't care what people thought of her."

Nicholas' parents could not be reached for comment.

Phone records show link between alleged terrorists

The court documents filed in advance of a bail hearing for Lucia Garofalo, prosecutors claimed they had found more evidence of her activities in an Algerian terrorist organization.

BY WILSON RING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BURLINGTON, Vt. — Prosecutors said Wednesday that a Canadian woman arrested at a remote Vermont border crossing last month telephoned associates of a suspected terrorist arrested in Washington state days earlier.

In court documents filed in advance of a bail hearing for Lucia Garofalo, prosecutors claimed they had found more evidence of her activities in an Algerian terrorist organization.

"Telephone toll records establish an additional recent link between Garofalo and associates of Ahmed Ressam," the prosecutors said, referring to the Algerian man arrested with explosives in Washington state.

They also for the first time drew links between Garofalo and Abdel Ghani, a man arrested in New York last month on charges that he was involved in a possible bomb plot in the Seattle area.

Today's hearing was called by the federal magistrate, who had said last week he needed more direct evidence to terrorist ties to continue to detain Garofalo without bail. She is charged only with insignificant immigration violations, and attorney Maryanne Kampmann had said last week that she could prove false many of the allegations made against Garofalo.

The alleged telephone links are circuitous, prosecutors said. But they alleged that was how the terrorist organization Armed Islamic Group, known by its French initials GIA, operated.

"It is not surprising that there is a chain of calls between the participants as is disclosed in the complaint against Ghani," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kirby wrote.

There were a series of telephone calls between people who have ties to Ressam and Garofalo last month around the time of both her arrest and Ressam's, Kirby said in court documents.

"The timing of the link is remarkable in that it occurs during the December period when the defendant and Ressam were committing their crimes," Kirby wrote.

The alleged links are through a man named Raja Aslam, who had telephone numbers on New York's Long Island, prosecutors said.

Garofalo allegedly had the telephone number registered to Aslam in her pocket when she was arrested at Beecher Falls, Vt., on Dec. 19.

"Records show that on Dec. 14, 1999, the date Ressam tried to bring explosives into the United States, Garofalo called this cell phone," according to court records.

Additional calls were placed from a number assigned to Aslam to one that prosecutors said was assigned to Ghani and to another cell phone. Prosecutors did not explain the significance of the additional cell phone but said it was involved repeatedly in communications among the players.

"Records disclose that over the period Dec. 11 to 19, this latter telephone called a number belonging to Abdel Ghani more than 20 times, including six times on Dec. 19, the day that Garofalo was arrested," Kirby wrote.

Other telephone records showed contacts between a cell phone belonging to Aslam to a cell phone "somewhere in Vermont during the early morning hours of Dec. 15, 1999."

Prosecutors have alleged that Garofalo was turned back on that date when she tried to cross the border at Pittsburg, N.H. They allege that she later crossed the border successfully, but illegally, without detection.

She was then arrested in a third attempt at crossing Dec. 19. At that time, authorities said, she was accompanied by another man, Bouabide Chamchi, a 20-year-old Algerian national who also faces immigration charges.

The arrests had stirred fears of terrorist attacks, perhaps timed to New Year's Eve. Ressam had a one-night reservation at a motel near Seattle's Space Needle, and the fears resulting from that link were cited as one reason for the cancellation of the New Year's bash there.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team jumped out to an early lead Wednesday — and stayed on top.

The Cats defeated Baylor 73-58.

K-State used stifling defense and 56.7-percent shooting from the field to put away Baylor early in the first half.

The Cats' defense held Baylor to just 28.7-percent shooting in the first half, and K-State was led offensively by guard Kim Woodlee's three treys. Woodlee said it was important for her to play well against Baylor.

"I felt a lot better. The shots just didn't fall against KU," Woodlee said. "It felt a lot better with a win. I struggled a little mentally after KU, because I felt I got a lot of good looks."

As a team, the Cats went on a 10 minute, 30-6 scoring run. The run gave K-State a commanding 19-point lead with five minutes left in the first half.

K-State also took advantage of Baylor's youth in the post positions with the absence of leading scorer Danielle Crockrom. K-State's top-two post players were able to capitalize on Baylor's youth. Forward Nicky Ramage scored 17 points and center Angie Finkes, who entered the game averaging 20 points and 8.5 rebounds in her career against Baylor, scored 20 points and grabbed 10 rebounds.

"I thought it was critical to get our posts involved in the game early, "K-State head coach Deb Patterson said. "Both Angie Finkes and Nicky Ramage, stepping up and wanting to be a presence early in the game, turned the game for us. I thought that it was critical for them to establish themselves and exploit the younger Baylor post players."

Ramage also gave credit to K-State's guards for the posts' domination.

"We also got some great passes from our guards," Ramage said.

Patterson said she was pleased with her team's defensive effort.

"I was very pleased with our defense aside from addressing the fact that Stasha Richards had gotten hot, and we had talked about her before the game," Patterson said. "I also thought we rebounded well defensively, but not at the level we need to.

"But all in all, to hold a team to 23 points in this league at half, you've got to feel good," she said.

K-State entered halftime leading 41-23. The Cats were able to maintain their first-half lead in the second half but played sloppily, turning the ball over 12 times and allowing Richards to score 14 points.

"In the second half, we got complacent because we were ahead," Finkes said. "We got a little too soft. We know any team can come back."

K-State's difficulties with its guard play in the second half partially can be attributed to the loss of senior guard Jenny Coalson. Coalson is recovering from a strained hip flexor and will not be back for at least three weeks, Patterson said.

"She was our best perimeter defender, our most experienced guard, and she could rebound for us," Patterson said. "In losing Jenny, you lost that different dimension on the perimeter — that different sort of a guard. It's put greater pressure on players and exploited some of their weaknesses."

K-State's success against Baylor was important to the team's psyche after its Saturday loss to Kansas, a team the Cats felt they could have beaten, Patterson said.

The team's Big 12 Conference schedule picks up from here as it hits the road to play Texas A&M.

"Going to A&M two years ago, we went there, and we couldn't get it done," Patterson said. "That's the year we were extremely successful."

Baylor's leading scorer disciplined

Baylor was playing at a disadvantage before the game Wednesday. The team was playing without Danielle Crockrom, who didn't make the trip because of disciplinary reasons. Crockrom had been the Bears' leading scorer with 12.4 points per game, and she is averaging 9.1 rebounds and 2.2 steals per game.

After the game, Baylor head coach Sonja Hogg said she was glad the team never stopped playing.

"We got out to kind of a quick start and went ahead of them and then got behind, and it would have been real easy for our girls to fold their tent," Hogg said. "But they never did."

Climbing the ladder

Lately, every time senior center Angie Finkes scores, it's a milestone. Her last field goal of the game Wednesday tied her for 12th place in women's basketball history with 1,165 points.

Finkes said that after the game she cared more about the victory than her personal record.

"It was important for this team to have a game like this after Saturday," Finkes said.

Hot from downtown

The Cats were red hot from behind the three-point line against Baylor. K-State as a team shot 62.5 percent from behind the three-point line in the first half. Guard Kim Woodlee continued to push toward the all-time school record by hitting four of seven three-pointers and now needs seven three-pointers to capture the record.

Thinking ahead

K-State, after picking up its first Big 12 Conference victory, hits the road this weekend. The team plays Texas A&M at 2 p.m. Saturday in College Station, Texas.

Wildcat Notebook, extended coverage introduce variety

NICK BRATKOVIC

Dear readers,

Welcome to the spring 2000 Kansas State Collegian Sports page. As you read this column, you will notice several changes. The staff has added a Wildcat Notebook to its game coverage.

In looking at the page, you will see it is an experiment we hope works and we hope you enjoy.

Other plans include coverage of upcoming events, looking at them in depth.

We also want to cover intramural sports. So many of you reading this page compete in intramural sports and take pride in what you do. The sports staff is going to try to cover you in some capacity. We can't dispatch a reporter to every game, but we will see what we can do.

As you read the paper today, you will notice that most of our stories concern the big sports — football and men's and women's basketball. Those are the sports the Collegian traditionally has covered strongly, but to those of you enthralled by the lesser-known sports, help is on the way.

Our plan is to bring the different sports like rowing and cross country to life. A lot of people are familiar with the concept of rowing, but few understand the life of a rower or what drives a cross country runner. The reason for this is difficult to say, but it might have to do with the fact that 50,000 K-State fans don't attend cross country meets. The passion for the sport simply isn't felt on a broad-enough basis.

However, our goal is to give great coverage to these different sports.

Off the field, we are going to cover the comings and goings of Wildcat athletics.

Covering sports is often a complicated business.

There are a thousand different stories and responsibilities away from the game to cover. When a player is on the field, for the great ones, nothing else matters. Those are some of their greatest moments, because they are not thinking, but simply enjoying performing.

When an athlete is in the heat of battle on the field, items are irrelevant. That is when sports are in their purest form.

In a dictionary dedicated to sports, a sport is defined as a recreational activity that involves a degree of physical exertion or which requires skill in the playing of an object for scoring.

I wish it were that simple, because games were meant to be played on courts and not in some courtroom or office. A game is supposed to be played for recreation. A sports writer's job used to be about overlooking a program's or an athlete's flaws. Today it is a reporter's job to expose them.

A beat writer covering an athlete in the 1930s probably was not as concerned with an athlete's off-the-field activities — things like alcohol abuse, contract negotiations and recruiting.

Stuff that, when sports were truly games and not big business, never really mattered. It never mattered what Babe Ruth did off the field, as long as he hit home runs.

It is hard to say whether that is true today, when sports have become big business and the pressure to win is at a premium. Today when an athlete's life outside the lines is reported on, those thoughts often end when the game starts.

A purist would say don't cover the dirt, don't worry about whether an athlete took a car or if John Rocker has thoughts sensitive to anybody other than himself. It doesn't matter. All that matters is what takes place on the field.

I would say that is crap. If we are going to enjoy sports, then we need to have them rid of corruption. It is sad, but contract negotiations and off-the-field events have become a part of life.

They will also be a part of our paper. This semester is no longer the 1930s — heck, it is not even the 1990s.

In the new millennium, off-the-field interests are big news, and this semester's staff will strive for balance.

The sports staff still plans to cover basketball games when Bramlage Coliseum rocks and when it's silent. The staff will cover the golf team when Colbert Hills Golf Course is full of observers, but we also want to introduce you to some of the different golfers.

Wildcats battle back in Lawrence, but fall short at end

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LAWRENCE — It was a tale of two halves for K-State in Lawrence on Wednesday.

The Cats and the Kansas Jayhawks renewed their Sunflower Showdown, and the Cats dropped the first edition of this year's series, 87-79.

After being blown off the prairie by KU (13-2, 2-0) in the first half 54-36, the Cats (8-5, 1-1) managed to claw back into the contest behind the shooting of junior forward Kelvin Howell.

Howell, who came off the bench, carried the Cats from the 15:51 mark to the 12:41 mark by scoring 11 straight points, outscoring KU by seven during that period. However, head coach Tom Asbury chose to pull Howell out of the game while he still had a hot hand.

Despite a second-half comeback, the Cats fell short. Ultimately, KU's ability to make free throws down the stretch and K-State's inability to hit shots from the charity stripe sealed a Jayhawk victory for the 17th consecutive time.

As for the Wildcats' second-half defense, it made the transition to zone with 14:39 left in the game and held the Jayhawks to a mere 29 percent from the field.

KU opened the game shooting 56.8 percent from the field, and the Jayhawks were 5 of 11 from three-point range.

Senior shooting guard Cortez Groves, who led K-State with 20 points, said he wanted to focus on covering KU's hot shooters Luke Axtell and Jeff Boschee in the second half.

"Coach made a good call, putting us in the zone," Groves said. "We just tried to focus on their shooters. They sub in a lot, and the time they had both Axtell and Boschee, we just tried to cover them because they were probably their best shooters."

Axtell, a junior forward, scored 14 points off the bench for the Hawks, while Boschee added 10.

Asbury said the zone defense was good because it slowed KU's fast-break game.

"I thought that we slowed them down a little bit," Asbury said. "They didn't get in that rhythm that they were in earlier. I thought we got back into transition a little better in the second half, too."

In the first half, three minutes was all Axtell needed to break the game wide-open late in the first half. With a little

LAWRENCE — Kansas traditionally is known for its depth and ability to exhaust teams with its sheer numbers. However, that wasn't the case in the Hawks 87-79 victory Wednesday — it was K-State's bench that shined in a losing effort.

"We've got a lot of good depth and a lot of good players on our team," sophomore guard Josh Kimm said. "Like coach (Tom Asbury) said, it's hard for us to get as many minutes as everybody would like, but once we get the opportunity, we're going to go out there and do the best we can, cause we're all out there trying to prove ourselves."

K-State's bench did just that against the Hawks, outscoring the Kansas reserves by eight points.

The Wildcats were led by community-college transfer Kelvin Howell, who scored 16 points and grabbed nine rebounds in 29 minutes of play.

"Kelvin played a great game," junior Galen Morrison said. "He showed up tonight. He got us going inside."

It was Howell's inside game that allowed the Cats to claw their way back into the ball game.

Football players continue season in all-star games

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Some K-State football players still are going bowling.

Five former K-State football players will be participating in all-star games during the month of January.

In the East-West Shrine Bowl, safety Lamar Chapman and defensive end Darren Howard will be playing on the East team. The game is scheduled for 3 p.m. Saturday, and K-State Sports Information Director Kent Brown said the players have been preparing in California for a week.

Michael Stecher, East-West Shrine Bowl ticket office director, said players look forward to the game.

"A lot of the coaches and players I talk to look forward to coming to the game," Stecher said. "Some of the coaches even make time in their schedules to come."

It is the 75th anniversary of the bowl, and the game's proceeds benefit the Shrine Hospitals. Last season's Shrine Bowl saw the East team defeat the West 20-10.

Other players will have to wait a bit longer to play in all-star games. The Senior Bowl will be played the following Saturday in Mobile, Ala., and K-State linebacker Mark Simoneau and Howard will play again. The next action for K-State players will be Jan. 29, when running back Frank Murphy and offensive and defensive tackle Damion McIntosh play in the Tyco Gridiron Classic.

The staff still will cover football, but then we always cover football for those of you out there who believe that there are only three athletic seasons at K-State: football season, recruiting and spring football.

Again, for those of you craving football coverage, we will do our best.

In closing, we hope to have fun covering the events that shape K-State athletics and the world, because remember — sports are supposed to be fun.

The definition of a sport is — well, we will not go there again.

more than seven minutes to go, KU went on a 12-4 scoring run. Entering halftime, K-State trailed 54-36.

Asbury said the opening minutes of the game were difficult for the Cats.

"The first 10 minutes were brutal," Asbury said. "We didn't do the things that we knew we needed to do, and we just didn't handle their pressure."

Asbury knew coming into the game that stopping the Hawks' 7-foot-1-inch center Eric Chenowith would be the key to winning. Chenowith proved it is easier said than done by leading the Jayhawks in scoring with 22 and in rebounds with 17.

"I said before the game on the radio that I thought Eric Chenowith was about ready to have a break-out game, and he did," Asbury said. "He played great."

K-State returns to the court Saturday when the team travels to Missouri.

Tom Asbury shows his disgust with one of the official's calls during the first half of the Wildcats' game against the Jayhawks in Lawrence on Wednesday night.

No stretch of the game was as critical as K-State's 11-2 run from the 15:51 mark to the 12:41 juncture of the second half. During that period, Howell scored all 11 K-State points, including a three-point play that cut the Jayhawk lead to 64-52.

"I just told myself that I was going to get it done," Howell said. "It really doesn't matter if I start or come off the bench."

At halftime, Howell said he and his teammates decided to play like they had nothing to lose.

"I felt like we were down by some 22 points at half, and we had to come out and play and put everything on the line."

Howell also said he felt like he could score against the bigger Kansas squad.

"I asked for the ball," he said. "I told them I wanted the ball — I needed the ball."

As the Cats continued to chip away at the Kansas lead, it was Howell who continued stepping up big with a dunk to pull K-State within five at 79-74 with 2:41 remaining.

K-State later would pull within one, but the Hawks fended the Cats off down the stretch to claim the victory.

Kimm said he felt Howell was a big factor in the comeback.

"He came up real big in the second half, posting up strong," Kimm said. "He helped spark a little run to get us back in the game.

"Once you see a guy going to work like that, you just try to keep him onto it."

Kimm also played strong off the bench for the Cats, adding eight points and six assists on three-of-four shooting from the field.

"Coming off the bench, it's really hard to get in the rhythm," freshman Donnie Wallace said. "But Josh Kimm — when he get's hot — it's really hard to stop him."

Wallace, who has seen minimal action this year, played well for the Cats, connecting on a three-point play to pull K-State within seven with under five minutes left.

"When I scored and made the basket, I felt like it took a lot of pressure off my chest," Wallace said.

His block of Kansas center Eric Chenowith at the 2:29 mark looked to help the Cats climb back, but Wallace missed two critical free throws with 1:24 remaining that could have cut the lead to two.

Merger might aid online music

By David E. Kalish
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — To music aficionados, downloading songs off the Internet is something akin to dining at a greasy spoon: The fare might be inexpensive, but the selection stinks.

The combination of America Online Inc. and Time Warner Inc. could help change that, hastening the day when customers can snatch popular albums directly off the Web.

Most music now available for downloading off the Internet onto personal computers or digital players is either by relatively unknown artists or is bootlegged in violation of copyrights.

"One of the main barriers to consumers adopting online music has been the low volume of major label music that's available on a legitimate basis," said Aram Sinnreich, an analyst with the Internet research firm Jupiter Communications Inc., said Wednesday. "AOL Time Warner has the power to change that."

Time Warner owns one of the largest music businesses, with rights to top artists such as Alanis Morissette, Madonna, Phil Collins and R.E.M., as well as a cable-TV network ideal for high-speed transmission of music.

AOL has a ready online audience of 22 million users and a coveted team of software developers. It also owns Spinner.com, one of the biggest sites for letting users listen to songs on their computer. This site allows people to pay just pennies for each song they hear, but while popular artists are available, users aren't able to record and keep the music on portable digital players.

"One of the main barriers to consumers adopting online music has been the low volume of major label music that's available on a legitimate basis."

— Aram Sinnreich, Internet research analyst

By owning all the pieces to supplying online music on a broad scale, AOL Time Warner gains a ready edge over other companies that need to forge partnerships.

The promise of online music is compelling: Sales of downloaded online music are expected to grow from $1 million last year to $1.1 billion by 2004, according to Forrester Research, making up about 6 percent of all music sales.

Despite the online potential, the recording industry thus far has refused to release its songs over the Internet until a secure method is adopted for making sure they are paid royalties for songs.

Time Warner chief executive Gerald Levin, at a news conference Monday, named online music a top priority for AOL Time Warner. While Time Warner also is a big film producer, movies are more difficult to distribute online because even with high-speed Internet hookups they can take hours to download and video can appear jerky and inconsistent.

While executives at America Online and Time Warner were vague about plans, speculation is rife.

The combined company, analysts say, initially might step up promotion of Time Warner's music to AOL's online users through ads as well as through links to Web sites where people can buy CDs through the mail.

In a second stage, Time Warner could transmit its music across existing slow-speed Internet connections to AOL users who pay an extra fee above its $21.95 monthly subscription fee.

Wreck in Brazil leaves 42 dead, 40 more injured

The Associated Press

SAO PAULO, Brazil — A bus carrying Argentine tourists crashed head-on into another bus, tipped over and burst into flames Wednesday in southeastern Brazil, killing at least 42 people and injuring another 40, police said.

The accident happened in the early morning hours on a fog-shrouded mountain highway near the town of Pouso Redondo, 340 miles southwest of Sao Paulo in the state of Santa Catarina.

"The crash was so strong that the Argentine bus exploded into a ball of fire after falling over on one of its sides," Federal Highway Police officer Ivan Robson Flores said.

Forty-one people were killed at the scene, including four children, Flores said. One passenger died at the hospital. Flores said earlier reports that another 20 tourists were burned to death proved to be untrue.

"It is highly unlikely that we will find other bodies under the wreckage," he said.

The bus carrying the Argentine tourists apparently was speeding down a hill when it smashed into the other bus, which was on a regular intercity route, he said. He did not know how many passengers were on the Argentine bus.

The bus from the Argentine province of Tucuman was headed to the beach resort of Camboriu, about 60 miles east of the accident site, Flores said. Argentina's ambassador to Brazil, Jorge Hugo Herreras Vegas, told Globo TV that an Argentine air force plane was being sent to Brazil to carry the bodies back home.

Flores said the only two Brazilian victims were the driver of the intercity bus and one passenger.

A truck, van and several cars also were involved in the accident but apparently none of their drivers or passengers was hurt, he said.

MOSCOW — Acting President Vladimir Putin, seen by many as a shoo-in to win Russia's March 26 presidential elections, was proposed formally as a candidate Wednesday by scores of Russian leaders and celebrities.

The elite group of about 200 politicians, business leaders and cultural figures publicly threw their support behind Putin at a Moscow hotel. The supporters included the president of the Russian republic of Tatarstan, Mintimer Shaimiyev, who recently defected to Putin's faction from a rival camp led by former Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov and Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov.

Putin now must state his formal consent and present a half million voter signatures by Feb. 13 to be registered for the race. His backers said they easily could meet that deadline.

"I think the signature-gathering procedure will take no longer than 10 days," Chukotka's regional governor, Alexander Nazarov, said.

Boris Yeltsin named Putin his preferred successor when he appointed him prime minister last summer and cemented that preference by making Putin acting president after suddenly resigning Dec. 31.

Many Russians admire Putin for his perceived vigor and strong leadership, which contrast sharply with Yeltsin's frequent illnesses and absences from office during his second term. Many also support Putin for the military's campaign in breakaway Chechnya, though that war could backfire on Putin if the military gets bogged down.

Putin's potential opponents in the race include Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov; liberal economist and leader of the Yabloko party Grigory Yavlinsky; ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky and a variety of marginal players.

Primakov, Putin's most serious rival, is likely to abandon the race, according to an ally's remarks Tuesday.

Putin's election prospects appeared buoyed again Wednesday when a leader of the Union of Right-Wing Forces, Boris Nemtsov, was quoted by the ITAR-Tass news agency as saying his party will support Putin.

Putin, a former KGB official, visited the chief prosecutor's office in Moscow before flying to the northern city of Petrozavodsk Wednesday.

The long DRIVE

Cats set new driving record, come back to defeat Washington in Culligan Holiday Bowl

STORIES BY JOSHUA KINDER

No. 6 K-State's game-winning 9-minute, 54-second, 20-play drive that covered 92 yards in the fourth quarter of its 24-20 victory over the Washington Huskies in the Culligan Holiday Bowl sent the Wildcats out in style in 1999.

"The drive," as most would refer to it, was the longest scoring drive of the season for K-State, and it couldn't have come at a better time.

With the Cats trailing 20-17 in the last minute of the third quarter, Lamar Chapman's interception of Huskies junior quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo at the goal line set up the Wildcat offense for what was to be the ball game's decisive charge.

The series set a new Holiday Bowl record for length of drive — both in distance and time.

"I thought it was a pretty special drive," head coach Bill Snyder said following the game. "Jonathan (Beasley) did a nice job engineering the drive. I was impressed by it. However we got it, I'll take it. It took a lot of time off the clock, and if there would have been much more time on the clock, I'm not sure we would be where we are right now or not."

Darren Howard celebrates one of his three sacks of the night as Washington quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo looks on in disbelief. Howard was named the defensive player of the game, leading the Wildcats with nine tackles and three sacks.

Junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley earned Outstanding Offensive Player of the Game. Beasley was six of nine passing for 63 yards on the record-setting charge, including six carries for 16 yards and the go-ahead 1-yard touchdown run. Junior wide receiver Quincy Morgan caught four of his game-high seven receptions on the drive as well.

"We knew the defense had just made a big play for us and got us the ball on the 8-yard line, and we had to get the defense off the field and sustain a drive," Beasley said. "We didn't know how long it was. We just wanted to keep our defense off the field."

Snyder described Beasley's 15-of-31, 216-yard performance as variable.

"Off and on, " Snyder said. "He did some very fine things and made some mistakes — therefore inconsistent.

"On the 95-yard drive, he really did a very, very nice job and made some decisions. I thought his decision-making process was pretty good tonight in regards to getting us in and out of some appropriate plays."

Despite engineering the game's final scoring drive, Beasley said he wasn't overly happy with his performance in the first half but knew he had to improve performance in the second half for K-State to win.

"I didn't play to the best of my ability like I should have," Beasley said. "I had guys wide open, and I'd underthrow them a little bit, so I knew in the second half I had to come out and do better than what I did in the first half."

Winning it with defense

The Cats were led defensively by senior defensive end Darren Howard, who finished his K-State career with a stellar night, recording nine tackles — five for a loss — and three sacks. Howard was awarded with Outstanding Defensive Player of the Game honors.

"Darren played well, considering the fact that he got held all night," Snyder said. "He played very well, and you expect him to play well. He's a very, very fine athlete, and he played well despite being handicapped."

Howard's performance was just one part of the total defensive effort used to limit the Huskies to 272 total yards — 75 rushing and 197 passing.

The Wildcats, who entered the game ranked No. 2 nationally in total defense, knew stopping Tuiasosopo would be the key to the victory. Entering the game, he had averaged 250 yards per game of total offense on an offensive unit that posted nearly 400 yards per game until it met the Cats.

Despite limiting Tuiasosopo to 30 yards rushing and 197 yards passing, Snyder said K-State didn't do a good job of containing him.

"I don't think we played well against him, in all honesty," Snyder said. "This is not one of our finest hours in regard to how well we played in the ball game. We'll take the win, but our players are not jumping up and down, because we realize that we really didn't play that well.

"Marques is a tremendously talented athlete, and that's not anything that we didn't know. We understood that, and I was concerned about whether we were going to be able to stop him."

Frank Murphy injured in final game

One of the few sour notes of the night was the loss of senior running back Frank Murphy, who was injured late in the second quarter.

After totaling 42 yards on the ground and 28 receiving in the first half, including 52 of the team's 62 total yards on its first scoring drive of the game, the once-National Junior College Player for the Year was kept out of the second half with a left quadriceps pull.

It was the last of many injuries that plagued Murphy throughout his senior campaign.

"Frank ran extremely hard," Snyder said. "I was tremendously disappointed that he was injured. You know, Frank has taken an awful lot of criticism over the last couple of years, but you won't find a neater young guy. You won't find anybody that works as hard as he does. He works as hard as any football player we have on this team.

"He's been injured virtually the entire year, and this was kind of his opportunity to get back and he worked extremely hard to get himself back. It was just unfortunate that he got hurt."

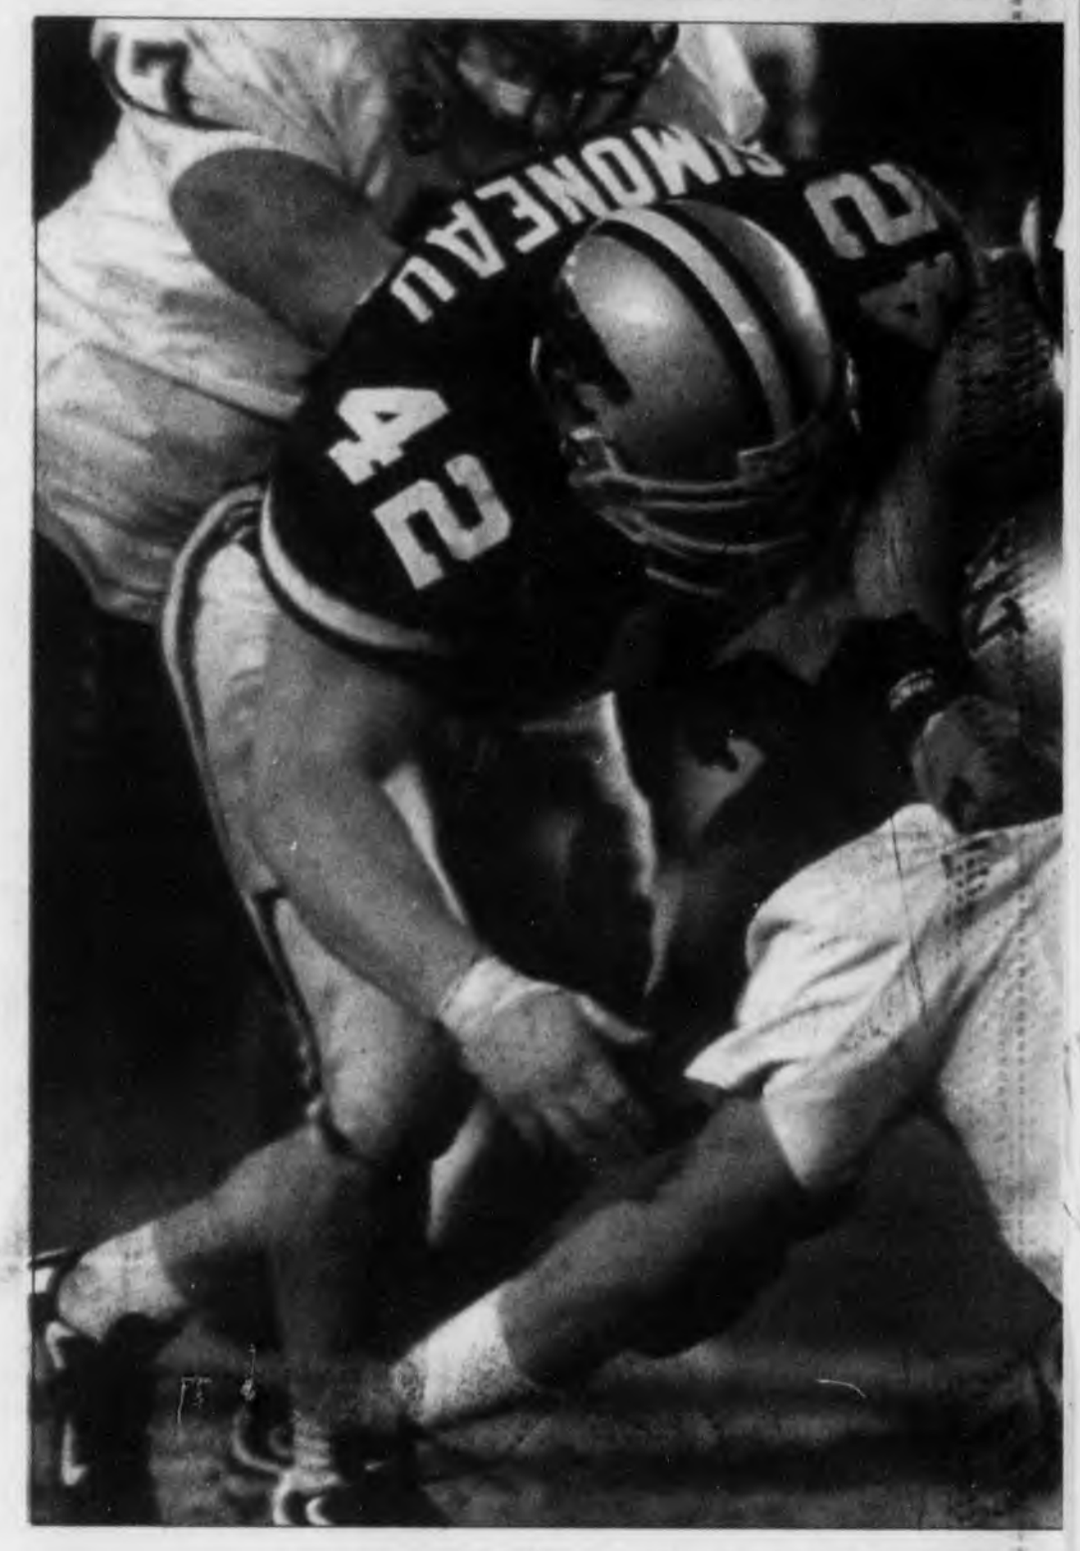
Setting the stage ... again

The win over Washington gave K-State its third consecutive 11-win season, joining only National Champion Florida State as the other team to accomplish such a feat.

K-State football ended the 1990s in winning fashion, supporting the notion that Snyder orchestrated the greatest turnaround in college football history, winning 87 games to just 40 losses.

With just seven starters departing and a slew of new faces expecting to contribute, starting the new millennium already has many excited. At the pregame pep rally the night before the bowl game, Snyder said a win over Washington would help set the stage for next season.

"For our seniors, this is going to be the last opportunity for them at Kansas State University, and they want to end it the right way," Snyder said. "With our underclassmen, I think there's been a lot said about setting the stage for the year 2000, and I think this is important for them, and they're excited about not next year at this point in time, but setting the stage, because it relates to what takes place tomorrow night."



Despite being overlooked by the ABC Bowl Championship Series for the second season in a row, Snyder said he is proud of how his team handled difficulty through the season.

"My thoughts are this — number one, this football team, the program and the people that surround it have gone through a tremendous amount of adversity over the two-year period of time. And for our youngsters and assistant coaches to respond like they have, I think, is a tremendous tribute to the character of those people."

Head coach Bill Snyder argues with one of the referees after he thought a holding penalty should have been called on Washington in the second half of the Culligan Holiday Bowl in San Diego. The Cats won the game 24-20.

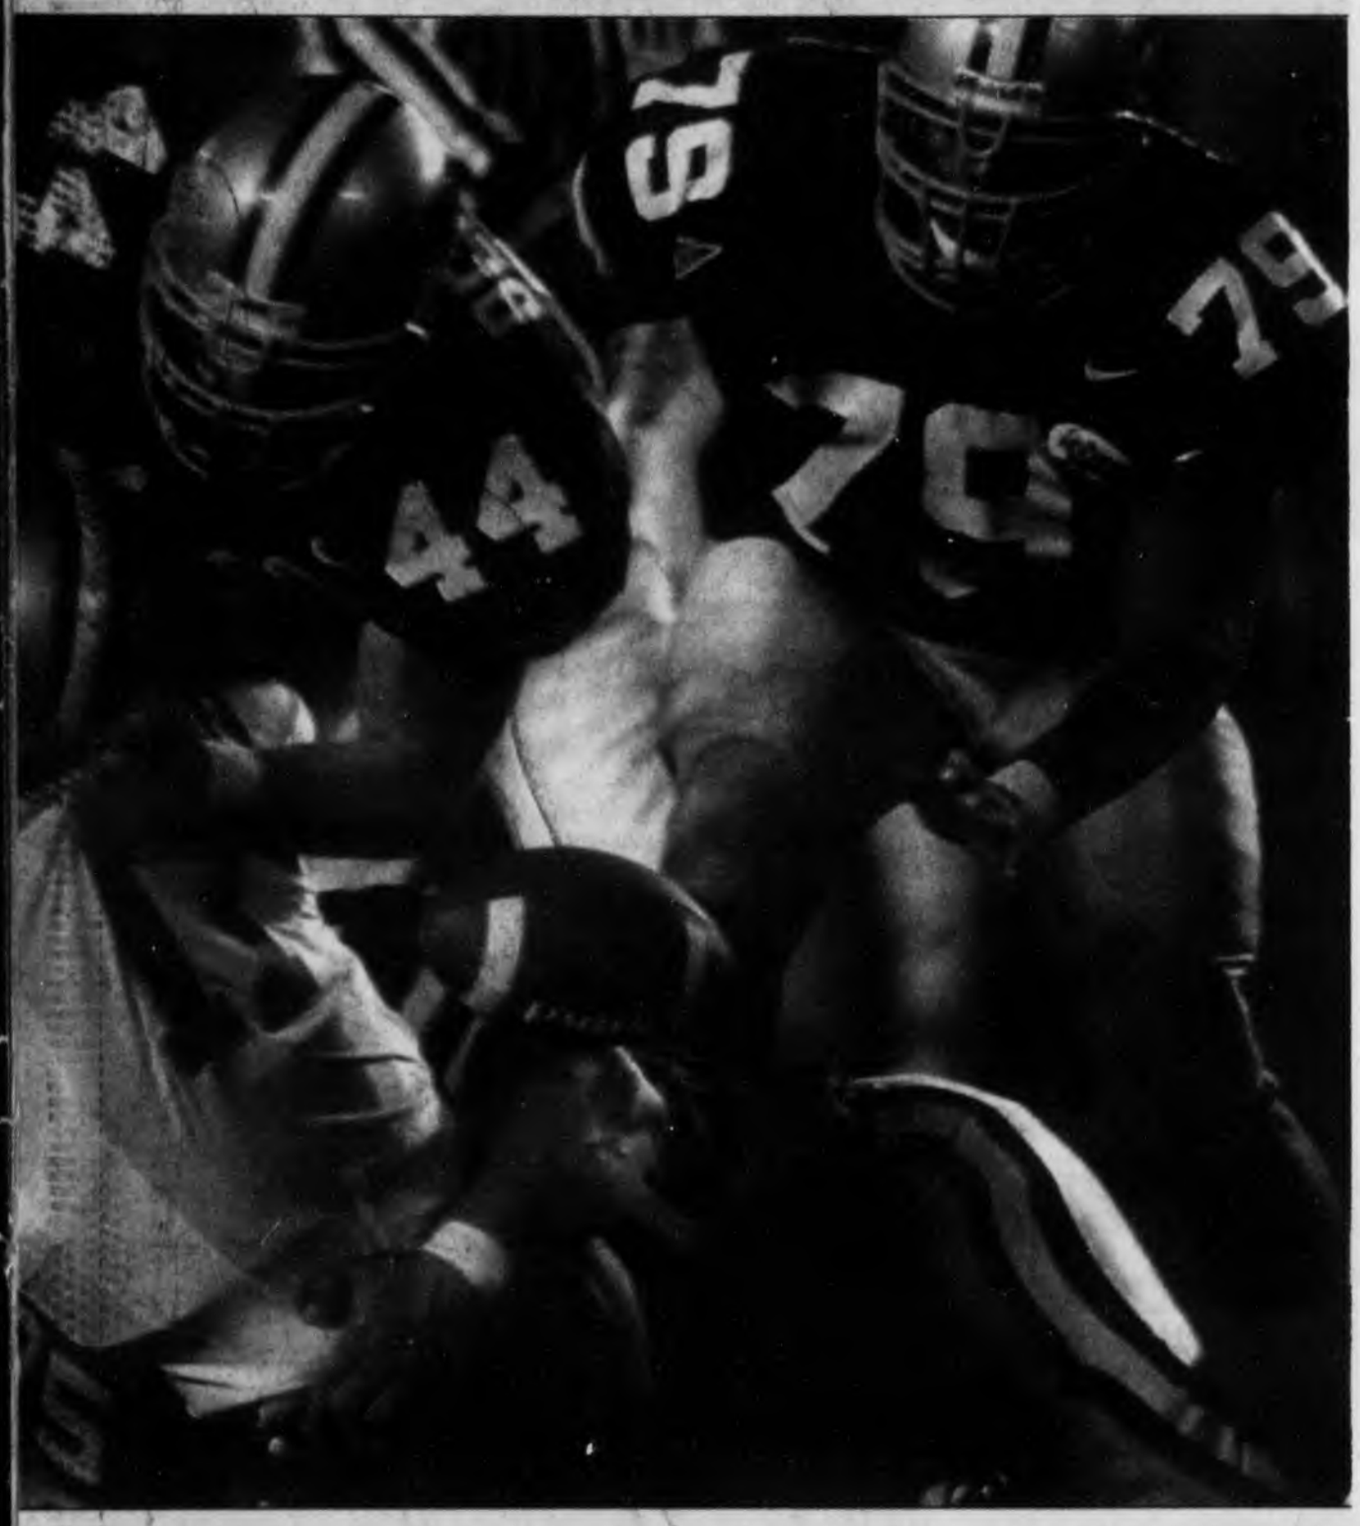
Reliving the Wildcat experience

Rick Neuheisel saw a lot of K-State when he was head coach of the Colorado Buffaloes from 1995 to 1998. He said that despite the change in K-State's defensive coaching staff this year, he didn't see much difference from the past.

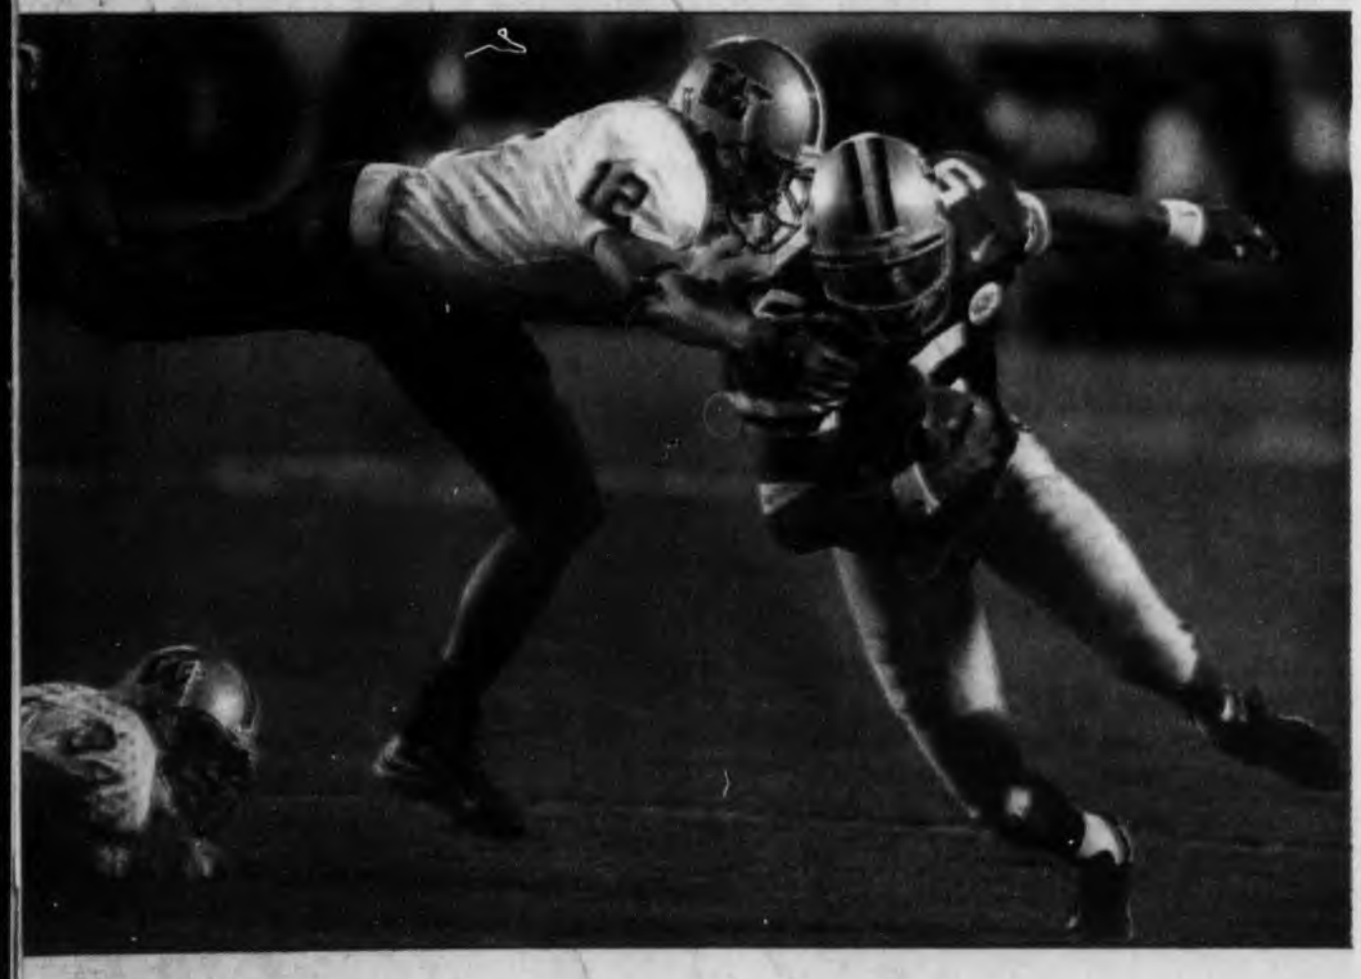
"They're all the same guys," Neuheisel said. "They've all been playing for a long time. (Jarrod) Cooper and (Lamar) Chapman and (Mark) Simoneau and (Darren) Howard have all been there a long period of time and have had great careers. My hat's off to them. It's one of the best defenses I've seen at the collegiate level.

"It seemed to me like the same old Kansas State defense. I know Phil Bennett is their coordinator, and he did a great job, because they were the No. 2 defense in the country, but I see them up there doing a lot of the same things.

"I know this: If you throw a grenade out there, you'd get all 11 of them because they're all close to the ball."



Risk-take



Neuheisel called head coac gambling man after he opted to down and one on K-State's ope game. Senior running back Fra was stopped for what would ha loss, but he battled to get 12 ye K-State to the Washington 1-ya

"I was surprised," Neuheisel remember Bill Snyder being a turned out to be a great thing. we didn't tackle. We had the g behind the line of scrimmage a was a great effort by Murphy."

He's played his last game

Simoneau, who finished his K-State football playing career ranked third in career tackles, said it just felt like another game, and that he hadn't really thought about it being his last as a Wildcat.

"It hasn't hit me yet," Simoneau said. "It just feels like it's after another game, but I don't know, I was just happy to be a part of Kansas State and have an opportunity to win 11 games each of these last three years.

"To be a winner and go out a winner is big."

Cover everybody

Washington junior fullback Pat Conniff was a thorn in the side of the K-State defense all night. Conniff caught four passes out of the backfield for 57 yards. Snyder said K-State has some work to do with regards to covering fullbacks in the future.

"I think we're going to have a session on trying to figure out how to cover those fullbacks," Snyder said. "We haven't covered him yet. Outside of when we got together and shook hands at the end of the ball game, I don't know if we had been within 10 yards of him."

Gunman kills 3 on bus in South Africa

■ Police investigate race as motive after shooting.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PRETORIA, South Africa — A white gunman boarded a bus crowded with black commuters Wednesday and, without uttering a word, killed the driver and two passengers and wounded four others before fleeing.

As police began investigating whether the shooting was racially motivated, a senior local government official already was calling it a hate crime. Mbhazima Shilowa, premier of Gauteng province that encompasses Pretoria, said the attack was motivated by hatred.

The gunman, a middle-aged man wearing a brown T-shirt and shorts, boarded at a bus stop in an upscale Pretoria suburb at 5:10 p.m. As the vehicle pulled away from the curb, he killed the driver with a 9 mm pistol, then opened fire on passengers, police said.

Seconds later, the bus crashed into a pole and came to a standstill. The gunman ran off the bus, climbed onto a motorcycle parked nearby and drove away.

After the attack, a police helicopter flew over the upscale suburb of Constantia Park hunting for the assailant.

The bodies of the victims — the male driver and two women passengers — remained on the bus Wednesday night as dozens of police swarmed over the scene.

One of the wounded passengers was in critical condition, officials said. All the victims were black, police Capt. Morne van Wyck said.

The attack resembled those white extremists carried out against blacks before South Africa had its first all-race elections in 1994. Since the African National Congress won that historic vote, violent right-wing groups have been largely dormant.

"This is not a common thing in South Africa anymore," van Wyck said.

Commuter buses like the one that was targeted are used almost exclusively by blacks, while many whites can afford their own cars.

Turkish leadership puts Ocalan's hanging on hold

BY SUZAN FRASER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey's government on Wednesday put on hold the execution of Kurdish rebel leader Abdullah Ocalan, a move aimed at enhancing the country's prospects for joining the European Union.

The decision, which came after coalition leaders met for eight hours, came in response to a request from the European Court of Human Rights to review Ocalan's appeal. The rebel leader was sentenced to death in June by a Turkish court.

Italian Premier Massimo D'Alema expressed satisfaction with Turkey's decision, saying "the choice confirms the evolution of Turkish politics towards Europe and its democratic principles." A Rome city official said the colosseum would be lit up in the coming days to mark the decision.

Still, Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit said the execution was delayed, not canceled.

"If the rebel organization and its supporters attempt to use this process against the high interests of the state, then the process of delaying will be halted and the process of execution will be started immediately," Ecevit said.

Ecevit's warning was an apparent attempt to appease the far-right National Action Party, which has pressed for Ocalan's hanging, and relatives of those who lost their lives fighting against the Kurdish rebels, who seek autonomy in southeastern Turkey. Some 37,000 people, mostly Kurds, have died in the fighting since 1984.

"The leaders made a very wrong decision," said Mehdi Keskin, a lawyer for Turks who lost family in the fighting. "They have made the martyrs' families' consciences bleed."

"The leaders made a very wrong decision. They have made the martyrs' families' consciences bleed."

— Mehdi Keskin, lawyer for Turks who lost family in the fighting

But Ecevit said Ocalan's death sentence cannot be overruled.

He also made clear that Turkey would not wait long. Review of the case in the European court could take up to two years.

"This decision does not mean that we will agree for a delay under any condition that will last forever," Ecevit said.

Turkey has not executed anyone since 1984. European countries all have abolished the death penalty and are urging Turkey to do the same.

"The execution would cause more tension in Turkey and would not be good for Turkey's society and industry," Wolfgang Peukart, an official of the European court, said at a meeting in Ankara.

The EU named Turkey a candidate for membership last month — a huge step for the country, which has been working toward joining the union since 1963.

Leading up to Wednesday's meeting, speculation had grown that the issue could trigger a breakup of Ecevit's government. The nationalists came to power on a campaign promise to execute Ocalan and are under pressure from their electorate immediately to send the Kurdish rebel's case to parliament for approval.

Earlier Wednesday, hundreds of nationalist supporters gathered in the capital, Ankara, at the funeral of soldiers killed in clashes with rebels Sunday. They booed President Suleyman Demirel — who favors waiting for the European Court's ruling — calling him a traitor.

"Do not bargain on the blood of our martyrs!" they shouted before marching in downtown Ankara. They called on the government to resign.

Kurds also have voiced their concern. On Tuesday, 37 elected mayors of Turkey's only legal political Kurdish movement, the People's Democracy Party, urged the leaders not to hang Ocalan.

Ecevit fears that hanging Ocalan could anger the Kurdish rebel group and revive violence in southeastern Turkey. There has been a relative lull in fighting in that region since Ocalan's Kurdistan Workers Party, known as the PKK, announced a cease-fire and withdrawal from Turkey in August.

Microsoft settlement big victory for tiny tech firm

BY HANNAH WOLFSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALT LAKE CITY — Settling an antitrust lawsuit with Microsoft gives tiny software maker Caldera Inc. two things: money in the bank and a chance to look to the future.

For nearly four years, the Orem, Utah-based Caldera has focused on the past, trying to prove the software giant used anticompetitive tactics to torpedo its DR DOS software in the early 1990s.

On Monday, the companies announced they had settled Caldera's antitrust lawsuit, avoiding a trial that was expected to start Feb. 1.

Now Caldera seems poised to take on Microsoft once again — this time in the marketplace, where it has pinned its hopes on its Linux operating system.

"Our lawsuit (and others) helped publicize and legitimize the Linux brand," Caldera said in a statement. "We believe that as a result of these lawsuits, (we) are stronger competitors to Microsoft, now and in the future."

Microsoft said the settlement will reduce this quarter's earnings by 3 cents per share, which works out to about $155 million based on the 5.15 billion shares the Redmond, Wash.-based company has outstanding.

Neither side would confirm the damages. Even at the lowest estimate, the settlement gives Caldera help as it tries to boost Linux, an operating system that competes with Microsoft's Windows.

DR DOS works much like MS-DOS, the operating system that Microsoft used as a platform to build its Windows empire.

In the early 1990s, the two systems fought for the hearts of consumers and computer makers. Caldera claims that Microsoft threw its heft — and some unfair tactics — behind its own MS-DOS.

Microsoft has said all along that it played fairly and that MS-DOS was simply the superior product.

Caldera said that Microsoft built incompatibilities into Windows and tried to create a perception of incompatibilities to discourage computer users from buying DR DOS — even while e-mails compiled as evidence indicate Microsoft programmers found DR DOS superior.

In the early 1990s, the two systems fought for the hearts of consumers and computer makers. Caldera claims that Microsoft threw its heft — and some unfair tactics — behind its own MS-DOS.

Microsoft struggled with similar insider messages as it defended itself from an antitrust case brought by the Department of Justice, in which a judge ruled the software giant had used monopolistic tactics. That case is now in settlement talks and is expected to return to court Feb. 22.

That could have provided impetus to settle, said New York antitrust lawyer Kevin Arquit.

"It certainly stems a replay of the public relations embarrassment that occurred in the government's trial," he said.

Microsoft spokesman Jim Cullinan denied a link.

Former deputy testifies he never told sheriff of addiction

BY DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A former Shawnee County sheriff's deputy testified Wednesday at a hearing to determine if the sheriff should be tried for lying that Timothy Oblander never told the sheriff of his drug use.

Oblander, a former corporal in the department, said he did not talk with Sheriff Dave Meneley about his cocaine addiction.

Meneley faces two charges of perjury for his testimony at two hearings last year in which he said he did not know about Oblander's drug use.

Three witnesses had testified earlier in the hearing that Oblander told them in 1995 about Oblander's drug use, four years before Meneley says he found out about it.

Meneley faces other legal problems. Attorney General Carla Stovall has filed 20 other charges against him and is attempting to have him removed from office before any criminal trial begins.

The ouster trial, a civil proceeding in Shawnee County District Court, is scheduled for next week. Meneley is set to make his first appearance Jan. 26 on the criminal charges filed by Stovall.

The perjury charges against the sheriff were filed in April by Shawnee County District Attorney Joan Hamilton.

The loss of drugs from the department's evidence section has led to scandal for the department and the allegations against Meneley, who has refused calls that he resign. The scandal also has resulted in cases against drug dealers being overturned or dismissed because of the possibility that evidence was tainted.

Oblander admitted his drug addiction shortly after he resigned in March.

He testified, however, that he never talked with Meneley about it.

"I never have told him," Oblander said.

Outbreak at Tennessee school blamed on case of mass hysteria

■ More than 170 treated for nausea, dizziness after strange smell was noticed.

BY JEFF DONN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

It started with nothing more dramatic than a funny smell.

A teacher noticed it first in a school kitchen. She felt sick to her stomach. Several of her students felt strange. Soon, by the dozens, students throughout the school complained of nausea, dizziness, headaches and drowsiness.

Before it was over, more than 170 students, teachers and others sought emergency treatment during the November 1998 outbreak at Warren County High School in McMinnville, Tenn. The school of 2,000 students was closed for more than two weeks. Nearly $100,000 was spent on emergency care alone.

A raft of government investigators studied the school grounds and analyzed blood samples. They examined puddles and grease traps and even checked an air space above the foundation. They looked for viruses, germs, pesticides, herbicides, poisons — anything that could conceivably make so many people ill so quickly.

They found ... nothing.

In an article published in today's New England Journal of Medicine, they blame the outbreak on mass hysteria — real symptoms set off by spreading anxiety.

The investigators say such outbreaks are much more common than recognized at schools and in other close-knit communities. And they say cases of mass hysteria — now called "psychogenic illness" — probably will become more frequent and more severe with rising public worry over biological terrorism.

New technology also might be promoting new forms of hysteria. Dr. Ron House, a University of Toronto researcher who has studied mass hysteria in Canada, said Internet messages about real or imagined symptoms of conditions like chemical sensitivity now appear to be touching off such outbreaks in people at great distances from one another.

The phenomenon, though, has long historical roots. Hundreds of outbreaks of mass hysteria have been documented over the past century, often among schoolchildren, soldiers and factory workers. Some historians attribute a feverish medieval mania of jerky movements, known as Saint Vitus' Dance and once blamed on demons, largely to mass hysteria.

"In a previous era, spirits and demons oppressed us. Although they have been replaced by contemporary concerns about invisible viruses, chemicals and toxins, the mechanisms of contagious fear remain the same," said Dr. Simon Wessely of Guy's School of Medicine in London.

The Tennessee investigators are emphatic in saying that no virus, chemical or toxin spread the illness through the school.

"We did the most thorough environmental and epidemiological study that was humanly possible," said Dr. Timothy Jones, a federal epidemiologist now at the Tennessee Department of Health and lead author of the report.

He said it still is possible the outbreak was touched off by a real chemical smell, though such a chemical was never discovered. But he said mass hysteria soon took over and brought on the vast share of illness.

In fact, the investigators found some classic hallmarks of contagious anxiety: Victims were about three times more likely than others to have seen another sick person or to know that a classmate was ill. Sixty-nine percent were women, compared with 52 percent of the school population.

Psychogenic illness is imperfectly understood. Females have long been thought prone to it, though some experts now dismiss that as the bias of male researchers. Others suggest that working women feel less control over their environment than men — another classic factor in hysteria. Outbreaks, often worsened by news reports, also are thought to be more likely in groups under great psychological or physical stress.

The impact was so profound at the Tennessee school that it remains a sensitive topic for Principal George Bolding.

He said he smelled an odor himself and came down with a headache. But he agrees that the outbreak later did turn into hysteria. "Kids are unreal about copying," he said. "They see someone get sick, and they get sick."

Lawyer plans Internet intoxication defense in teen-ager's Columbine online-threat case

BY STEVE GUTTERMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — A flamboyant Florida lawyer who offered a television intoxication defense in a 1970s murder case plans to argue that a teen-ager accused of making an online threat against Columbine High School was suffering from Internet intoxication.

Michael Ian Campbell, an 18-year-old aspiring actor from Cape Coral, Fla., was role-playing when he sent a message threatening to finish what began in the massacre last April, Miami lawyer Ellis Rubin said Wednesday.

Columbine students Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold shot and killed 12 students and a teacher on April 20 before killing themselves in the nation's deadliest school shooting.

"To intoxicate is to elevate yourself into a state of euphoria, even into madness," Rubin said. "You've logged on and gone into this imaginary world, this playland, this make-believe arena.

"That's why I call it Internet intoxication. The more they go into the Internet, the more bizarre their role-playing becomes."

The U.S. attorney's office did not immediately return calls for comment on the strategy.

Diane Cabell, a fellow at the Berkman Center for Internet & Society at Harvard Law School, said she sees little difference between the authors of anonymous Internet threats and people who make obscene phone calls.

"They know what they're doing. It's just a cheaper way to stalk," she said.

Rubin's strategy is something of an update of the argument he used in defense of another Florida teen-ager in 1977, when many baby boomers were as glued to their TV sets as their children are to computer monitors today.

Ronny Zamora, 15, was convicted of murdering an elderly neighbor in Miami Beach after a trial in which Rubin argued that television intoxication led to the slaying.

"To intoxicate is to elevate yourself into a state of euphoria, even into madness."

— Ellis Rubin, Miami lawyer

In an appeal, Zamora turned against his lawyer and claimed the TV intoxication argument made a mockery of his defense. But the court upheld the conviction and said Rubin's argument might have worked to Zamora's advantage.

Rubin also is known for a nymphomania defense. In 1991, he represented a woman accused of prostitution who blamed her actions on nymphomania that she said was a side effect of the antidepressant Prozac.

The woman and her sheriff's deputy husband, accused of being her pimp, eventually pleaded guilty.

Man charged in Tampa hotel shooting formally indicted

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TAMPA, Fla. — A man accused of gunning down four co-workers in a hotel and killing a fifth person during an attempted carjacking was indicted Wednesday on 20 counts, including several counts of murder and attempted murder.

"We will be seeking the death penalty," said Hillsborough County Assistant State Attorney Pam Bondi.

Silvio Izquierdo-Leyva, 36, was charged with five counts of first-degree murder, seven counts of attempted first-degree murder with a firearm and three counts of aggravated assault with a firearm.

He was also charged with two counts of armed carjacking and three counts of attempted armed carjacking.

His arraignment hearing was set for Jan. 18.

During an initial hearing he had been charged with five counts of first-degree murder and three counts of armed carjacking.

Izquierdo-Leyva allegedly opened fire inside the Radisson Bay Harbor Inn Dec. 30, which was crowded with football fans in town for the New Year's Day Outback Bowl.

Four of Izquierdo-Leyva's co-workers on the hotel staff were killed, and a woman was slain during an attempted carjacking after the shootings.

Three other hotel workers were injured.

Census Bureau predicts increase in population

By RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A century from now there will be twice as many Americans as today, the Census Bureau predicts.

While no one knows what daily life will be like in 100 years, the new population projections being issued Thursday conjure images of twice as many cars jostling for position on the highways and twice as many shoppers crowding the aisles at Wal-Mart.

From an estimated 275 million people today, the bureau projects a U.S. population of 571 million in the year 2100. That might not seem terribly crowded, however, because the nation is so sprawling.

"If you look at the density for the United States, we are not even coming close to the densities that you see in Europe," census statistician Tammany J. Mulder, said.

The U.S. population density in 2100 would be 161.4 people per square mile, about one-fourth the current population density of Germany and the United Kingdom, Mulder said.

The increase is expected even though childbearing rates in the United States are only about what is necessary to replace the current population.

"The increasing number of potential parents and continued migration from abroad would be sufficient to add nearly 300 million people during the next century," Census Bureau analyst Frederick W. Hollmann, said.

Overall, the population will be older — with some 5.3 million people older than 100 — and include a larger share of minorities, led by Hispanics.

"Because the Hispanic and Asian and Pacific Islander populations in the U.S. are younger than the nation as a whole and because they continue to receive international migrants, these populations will become increasingly prominent," Hollmann said.

The census projection calls for the nation's population to reach 300 million in 2011, 400 million in 2049 and 500 million in 2081.

By comparison, the U.S. population was 5.3 million in 1800 and 75.9 million in 1900.

The United Nations, in its own projections, expects the world's population to rise from the current 6 billion to about 9.4 billion in 2100.

The age breakdown of America would look different in 2100, Mulder said, with a more uniform distribution and more elderly people as medical care lengthens lifespan.

For example, the Baby Boom generation creates a bulge in the U.S. population at ages 35 to 39 and 40 to 44, the only two segments making up more than 8 percent of the total. And today's population includes just 65,000 people aged 100 and over, 0.02 percent of the total.

By 2100, the over-100 crowd is expected to grow to 0.9 percent of the total, and no five-year age group will even reach 7 percent of all Americans.

The largest age group is expected to be those aged 15 to 19, at 6.4 percent.

The projections show an especially rapid surge in the elderly population as the surviving baby boomers pass age 65. In the year 2011, baby boomers — those born between 1946 and 1964 — will begin turning 65.

Between 2011 and 2030, the number of elderly people would rise from 40.4 million, 13 percent of the population, to 70.3 million, 20 percent of the population.

Justice Department asks judge to deport suspected SS Guard

By JOANN LOVIGLIO
The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — The federal government hopes to revoke the U.S. citizenship of a man it says served as a Ukrainian SS guard and participated in the Nazis' slaughter of thousands of Jews in Poland.

The Justice Department said Fedir Kwoczak concealed his past when he entered the country, failing to reveal he was recruited from the SS-run Trawniki Training Camp in Nazi-occupied Poland to participate in Germany's "Operation Reinhard."

The campaign led to the killing of 1.7 million Polish Jews and the enslavement of thousands of others in forced-labor camps.

When Kwoczak applied for a visa seeking entry to the United States in 1949, he told immigration authorities he was a laborer in Poland and Germany during World War II.

In a nonjury trial that started Monday and is expected to last two weeks, the Justice Department has asked U.S. District Judge Louis H. Pollak to strip the 78-year-old retired masonry worker's citizenship and ultimately have him deported.

Kwoczak's attorney, John Rogers Carroll, maintains that German wartime personnel rosters from the 1940s are inaccurate and do not link Kwoczak to any particular crime.

Kwoczak says he is not the Fedir Kwoczak identified in the documents, saying his military career ended before the war because of poor eyesight and an injured hand.

The complaint is part of the Justice Department's ongoing efforts to find and take legal action against former Nazi soldiers now living in the United States. About 63 alleged Nazi persecutors have been stripped of U.S. citizenship and 52 have been deported since the Office of Special Investigations started its operation in 1979.

Boyfriend cleared in teacher's slaying after two juveniles arrested Monday

By STEVE GUTTERMAN
The Associated Press

DENVER — Three teen-age boys have been arrested in the killing of a schoolteacher, and police said they have cleared the victim's boyfriend of involvement in the New Year's Day attack.

Two 16-year-olds and one 14-year-old were taken into custody late Monday and early Tuesday for investigation of first-degree murder, robbery and other counts in the death of Emily Johnson, police said. Their names were not released because they are juveniles.

Johnson, 29, was found beaten and unconscious in a pool of blood on the back patio of her northwest Denver home on the morning of Jan. 1. She died the next evening.

Police said the suspects are students from the Denver area but would not say where they went to school. Johnson was a special education teacher at Skinner Middle School, not far from her home.

The boys were held without bail pending a decision by the district attorney's office on formal charges, expected to be filed within days.

It has not been decided whether to charge the suspects as adults, Assistant District Attorney Chuck Lepley said.

Police detained Johnson's 28-year-old boyfriend, Robert Davis, who was found sleeping in her home and had what investigators said appeared to be blood on his hands.

But officers said Tuesday that Davis "has been completely cleared of any involvement with regards to her death," though he remained in jail on a probation violation related to a 1997 drug conviction.

According to a police affidavit and other court documents, Davis said he could not remember what happened after he and Johnson returned home the night before she was found.

Clinton proposes tax-credit expansion this year for businesses, working poor

By TERENCE HUNT
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Reassuring himself that he's not a lame duck, President Clinton began laying out the agenda of his final year in office Wednesday with a $21 billion expansion in tax credits for the working poor and more help for the nation's neediest communities.

"The great challenge for us today is to make up our minds — what are we going to do with this magic moment of promise," Clinton said, boasting about low unemployment, declining crime rates and the strongest economy in America's history.

Republicans responded warily to Clinton's proposal.

"I think the Clinton administration spends money every day, it seems like," Republican presidential front-runner George W. Bush said. "If you look at the newspapers and look at the programs, there is always another program, another initiative."

The president spoke before the Democratic Leadership Council, the centrist political group he helped found. Introducing Clinton, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said the booming economy was a great legacy for the president.

"I always get nervous when people start talking about legacies," the president joked moments later. "You know, alliteration having the appeal that it does, it's just one small step from legacy to lame duck."

Clinton hastened to add that he would not be a lame duck until he gave a speech and the audience was empty.

Previewing the State of the Union address he will deliver before Congress on Jan. 27, Clinton said a primary theme would be "a new opportunity agenda" of advancement opportunities for families "still at the margins of society who are willing to work and ought to be rewarded for it.

"I will put forth my last but still a new agenda, rooted in responsibility, designed to create a wider, stronger, more inclusive American community and to create new opportunities."

He said he would offer education and training proposals and measures to make health care and child care more affordable.

A large ingredient of Wednesday's speech was a proposed $21 billion expansion over 10 years of the earned income tax credit program, which provides an annual payment for nearly 20 million families living around the national poverty line.

In 1998, the average claim was $1,459 for 19.4 million taxpayers.

Clinton said his initiative would provide up to $1,200 more in tax relief for eligible families.

It would expand the credit for parents with three or more children, allow married couples to earn an additional $1,450 before the start of a phase out of their credit, lower the phase-out rate and allow families to contribute to a 401(k) retirement plan without risking their credit.

In 1998, taxpayers earning between $10,000 and $31,000 were eligible, depending on the number of children they have. Clinton said his program would increase aid for 6.4 million families.

"The great challenge for us today is to make up our minds — what are we going to do with this magic moment of promise."

— President Clinton

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Bill Archer, R-Texas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, reacted skeptically to the president's proposal. "Taxpayers might question spending billions more on a program that the IRS says already wastes close to $6.5 billion each year — or about one dollar out of every five — because of fraud and mistakes," Archer said.

Beyond expanding the earned income tax credit, Clinton will propose significant spending increases for programs designed to steer investment to the nation's neediest urban and rural areas.

Clinton will seek $5 billion over 10 years for his New Markets tax-credit program to encourage businesses to invest in neglected communities, said Gene Sperling, the president's top economic adviser. The program, offering investors a 25-percent tax credit, had been budgeted at $2 billion.

In addition, the president will expand his empowerment zone tax initiative by $4 billion over the next 10 years, Sperling said.

The program offers tax relief to attract businesses to economically disadvantaged areas. It also provides housing redevelopment and enhanced local services.

Pressure mounts for British leaders to release Pinochet medical records

By KRISTIN GAZLAY
The Associated Press

LONDON — Pressure mounted on Britain's top law-enforcement official Wednesday to release medical records that might spell freedom for ailing former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet, detained for 15 months on charges of human rights abuses.

The human rights group Amnesty International demanded that Home Secretary Jack Straw release the records, at least to Spain — as well as to France, Switzerland and Belgium, which also requested Pinochet's extradition claiming their citizens suffered abuses during his 1973-90 dictatorship.

"Many victims of Pinochet's crimes and the families of those who have been murdered will feel betrayed if Pinochet is released on the basis of medical evidence, which is not going to be disclosed," Geoffrey Bindman, an Amnesty attorney, said.

Straw announced Tuesday that an independent medical exam on Jan. 5 by four physicians was unequivocal and unanimous in finding the 84-year-old general too ill to stand trial, opening the door for him to return to Chile within weeks.

The panel's findings were not disclosed, although Straw told the House of Commons that criteria considered included whether Pinochet would be able to follow the proceedings, assist in his own defense and give coherent testimony. Pinochet suffered two small strokes in September. He also has diabetes and arthritis and wears a pacemaker.

Straw gave the parties involved seven days to submit arguments before he issues a final ruling on extradition to Spain, but gave no timetable for his decision.

He said Pinochet had been asked to allow Spain and the other countries involved to read copies of the medical report, but that the general declined to do so.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's Downing Street office issued a statement Wednesday saying Pinochet was entitled to his privacy. In Washington, D.C., White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said, "This is a legal matter between Chile and Spain."

Pinochet was said by friends to be delighted by the latest twist in his case. But his son said the family would put off celebrations until the general boards a plane home.

"A possibility indeed has opened for his return, but there is nothing firm yet," Marco Antonio Pinochet said at a news conference in Santiago.

He said he talked Wednesday with his mother, Lucia, who told him Pinochet received the news "with a lot of calm, but little optimism. He remains cautious."

If Straw rules against extradition, Pinochet's opponents have a few alternatives, all viewed as long shots — appealing to the High Court; attempting to launch a private prosecution; or convincing Britain's director of public prosecutions to bring action.

Even if Pinochet returns to Chile, he faces the prospect of prosecution.

Pablo Cabrera, Chile's ambassador in London, said Chilean law has been amended since the closing days of the Pinochet regime, when the dictator passed a wide-ranging law granting himself immunity from prosecution. Pinochet relinquished power in 1990 and became a senator for life.

An official Chilean government report says 3,197 people — including citizens of Spain and other countries — died or disappeared after the general led a coup to topple the elected Marxist president, Salvador Allende.

"The law in Chile allows the people and the tribunal to strip off immunity, as has been done already with another senator for other reasons," Cabrera told BBC Radio.

Pinochet has been detained in Britain since his Oct. 16, 1998, arrest in a London hospital on the Spanish warrant. He is accused of using torture to intimidate and silence political opponents throughout his dictatorship.

An official Chilean government report says 3,197 people — including citizens of Spain and other countries — died or disappeared after the general led a coup to topple the elected Marxist president, Salvador Allende.

Although the Spanish government said it would not challenge Britain's decision, legal and human rights activists in Spain said the 15-month legal battle against Pinochet proved that no one is above the law.

Rec Report

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Exercise Sessions

The exercise sessions at the Rec will have a new look this year. The Rec will still offer over 30 familiar exercise sessions for beginning, intermediate and advanced participants, but the sessions have a new name.

"We want to keep our sessions updated," Robin Leaper, Assistant Director of Aquatics and Building Operations, said. "An example is adding KardioKick last semester. We like offering a new and wide variety of sessions."

In addition to changing the names, the Rec is offering two new sessions for spring 2000. HIIT, High Intensity Interval Training, combines alternating 30-second increments of extreme aerobic activity and lower intensity movements. The session will be 30 minutes long due to the high intensity of the workout and will also include toning. This exercise session is geared towards people who are advanced in their workout.

The second new session offered is Body Blast, a total body workout focusing on strength, flexibility and balance. "The instructors thought of this class," Leaper said. "They thought of this so that people could practice and learn proper form for movements in KardioKick, but it is not limited to just those who take KardioKick. It is for anyone who wants to develop strength, flexibility and balance."

Other Sessions

Hi/Lo: high and low impact floor work with energetic choreography
Step 1: intense entry-level step class
IM Step: challenging footwork and increased exercise intensity
Turbo Step: advanced step; prior experience recommended
Team Training: strength and endurance workout alternating sets of sport specific skills
AeroStep: combinations of aerobics, step and toning
Cardio Plus: Kickboxing moves incorporated on the bench for a higher intensity workout

Kickboxing

Karate kick, cross-over hook and uppercut your way to a healthy body. KardioKick, formerly known as kickboxing, is the hottest thing on campus.

The Rec began offering the kickboxing session last semester because of the high demand.

"The students wanted it. We added it to our exercise sessions because it was highly requested," Robin Leaper, Assistant Director of Aquatics and Building Operations, said.

The session, which can best be described as an intense workout combining karate style kicks and boxing-style punches, is offered Tuesday and Thursday evenings from 5:25-6:25 p.m. But if you want to get a spot, you better get there early. On average, 100 to 150 people attend each session.

Working It Out

The new millennium is here and the new Wildcat Workout schedule is ready with new and exciting exercise sessions. Bring a friend and make exercise a part of your new routine. There is a variety of exercise sessions available for everyone! All fitness sessions are offered at varying times throughout the week.

My Favorite Workout

Philip Gill first came to the Rec as a freshman. He hasn't stopped since. Gill, a Management Information Systems major from Wetmore, Kan., began coming to the Rec for pick-up basketball games. Since then, Gill, now a junior, has evolved his workout from recreation oriented to fitness oriented. Gill comes to the Rec five to six days a week. He has three workouts he does in order to get the most out of every workout. His first workout consists of upper-body weight lifting. His second workout consists of lower-body weight lifting, while his third workout is an aerobic activity, usually a two and a half to three-mile run.

Gill believes there are other benefits in addition to staying healthy by coming to the Rec.

"It is a stress-reliever," he said. "I like to come and get away from my classes and also to stay in shape. I was athletic in high school and I'd like to stay that way."

Whether with friends or by himself, you can count on finding Gill at the Rec.

Fitness Facts

Men who are muscular have more calorie-burning power during aerobic exercise than nonmuscular men of the same weight, according to a recent study conducted at the University of Massachusetts in Boston.

Research Quarterly for Exercise and Sport, Vol. 70, No. 2, pp. 150-6

Who's Who???

A junior in Management Information Systems, Chirag Patel is an assistant building manager for the Rec. He helps take care of equipment, makes sure Rec users are using the equipment correctly, answers questions and assists in the overall running of the building.

Patel, from Atwood, Kan., applied for the position in May 1998 and has been working at the Rec ever since.

"I have always been athletic. I'd go out for all the sports and was into weight lifting. I thought working at the Rec would be a good job for me to have since I had some experience in the area," Patel said.

Patel said the job opened his eyes to things the general public does not think about.

"I didn't realize all the hard work and different things we have to do at 6 a.m. to get the Rec ready for all the people," Patel said.

Patel graduates in December 2000 and would like to stay at K-State to get his MBA. He would also like to continue working at the Rec, a job he very much enjoys.

"I get to help and see a lot of students throughout the day since it is the most widely used facility on campus," he said.

Molly Fruin, a senior in Kinesiology and Nutrition, has worked two years at the Rec as an exercise leader. She first became interested in being an exercise leader when she took aerobics.

"I loved taking aerobics. When I got the opportunity to learn how to be an aerobics instructor, the Rec was the main place I wanted to work because of the location and being able to work with the college population," Fruin said.

The Marshalltown, Iowa, native hopes to use her aerobics experience in her future career plans. After graduating in May 2001, Fruin would like to spend a year getting her license to become a registered dietician. Other possible plans include working in corporate fitness or a large athletic club in a director's position. Eventually, she would like to get her masters in exercise physiology and teach at a college or university.

As for now, Fruin is enjoying her time as an exercise leader

"I like getting to know the regulars in the classes," Fruin said. "It is nice being able to use what I'm learning in school, answering people's questions and helping them out."

B-ball Officials Wanted

Recreational Services will be hiring and training Basketball Officials for the upcoming season. Training sessions will be held beginning Mon., Jan. 24-26 at 5 p.m. each night at the Recreation Complex.

Attendance is required at all three sessions. You do not have to be experienced in basketball officiating. We will train and prepare you to be the best official you can be. Come on out and give it a shot!

Nutrition Notes

Make healthy choices that fit your lifestyle so you can do the things you want to do. Start by making small changes over time in what you eat and your activity level. Expand your tastes to enjoy a variety of foods. Balance what you eat and your activity level over several days. Don't worry too much over just one meal or one day. Enjoy all foods. Just don't get carried away and overdo it. And, last but not least, be active on a regular basis. Walking the dog qualifies.

King observance week reaches all ethnicities

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

A week-long tribute to civil rights activist Martin Luther King Jr. kicks off Saturday and continues through Jan. 21.

"It's a tremendous undertaking," said Dennis Wilson, co-chairman of the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week Committee.

The committee worked in conjunction with the Manhattan Community Task Force to plan a week filled with activities highlighting the importance of diversity.

Kathy Greene, co-chairwoman of the committee, said it was important that the week be one of diverse activities.

"His legacy is for us to interact positively with one another regardless of ethnic background and circumstance," Greene said.

Greene said King led a movement to establish rights for all people, regardless of their ethnicity or socioeconomic status.

"He was talking about inalienable rights for everybody, and how everybody — not just black people, are entitled to these rights," Wilson said. "His message is for everyone."

GUINIER

Wilson said it is possible to reach more people by having diverse activities.

"By everyone being involved, it allows us to reach a lot of different people with different backgrounds," Wilson said.

A community-service project called "A Day On, Not A Day Off" will take place throughout the K-State and Manhattan community Monday.

The K-State Community Service Program contacted churches, residence halls, social-service clubs, campus clubs and K-12 schools, asking them to volunteer time to help with activities.

"It's good to get hands on involvement with people in the community," Shanna Burruss, student coordinator, said.

With more than 100 current volunteers and 15 agencies, they plan on working with various aspects of the community. She said their projects would include park cleanup, painting projects, spending time with children and the elderly, renovation projects and Habitat for Humanity.

Burruss said King strongly believed in community involvement and interaction.

"Instead of people taking the day off, we encourage getting involved with the community for the day," Burruss said.

They hope to obtain around 300 volunteers for the day-long event.

At 6 p.m. Monday, people will gather at All Faiths Chapel for a candlelight vigil and memorial walk.

"The candlelighting is to symbolize the civil rights movement and the marches that he used to lead," Greene said.

After the vigil, the group will lead a memorial walk around campus.

"It will be paying tribute to his memory and the marches he lead," Greene said.

The keynote speaker for the observance week is Lani Guinier, professor at Harvard Law School. Her presentation, part of the University Distinguished Lecturers Series, will begin 7 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

Guinier was the first black woman to receive tenure at the law school, and in 1993, she became the first black woman to be nominated to lead the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice. She gained public attention when President Clinton withdrew her nomination prior to confirmation hearings after controversy over her views on affirmative action arose.

"This is what K-State students need to flock to. She is a very experienced speaker and has gone through a lot," Wilson said. "She'll be pretty exciting."

Guinier will address various issues related to the observance week.

She is the author of several books and will be available to sign them following her presentation.

"We are trying to fulfill his legacy," Greene said. "We're trying to get people to commit to his philosophy not just this week, but all through the year."

"HIS MESSAGE IS FOR EVERYONE."

Former pitcher faces charges of attempted rape

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

Former K-State baseball pitcher Brett Reid will face arraignment later this month on charges of attempted rape and aggravated sexual battery.

At a preliminary hearing Thursday, District Court Judge Paul Wright ruled that probable cause existed to schedule the arraignment, which will take place at 10:30 a.m. Jan. 24.

Assistant County Attorney Bernard Irvine said the preliminary hearing takes places for two reasons.

"At a preliminary hearing, the judge must determine whether there is probable cause to believe a felony was committed and probable cause to believe the defendant committed that felony," Irvine said.

Reid will remain free on bond as long as he refrains from contact with the alleged victim or her family.

The incident for which Reid faces arraignment occurred Oct. 30, 1999. At Thursday's hearing, an amended complaint presented to the court stated that Reid allegedly "pinned" the victim on a bed and

Library funding excluded from Graves's budget

By ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Students will be alone in helping fund the library in the 2000-2001 school year.

Gov. Bill Graves did not include the $2 per-credit-hour match to the student's $1 per-credit-hour tuition fee in his budget for the upcoming fiscal year.

The tuition fee is predicted to generate about $504,000 for the library. The matching state funds would have tripled that figure.

Although Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said he is disappointed about the state budget not including the match, he said he was not entirely surprised.

"Considering all the bad news about the current budget and the budget for next year — in other words, that revenues are not up to expectation — I'm not surprised that the match is not in there, but very pleased that the tuition fee portion remains in the governor's budget," he said.

Beside the matching fund not being included in the budget, the request for an Other Operating Expense increase was not granted. OOE is a line in the governor's budget that covers all expenses other than salaries.

"One of the other distressing news is the fact that the other-operating-expense recommendation is zero," Hobrok said. "You have to realize that half of the other library budget is other-operating-expenses."

SGA outlines goals for semester

By AMY CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

Time is winding down for Student Governing Association members hoping to accomplish the goals they adopted in a resolution last fall.

"The resolution included increasing awareness of social service, better educating students about privilege fees, completion of the SGA Web page, restructuring changes to residence hall meal plan, online voting for SGA elections, technology for students, splitting finals over the weekend and the campus- and city-wide transportation issue," Jake Worcester, Student Senate chair, said.

The first part of the school year was spent researching the feasibility of many projects on the SGA agenda. The second part will be devoted to implementing the plans.

Worcester said the Web page now is complete, and students will be able to vote online in the next SGA election. He said he believes the addition of online voting will increase voter participation.

"In some schools, online voting has increased voter turnout by 200 percent," Worcester said.

Travis Lenkner, governmental relations chair, said things are just beginning to heat up. Within the next week, Lenkner's committee will be meeting with the Kansas Board of Regents to discuss issues affecting higher learning in Kansas, he said. Lenkner said he then will take any Senate legislation passed regarding the regents to the Kansas Legislature, where he will use the Senate bills to lobby for K-State.

"We have a light fall semester, and then in the spring everything happens all at once," Lenkner said. "I will be in Topeka up to three times a week lobbying for students, keeping as much funding in the budget as we can."

Another issue approved and put into action by SGA has been joining Campus Compact, a national organization that promotes civic development through educational involvement. Jason Heinrich, student body president, said participation in Campus Compact can earn grants, fellowships and scholarships for Education proposal includes tax increase of $100 million

By DAVID MILES
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Saying Kansas could set educational standards for the nation, Senate President Dick Bond on Thursday announced an ambitious $100 million tax increase for schools.

"I'm going to introduce a tax bill for education, and it will pass sometime," Bond, R-Overland Park, said before a joint meeting of the House and Senate Education committees.

Bond, who is not running for re-election this year, said he would introduce a tax increase bill next week. The extra money would go into an education fund and could help pay for Bond's broad, 10-point education plan, which he unveiled in September and described Thursday to the committees.

Called First in Class, the plan includes a proposal requiring school districts to consider making students wear uniforms.

It also would lengthen the school year, require students to have a speaking knowledge of Spanish and demonstrate basic skills mastery before graduating from high school, and would establish all-day kindergarten statewide.

The plan also includes abolishing tenure for teachers and ensuring that all schools have access to current technology.

Bond said he did not know how much his plan would cost, although he noted that a proposal to have all-day kindergarten would cost $69 million a year. He also said connecting schools

Wal-Mart, city of Manhattan schedule court appearance

Parties for Wal-Mart and the city of Manhattan are scheduled to appear in court Feb. 7 to determine the status of Wal-Mart's ongoing lawsuit against the city.

In August the Manhattan City Commission unanimously turned down a re-zoning application that would have allowed Wal-Mart to build a supercenter. The proposed supercenter would have been built near the intersection of Seth Child Road and Fort Riley Boulevard.

Manhattan Project L.L.C. filed a lawsuit in October to see if the decision made by the commissioners was made inappropriately.

"Attorneys on both sides are working on various issues," William Frost, city attorney, said.

Bruce Snead, city commissioner, said the lawsuit will be drawn out for an extended time period. "They have filed their papers, and we have filed ours," Snead said. "In these situations it's a month long process."

Fourteen citizens, represented by Price T. Banks of Lawrence, back the city in the lawsuit.

7-year-old triplets, firefighter perish in house fire in Maine

UNITY, Maine — As neighbors and family friends wept, the bodies of three 7-year-old triplets were pulled from the charred wreckage of their home.

The boys were identified as Josh, Marcus and Brydon Freyer. Carmen Freyer, 28, the boys' mother, was hospitalized in good condition after escaping with her 2-year-old daughter. A firefighter collapsed at the blaze and later died.

Neighbor Todd Converse helped save the daughter after hearing Freyer calling for help Wednesday. He ran into a smoke-filled, glass-enclosed porch in the back of the house in this college and farming town about 30 miles southwest of Bangor.

"I saw two little feet, and I grabbed her," he said. The diaper-clad child was covered with soot, he said. As rescuers led Freyer away, she looked back at her home and repeatedly screamed, "I love you."

Two neighbors sobbed and held each other while watching the house burn: Danielle Creasy, who said she baby-sat the triplets, and family friend Tammy Knowlton.

Teachers from Unity Elementary School, where the triplets were enrolled in a special-education program, watched silently. Neighbors said the boys' father, Kurt Freyer, was out of state driving a truck.

Firefighters also mourned the loss of comrade Robert M. Jones, 48, the Waldo County sheriff and a part-time firefighter. He was pronounced dead at Maine General Medical Center, a hospital spokesman said. Jones used to be chief of the Unity fire department.

Firefighter Mike Heath appeared shaken after learning of Jones' death, throwing down his helmet and coat. He was consoled by other firefighters and deputies.

"Right now, I'm not even thinking straight," said Dennis Turner, the town fire chief, who said he had known Jones since 1972.

State fire marshals are investigating the blaze.

Gay minorities with AIDS surpass white counterparts

ATLANTA — For the first time since AIDS captured the nation's attention in the early 1980s, more black and Hispanic gay men were diagnosed with the disease than white gay men in 1998.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported Thursday that minorities represent 52 percent of 18,153 gay and bisexual men who were diagnosed with AIDS in 1998. By contrast, minorities represented 31 percent in 1989.

Black men made up one-third of the cases, while Hispanics represented 18 percent.

Researchers at the CDC said the report suggests that the stigma of homosexuality plays a role in spreading the disease among minority groups. Blacks and Hispanics are less likely to identify themselves as gay or seek AIDS prevention and treatment services, they said.

"Clearly, all the evidence suggests that it's harder to be a gay man of color in this society than it is to be a white gay man," said Dr. Helene Gayle, director of the CDC's national center for prevention of HIV, sexually transmitted diseases and tuberculosis.

The report found that many black and Hispanic men who have sex with men do not identify themselves as gay.

In a survey of 8,780 HIV-infected men who had sex with other men, researchers asked, "Do you think of yourself as: heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual or other?" Nearly one quarter — 24 percent — of black men and 18 percent of Hispanics considered themselves heterosexual.

Only 6 percent of white men in the survey identified themselves as heterosexual.

Gayle said trends identified several years ago led researchers to project that the number of non-white gay men with AIDS would surpass whites, but the increase happened faster than expected.

"The tendency to equate gay and white has persisted," she said. "People have totally ignored the consistent fact that gay men of color have always been the largest single risk category for men ... and this issue is never talked about."

Cancer-stricken 6-year-old allowed to keep treehouse

TAMPA, Fla. — A neighborhood association has backed down from its demands that the family of a 6-year-old boy suffering from leukemia tear down his treehouse.

Liz DeAmbrose, a real estate agent who is president of Palm Owners Association, said a letter from Brage Sassin's oncologist allows the association to grant the family an exception to its rules.

"He feels that it's in the best interest of the child to leave the playhouse exactly the way that it is for his emotional well-being," DeAmbrose said.

His parents said the treehouse is the one place where Brage seems to forget he is sick

Officials prepare for peak flu season in Kansas

BY TERENCE LEWIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Health officials around the state of Kansas are gearing up for the peak month of the flu season. Over the past few weeks, influenza-type illnesses have been showing up in many hospitals across the state in large numbers.

"We have seen some regions with more cases than others," said Sharon Watson, public information director for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. "The south-central and north-central regions are receiving the most cases at this point."

Influenza, which is dominant during the winter months, is said to be making its way through Kansas. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates that during this season 10-20 percent of the U.S. population will be infected, and that includes an equal percentage of Manhattan's population. On average, 20,000 Americans die from influenza complications each year.

"The south-central and north central regions are receiving the most cases at this point."

— Sharon Watson, public information director for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

The virus, which weakens the body and infects the respiratory tract, can spread through the residence halls and classrooms of K-State easily, Watson said. The different lifestyles of students in college, with varying sleeping habits, stress and constant traveling, can take a toll on the immune system and make some students more susceptible to the virus.

"A lot of times in January, after students come back from Christmas break and being around family and friends, hospitals see a lot of influenza cases," Watson said.

She said students also are at increased risk because they come in contact with a variety of people from day to day.

If left untreated, the flu virus can erupt into bacterial pneumonia, among other complications. Some symptoms of the flu include chills, sore throat and soreness in the head, neck, back or muscles.

However, the flu mutates inside an infected person for between one and five days before symptoms appear.

Pam Wilke, an infection control specialist at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue, said a vaccine is the best preventive measure against the flu. She said the elderly and those who might develop serious complications from the virus definitely should get the flu shot, as should health-care workers, teenagers and young children.

However, she said the vaccine is somewhat hit-or-miss.

"The flu mutates and changes, so they have to get strains and try to make vaccines from the last season," she said. "It's an inactive flu virus, and that's what they put inside of us with the vaccine.

1,400 flu shots given to students at Lafene

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Time is running out for those who still want to prevent the flu from hitting them this year.

Clarice Holmes, clinic coordinator for Lafene Health Center, said there are only about 60 doses of the influenza vaccination left. She said more than 1,400 vaccinations have been given to students, faculty and staff members since October, and only a certain number of doses are available each year.

"There have been a number of people both Wednesday and Thursday who have come in to get their flu shots," Holmes said. "If it continues at this pace, we will be out of doses in the next couple of weeks."

The typical flu season begins at the beginning of December and lasts until the end of February. Dr. Earl Reppert, medical director for Lafene, said this time of year typically features the highest number of flu cases.

"This is the peak time for the flu season," Reppert said. "As classes begin, we will start to see the number of flu cases at Lafene pick up."

Reppert said estimates are made in March for how many doses of flu vaccine will be needed. He said that once the doses are out, it is almost impossible to receive more until the following October.

Reppert said the flu vaccine is about 85-percent effective in preventing the flu, and it is important for those who have chronic health problems such as asthma, cancer and heart disease to receive the shot each year. He said some people might have a more difficult time handling the flu without it.

"We started seeing cases of the flu two to three weeks before the end of last semester," Reppert said. "I expect that as everyone returns to classes, we will begin to see more this year."

Reppert said flu symptoms can include cough, fever, chills, body aches, headaches and sore throat. However, he said nausea and vomiting are not normally associated with the flu but are symptoms for other viral infections.

"People hear the word flu and automatically associate nausea and stomach pains to that infection," Reppert said. "However, the flu is classed as a respiratory illness, and other symptoms not commonly linked with that will not be helped by the vaccination or our medications."

Both Reppert and Holmes said the recent trend of more students and faculty members getting the flu shot could be linked to a number of reasons, including awareness and the fear of getting sick during busy periods of the school year.

"So many were sick last year, and they noticed that the ones who did get the shot were not the ones who got sick," Holmes said. "Students are also becoming more aware that we do offer it and do not have the time to get sick."

Jessica Coleman, freshmen in nutrition and exercise science, said she has received the flu shot for the past several years. She said she hasn't gotten the flu, but is glad she got the vaccination as added protection.

"If more students have the opportunity to get the vaccination through places like Lafene, they might be better off in the long run," Coleman said.

Reppert said he has noticed that many cases of the flu have occurred around finals week, and he said that once students get sick once, they don't want to get sick again.

"We start contacting those patients with chronic health problems to let them know we have the vaccine in October," Reppert said. "The great majority of young, healthy Americans will handle the flu fine, but it is still a good idea to get the vaccine."

Reppert said the flu shot covers both strands of the virus — Influenza A and B. He said there are now anti-viral medications that can aid in shortening the illness and making the symptoms less severe. However, he said these medications must be taken within 48 hours of the appearance of symptoms.

A nasal spray also might be available next year as a vaccine along with the shot, but Reppert said the cost was not known at this time.

Avoiding the flu

Clarice Holmes, clinic coordinator for Lafene Health Center,said there is a recent trend of more students and faculty getting the flu shot.

In 1997-98, Lafene gave 598 injections.

In 1998-99, Lafene gave 1400+ injections.

This year, it ordered 1500 doses of the vaccine. There only are about 60 doses left.

For more information on the flu vaccination, contact Lafene at 532-6544.

Holiday offers chance for Americans to celebrate diversity

Martin Luther King Jr. fought for the civil rights of everyone, not just blacks.

Therefore, it is fitting that all Americans, not just blacks, will honor King and his struggle for civil rights with a holiday on Monday.

But what King stood for cannot truly be honored with a holiday. A holiday is a day of inactivity. King, however, paved the road toward civil rights through a lifetime of dedicated work.

It is logical, then, that the theme for Monday's holiday is "A day on, not a day off." The day offers a way for Americans to commemorate King by giving back to the community through volunteer service, interracial cooperation and anti-violence initiatives, much as King did.

But there will be many people who will hit the snooze Monday and won't crawl out of bed, and even those people can do something to honor King's memory. Simply making an effort to learn more about King and what he fought for is a great way for everyone to take part, even with minimal effort.

The K-State community will be celebrating Martin Luther King Jr. Week beginning Saturday. All students of all races and backgrounds will have an opportunity to experience speakers and events on campus that they might never again have the opportunity to view.

The week's events kick off with a town hall meeting Saturday at City Hall and wrap up with a gospel concert by the Blind Boys of Alabama on Friday in McCain Auditorium.

Between these two events is the week's keynote speaker, Lani Guinier. Guinier was President Clinton's nominee for assistant attorney general for civil rights in 1993. She was denied the appointment, however, when controversy sprung up regarding her alleged support of quotas for minorities.

An impressive list of events has been compiled for the week's lineup. All the week needs now to be a success is for students to take part. People from Kansas, a state that is not one of the country's most diverse, should jump at the chance to expand their horizons.

Martin Luther King Jr. died during the war for civil rights. Today, we can get involved with much less of a sacrifice — self-education.

EXPLOITATION

Use of men, women's bodies to sell products on television, at K-State progresses daily

Sex.

It's in the movies we watch, in the music we listen to, and on the pages of countless books and magazines we read. Sex and sexuality are all around us and have become a part of our daily lives. Sex has become such a large part of our society that it is actually used to sell more than just lingerie and condoms. Now sex is used to sell everything from clothes and cars to music and food.

These all-too-familiar ads use seductive women and rugged men erotically posing in ways accentuating their distinguishing physical features, whether it is their narrow hips, burly shoulders, plentiful bosom or muscular pecs.

Originally, these types of ads were used only to sell lingerie, alcohol, cigarettes and adult entertainment. Since this style has spread to other markets and products, not even children are immune. Let's face it — sex sells, whether you like it or not.

Regardless of one's personal opinion towards these types of advertisements, it is impossible to forget the ones by Victoria's "Not So Secret" Secrets, Culligan, Hanes and Calvin Klein. These ads focus more on the flashes of flesh and less on the product, often making the inclusion of the product appear to be an afterthought. More recently, this philosophy has spilled over into the entertainment industry, where it has taken on an entirely different and ugly face.

What was once equal objectification of both sexes has been turned into the sexual exploitation of women. Examples of this exploitation abound on cable television and in the movies, from the Nitro Girls of World Championship Wrestling to the Bond girls featured throughout the 19 James Bond movies. Even more explicit are the countless movies that feature unnecessary female nudity, such as Diz and Rico's sex scene in "Starship Troopers."

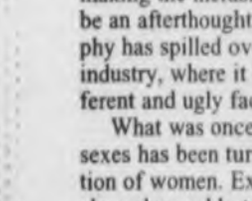
This acceptance of occasional, brief nudity has paved the way for other media and magazines, such as Maxim, to produce unregulated soft-porn versions of Playboy.

A drawback to this trend is the production and acceptance of male chauvinistic attitudes and ideals toward women's appearance. The culmination of this attitude can be found in each and every episode of "The Man Show," in which a woman's value is determined by the way she looks and acts (sexy and submissive). As a result, many women and young girls, such as Britney Spears and Melissa Joan Hart, have been driven to change their appearance to attain a wider range of acceptance.

Tragically, this potentially destructive trend can be found here at K-State. Campus flyers, the publicity of bar-related social events, and numerous pictures and advertisements bound in the Collegian are just a few examples. The advertisements for Goodnow Hall's "Nothing But Sex, Sex, Sex" week were often focused toward men. They used lewd female pictures and drawings with provocative subscripts to attract interest.

This inequality has even spilled over into surrounding community events associated with the students of K-State. As a result, the models of Patricia's Undercover Lingerie are now no better or different than those of Victoria's Secrets. Also, the advertisements for social events featuring women are far more dominant and widespread than those featuring men. Even our own Collegian prefers to flaunt pictures and drawings of well-endowed young women. Let's face it, even here in the America's heartland, sex sells.

The use of sex to improve ratings and increase sales isn't the real problem. The potentially destructive problem lies in the fact that the word "sex" has become synonymous with well-endowed young women who wear a size 6. This association has resulted in the use of a bouncing plot line to become standard in productions such as "Bay watch."



A step in the right direction are the Men & Women of K-State calendars and the 2000 Royal Purple Yearbook advertisements, due to their less destructive portrayal of both sexes. Inadvertently, this equality reduces sexual exploitation to a level that allows everyone to be comfortable with who they are and simply results in the less harmful act of sexual objectification.

Until there is a shift in what is acceptable in the hearts and minds of those within our society, simply relying on total equality will not bring about a long lasting change in the trend to exploit "perfect" women.

Americans have advantage of freedom, hope for the future

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

Her name was America.

Her voice was soft like silk, speaking words that didn't need to have meaning. Words that couldn't have a shared meaning due to lack of communication.

She had eyes that were brown — inquisitive — filled with too many hopes of the past, since flooded with resignation.

For $10, American money, she braided my hair.

Together we talked a little, but as much as we possibly could. Mostly our conversation was dominated by verbal silence, as we listened to the ocean crash into the land of Mexico.

The place where I could leave by just declaring my U.S. citizenship — leave with my treasured souvenirs of handmade sandals and tequila with the worm; leave freely, the land where some lived in beautiful houses, but far more lived in misery.

Misery that sometimes can't be explained and the full extent of which cannot be viewed.

Chains of little choice and poverty tied America's feet to the ground. Granted, she had options to leave, but she could not leave freely.

The water continued to crash less than 500 feet away from her home. Her place had a breathtaking view. It was easy to imagine her watching tourists ride on horseback as the sunset put the final touches on the days' canvas.

But her view could not be watched from her back-porch swing or even a window overlooking the scene. Instead, it could be watched from her tent.

America lived in a tent with her husband, Enrique, and their young daughter.

A tent that most on the other side of the border would refuse to use on a camping trip due to its small size was what her family lived in. Like sardines in a tin, dreaming of a better life.

Yet there were far more who lived in worse conditions: those who were living in shacks with carpet samples used as doors, those who didn't have even a tent to call their own.

In the United States, there is poverty and homelessness. There are those who were behind in life the day they were born. But there is something that they are granted with that puts them at an advantage.

That advantage is the freedom of U.S. citizenship.

The enrichment of having a government that regardless of how corrupt it can be at times still generally has its intentions in the promise "of and for the people."

A government that usually helps, not hurts its people.

For the United States has a helping hand. True, there are those who take advantage of the system and manipulate it. Yet there are those who build from the helping hand and grow to depend, not on the government, but on their own skills. Those who grow from the helping hand but don't depend on it for their mere survival.

One of my sociology professors used to say, "You don't see true poverty, the worst poverty that one can see, until you leave the United States."

Besides this poverty, there is something else that can be seen.

You also see hope, a small, but steady look of hope in one's eye when looking to a better life: a better life that extends beyond a tent, and beyond homes that we call shacks; a life that goes beyond dreams, hopes and fears.

A life that most of us have been born into, without knowing the full extent of how lucky we are.

Web sees increase in textbook sales

Shop-at-home convenience makes online book buying a popular choice.

Students now have the option not to stand in line to purchase textbooks.

For the past few years, online textbook vendors have been providing alternatives for students.

AnyStudent.com, which compiles information for college students, provides a price comparison for online book vendors and presents the best prices for students looking to purchase books online.

Adrian Sisser, co-founder of AnyStudent.com, said the Web site has seen a huge increase in the number of people buying books online rather than just looking.

"Students have really began to start purchasing online more and more," Sisser said.

Sisser said buying books online has many advantages that are appealing to students.

"Online bookstores offer significantly lower prices, and it is more convenient since students can just order them from their dorm rooms," he said.

Jodi Gershoni, communications director for VarsityBooks.com, said students have been turning to the Web to order their books because of the value and the hassle-free nature of the service.

"It really is a perfect product," she said. "There are no hassles with ordering books online and the students have enjoyed the values."

Gershoni said textbooks ordered online are delivered to the student in one to three business days.

"In addition to the cheap delivery, we offer up to 40 percent off new textbooks," Gershoni said.

Despite all of the advantages online textbook vendors provide, there are some things they cannot accomplish.

Dan Walter, textbook manager for Varney's Book Store in Aggieville, said the main concern for students is to receive textbooks in a timely manner and at a good price.

"Local bookstores can provide a better service to students because of several factors," Walter said.

"We have an accurate book list at all times, a full-time staff to help customers, and simply because we are a part of the campus community."

Walter said the success of online bookstores has had no significant effect on business at Varney's.

"We have hundreds of students that preorder their books through our online Web site and still all of the students that come into the store to get their books as well," Walter said. "The reality is that the effect on Varney's has been insignificant."

Sara Anderson, freshman in architectural engineering, said she has never bought books online.

"I think the only thing that I am afraid of is that I would get the wrong books and not have enough time to get the right ones," Anderson said.

Cosmo covered up on news stands

■ Magazine-cover blinders placed to curb concerns.

BY GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cosmopolitan magazines in all Kroger Co.-affiliated stores nationwide will be covered from the name down.

Dillons stores in Kansas will be following suit, said Dennis Gaschler, public-relations coordinator for Dillons.

"It was brought about in response to complaints from customers," Gaschler said. "They had concerns regarding inappropriate language and content in the magazine,"

Gaschler said the magazine will be covered partially at the racks in the checkout lines with only the title visible to the public.

"The blinders will only be at the checkouts," Gaschler said. "They won't be used in the magazine aisles of the store, and keep in mind that at the checkouts the Cosmopolitan name will be visible. Only the headlines will be covered."

"The magazines are to be covered in most stores this week."

— Dennis Gaschler, public-relations coordinator for Dillons stores

The blinder racks will be in place in Dillons stores across the state as soon as possible, Gaschler said.

"The magazines are to be covered in most stores this week," he said. "If not, it is supposed to be completed this weekend."

Matt Dill, sophomore in electrical engineering, said he understands the need for the magazine to be covered in the case of children.

"When little kids read the headlines on the cover of the magazine, it is inappropriate because I know when I have kids I don't want them to read things like that," Dill said. "Personally, though, the cover doesn't bother me because I think that I am mature enough to handle it."

Jenell Pope, junior in elementary education, also said she understands the reasoning behind the action, although she said she believes another solution could be found.

"I can see both sides of the argument, but covering the magazine seems extreme," Pope said. "They could do something else like placing it high enough so that kids can't see it."

Exhibits, workshop to showcase ceramic art

■ Professors' work opens Jan. 21 in Wamego show.

Ceramics fans who want a take on the art form that is a bit more professional than Demi Moore and Patrick Swayze's in "Ghost" might want to go to the Columbian Theatre, Museum and Art Center in Wamego.

Although the Columbian's exhibit might not be as scintillating as the big-screen version, it is highly worthwhile.

The artwork of five professors from the Glasgow School of Art in Scotland will be on display from Jan. 22 to March 4.

One of the featured artists is Professor Archie McCall, head of ceramics at the Glasgow School.

McCall also will be visiting K-State in March as part of a faculty-student exchange program between the schools.

As a part of McCall's campus visit, he will conduct a workshop that will include slides of his work and the actual production of pieces.

Anna Calluori Holcombe, head of the K-State Department of Art, encouraged everyone to attend the exhibit and McCall's workshop in March.

"His work appeals to people interested in art in general," Calluori Holcombe said.

The exhibit also would be of interest to those wanting to view ceramics that are not run-of-the-mill.

Gallery coordinator Margaret Buie said the featured artwork has a distinctive style.

"His pieces don't look quite like what you see every day in the Midwest," Buie said.

She attributes the originality of the pieces to the creative standards in Scottish art, which place high value on workmanship and craftsmanship.

For people wanting to view McCall's and his associates' work firsthand, the exhibit opening will be from 5:30 to 7 p.m. Jan. 21. In keeping with the Scottish art theme, Celtic musician Alan Macfarlane will be on hand to entertain the crowd.

The exhibit also will be on display during the Columbian's regular winter hours, Tuesday through Saturday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

WOMEN REBOUND TO COLLEGE STATION FOLLOWING 1ST CONFERENCE WIN

K-State senior forward Nicky Ramage sets herself to shoot over Baylor defender Hilary Akromis. The Wildcats won the game 73-58.

STORY BY MICHAEL NOLL

Two teams heading in opposite directions in the conference standings will meet Saturday.

The K-State women's basketball team will travel to College Station to play Texas A&M.

The Cats (8-8 , 1-2), will face an A&M (9-4, 1-2) team that played well in non-conference play but has struggled the past week, losing blowouts to Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

K-State, however, enters the game with its first conference victory, over Baylor, under its belt.

"This win helped this team get a lot of confidence back that we needed, and it just proved to us that we're ready to go down to College Station and take on A&M and get our first Big 12 road win," senior forward Nicky Ramage said. "A&M is going to be a tough game, and they have a lot of talent."

The Aggies are led in scoring by Jaynetta Saunders, who has been named Big 12 newcomer of the week three times. A&M's recent losses belie the fact that it features some talented players.

"They've got a great player in the post, not good, great in Jaynetta Saunders," head coach Deb Patterson said. "She's already been named newcomer of the week. She is in the top 25 in field-goal percentage in the country."

"Great talent, they've got guards that can break you down. So that's a very challenging game for us at A&M," she said.

Ramage said the team is taking things one game at a time.

"We're taking the mentality that that (Baylor) was just the first rung of the ladder, and we're going to just keep going," Ramage said.

The Cats continue playing with a methodical mentality despite the loss of senior Jenny Coalson, who will miss her seventh straight game due to a strained hip flexor.

"In losing Jenny, you lost that different dimension on the perimeter — that different sort of guard," Patterson said. "We don't have that versatile guard. Right now with Kristin Rethman and Kim Woodlee, we have two stand-still three-point shooters. And with April Sailors, we have again, for the fourth time in four years, a brand-new point guard on the floor running offense."

Patterson said the loss of Coalson has resulted in more turnovers than she would like, especially in transition. This might pose problems for the Cats on Saturday, since the Aggies average 13 steals a game.

Despite the slow conference start, senior center Angie Finkes remains optimistic.

"We could win all the rest of our games and be 14-2," Finkes said.

Tip-off for the game is 2 p.m., Saturday, in College Station.

First home meet tests young team

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This weekend is a starting point for the K-State track and field team.

The team will be host to the K-State Track Invitational men's and women's indoor meet today and Saturday in Ahearn Field House. It's also the first home meet of the new year.

Assistant track and field coach Michael Smith said the meet will serve as a good measuring stick for the team.

"We didn't see them for three weeks over break," Smith said, "so it is a chance to see where we are. It is really the early part of our season."

It will be the first action of the indoor season for several K-State athletes.

"For our cross country athletes, this is really their indoor season," Smith said.

K-State will compete with teams from Oklahoma State, Oklahoma Baptist and Emporia State universities and McKendree College. The meet, a part of the winter track season, will feature a variety of events unique to indoor track, such as the weight throw.

The meet will be scored individually, as well as by teams. Smith said the team's goal throughout the season will be to compete well in and out of the conference.

"We want to succeed at the national level as well as the Big 12," Smith said.

Smith said the track and field program, which is composed of two teams, is in different stages of development.

"Right now, our men's team is young and not as developed," Smith said. "This season our women's team is very talented and complete."

Wildcat fans should look to 'Cardiac Cats' for inspiration, spirit

VIEWPOINT

MIKE VIETTI

It's gut-check time for the K-State men's basketball program.

But not for the actual players on the team — it's gut-check time for the fans.

In true Jimmy Valvano fashion, the Wildcats refused to give up in Wednesday's 87-79 loss to KU, perhaps proving to all of us doubters that K-State isn't the 11th-best team in the Big 12 Conference, as they were picked in the preseason.

Now it's time for the fans to follow the team's lead.

I already wrote one of these stupid motivational-type columns about the men's basketball team, but from attendance figures it looks like we need another one.

The past two home games were over the winter break, but 6,084 fans for the Long Beach State game and 7,778 fans for the Old Dominion contest — those numbers are pathetic.

I actually thought about writing one of these Tony Robbins columns every week in the hopes that maybe the team would receive more support from fans, but then I remembered that most people don't read my columns and my die-hard readership (my father) probably would quit reading them, too.

Honestly though, on Wednesday, this team showed as much character as we have seen from a K-State men's basketball team since the "Cardiac Cats" back in 1994.

I must admit, even after the Wildcats' impressive 97-point outburst against Nebraska last Saturday, I wasn't convinced about this team — memories of K-State's 111-56 drubbing of Missouri a few years ago sprang up in my head. After that blowout victory, the Cats finished the season by going 7-11 in conference play.

This team is much better. Looking at the adversity the Wildcats have have faced this year, not losing to KU by more than 20 points could have been considered an accomplishment.

Senior forward Josh Reid broke his foot four games ago, and he is out indefinitely.

Injuries also have decimated the backcourt as sophomore guard Josh Kimm missed the first two games of the year recovering from an ACL injury he suffered over the summer; senior guard Cortez Groves tore up his hamstring and missed a couple of games a month ago; junior guard Galen Morrison has been fighting knee woes, and to cap off all that madness, sophomore forward Travis Reynolds left the KU game with an ankle injury.

But the Cats have fought the god of injury all year and did so again against the Jayhawks, outscoring them by 10 in the second half after trailing by 18 going into intermission.

Whatever head coach Tom Asbury said in the locker room at the half worked — the Wildcats seemed to believe they could beat KU for the first time in almost six years.

They even made a believer out of me.When K-State trimmed the lead to 15 I blurted out, "Whoop-dee-do, the score on Sportscenter won't look as bad."

When the Cats cut the lead to 10, I said, "Thanks, Roy, for letting us play with you for a little bit."

Even when the lead was narrowed to five, I said, "Don't worry, they'll still blow it."

But when Kimm drove on the baseline and connected on a layup to make the score 79-78 with 1:41 left, for the first time in probably five years, I believed.

It really was an epiphany of sorts for me. I was reminded of every ignorant statement I've made about the Cats the past few years.

I really almost wanted to beat myself up. I remember thinking, "I'm no better than any of those fools who do nothing but criticize the team, year in and year out when K-State has fielded pretty good teams under Asbury."

So where do the Wildcats go from here? At 8-5 overall, and 1-1 in conference play, I truly believe the sky is the limit. If K-State can hold its own in the Big 12, say something like a 10-6 mark, which is attainable in the mediocre conference, and make a decent showing in the Big 12 Tournament, the Wildcats will find themselves in the Big Dance for the first time in four years.

Basketball experts say guard play is the most important thing come tournament time, and if the KU game is any indication, the Wildcats can bank on that asset.

With Groves, Morrison, Kimm and freshman Kenyatta Dix, K-State has a combination of deadly shooters mixed with guys who can be floor leaders, and they play solid defense.

All that with crappy attendance. Just think what could happen if people actually showed up to the games and cheered.

Cats travel without Reynolds, try to avoid 0-2 road record

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Winning Big 12 road games has not been easy for the K-State Wildcats recently. It might not be any easier when the team travels to Columbia and takes on Missouri.

Last season, K-State was 1-7 in conference road games. With that in mind, it will try to avoid going 0-2 on the road to start this season.

"It's tough for anybody in our league to win on the road, I think," assistant coach Mark Fox said. "I think we're a better offense this year, though. Hopefully, that helps us more in those games, but the defense has to be consistent in order for us to win."

After starting conference play with a home victory against Nebraska, the Cats fell short in a come-from-behind effort against No. 8 Kansas. Now K-State (8-5, 1-1) is left searching for an identity.

The team will be searching for an identity without Travis Reynolds and Josh Reid. Reid went out Dec. 20 with a broken foot, and Reynolds is expected to miss three weeks because of a high ankle sprain. Reynolds was third on the team in rebounding, and he was averaging 5.4 points per game.

Fox said earlier in the day that the Cats would continue looking for ways to win.

"I think our identity right now might be, that in whatever situation we're in, our kids try to find ways to win," Fox said. "They're hungry to win, and each game will be different."

Junior forward Kelvin Howell said following the 87-79 loss to Kansas that despite using a team effort to challenge the Hawks for the win in the final minutes of play, playing close is not enough.

"It wasn't a moral victory," Howell said. "There are only wins and losses, and this is a loss. We don't want moral victories — we want wins. That's it."

So far this season, the Tigers have struggled, losing three of their past four contests, including their first conference game to Iowa State 86-81 a week ago. K-State's matchup with Missouri (8-6, 1-1) might not come at a better time.

Fox said Missouri's record can be misleading, because it has played a tough schedule that's included Indiana, Illinois and most recently Kentucky in a game Missouri lost 70-53.

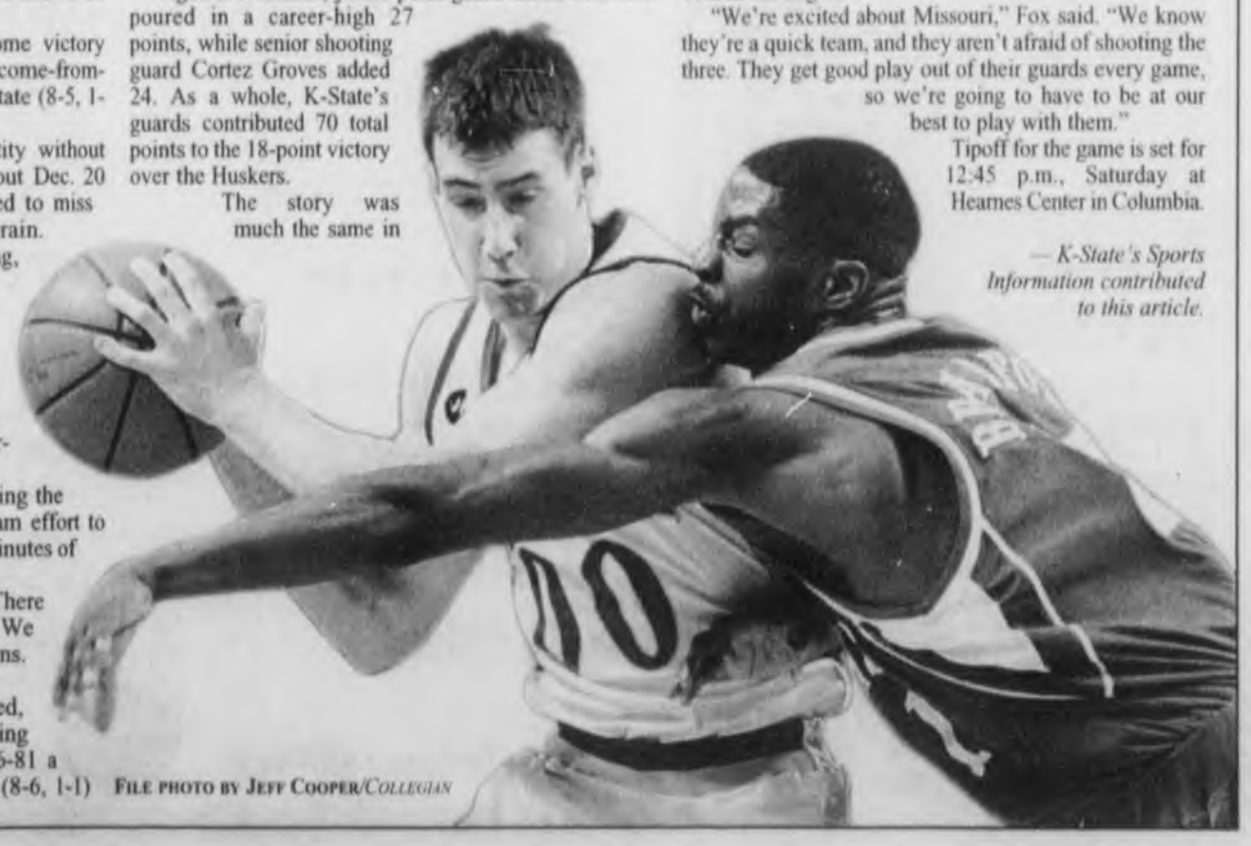
"We have to go there sometime, so there actually may not be a better time to do it," Fox said. "But I don't know if I'd say they are struggling, because they have one of the harder schedules in the country. If there is a time to go, it might as well be now."

For the Cats, the guard play has intensified since finishing the non-conference schedule.

Against Nebraska, junior point guard Galen Morrison poured in a career-high 27 points, while senior shooting guard Cortez Groves added 24. As a whole, K-State's guards contributed 70 total points to the 18-point victory over the Huskers.

The story was much the same in Lawrence when Groves led all Cats with 20 points, while Morrison chipped in with 15.

"Our guards have been really solid this year," Fox said. "We need to continue to be good there to, because our inside play has been a little erratic. But when we put both together, we're going to really challenge some teams."



The Tigers, who now are under the direction of Quin Snyder, are led by sophomore guard Keyon Dooling, who averages just over 16 points per game.

Also pacing the Tigers this season is sophomore guard Clarence Gilbert with 11.2 points per contest. Gilbert has made 41 percent of his three-pointers, which ranks him 11th in the Big 12.

"We're excited about Missouri," Fox said. "We know they're a quick team, and they aren't afraid of shooting the three. They get good play out of their guards every game, so we're going to have to be at our best to play with them."

Tipoff for the game is set for 12:45 p.m., Saturday at Hearnes Center in Columbia.

13-year-old boy convicted of murder to be held in detention until age 21

BY DAVID GOODMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PONTIAC, Mich. — A judge Thursday spared a 13-year-old murderer from spending the rest of his life in prison, ordering Nathaniel Abraham to be held in juvenile detention until age 21, when he will be released.

Nathaniel was convicted of an adult charge of second-degree murder, but the judge called the law under which he was charged fundamentally flawed.

"While there is no guarantee Nathaniel will be rehabilitated at 21, it is clear 10 years is enough to accomplish this goal," Judge Eugene Moore said Thursday.

Nathaniel was 11 years old when he shot Ronnie Greene Jr. on Oct. 29, 1997, outside a Pontiac convenience store. He has been held in a juvenile facility since he was arrested two days later.

The case gained national attention when Nathaniel became the first youth charged with first-degree murder to be prosecuted under a 1997 Michigan law that allows adult prosecutions of children of any age in serious felony cases.

In the debate over how to treat young offenders, some law officers said Nathaniel proves the need to get tough with kids who are a menace to society. Amnesty International chose his frightened face to illustrate the cover of a 1998 report condemning America's justice system as being too harsh on juveniles.

Judge Moore had several options, ranging from life in prison with a chance of parole to a sentence of time already served. Prosecutors had sought a blended sentence of juvenile detention until age 21, followed by a decision on possible adult imprisonment.

But Moore said if society is committed to preventing future criminal behavior, rehabilitation through the juvenile system is the answer.

"The real solution is to prevent an adult criminal population ever from coming into existence," he said. The blended sentence "safety net removes too much of the urgency. We cannot see incarceration as a long-term solution."

The prosecution had argued it was impossible to know if the boy would be rehabilitated.

"Why bind your hands? It doesn't make sense," assistant prosecutor Lisa Halushka told the judge.

Defense lawyer Geoffrey Fieger argued against any adult sentence.

"The eyes of the world really are on you, judge," he said. "I'm asking that this court take a stand ... the stand of justice."

Moore said the juvenile system is the best answer for Nathaniel, although there are no guarantees.

"You clearly need to learn to think before you act. You have probably done the worst thing that can be done ... you are going to have to come to terms with this," Moore told the boy.

The prosecution based its sentencing recommendation in part on Nathaniel's record. He had been charged only once with a break-in but was suspected in nearly two dozen crimes, including burglary, larceny, home invasion and arson.

Susan Peters, a social worker with the Department of Corrections, testified that the boy deserved a blended sentence.

"What it actually came down to is my belief that this offense was too serious to take a chance that he might not be rehabilitated in the juvenile system, then at age 21 leave this court without any options," Peters said.

Dr. Jerome Miller, a psychiatrist who testified for the defense, said an adult or blended sentence would not be effective.

"I think it would be setting up Nathaniel for failure," Miller said, adding that any infraction could be taken as basis for imprisoning Nathaniel at age 21, even if it wouldn't be considered a criminal act normally.

Manhattan grand jury indicts Combs

BY SAMUEL MAULL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Grammy-winning rap mogul Sean "Puffy" Combs was indicted Thursday on charges that he had two stolen guns in his sport utility vehicle as he fled a nightclub shooting.

One gun was found by police in the vehicle, and the other was thrown out of the vehicle, prosecutors said.

Two of Combs' associates also were named in the indictment: his rapping protege, Jamal "Shyne" Barrow, on attempted murder charges, and bodyguard Anthony Jones on a weapons charge.

Combs, 30, could get up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Combs repeatedly has proclaimed his innocence since his arrest after three people were wounded Dec. 27 inside the crowded Club NY. He was taken into custody, along with his girlfriend Jennifer Lopez, as they drove away from the club after the shooting.

Police said the vehicle carrying Combs and Lopez, the singer-actress who starred in the films "Selena" and "Out of Sight," had run at least one red light while fleeing the club. A driver and bodyguard were in the front; the couple were in the back seat.

Combs was charged with possession of a 9 mm pistol found in the front of the car, and with possession of another stolen 9 mm that was thrown from the vehicle, Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau said.

Researchers produce monkey by splitting embryo

By PAUL RECER
The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Researchers using a technique called embryo splitting hope to grow genetically identical rhesus moneys in the laboratory — a breakthrough that would enable experiments such as growing new organs from stem cells to be tested on monkeys rather than mice. Monkeys are closer to human biology.

The technique so far has produced only one living rhesus monkey, a female named Tetra, but Professor Gerald Schatten said four more twinned infants are on the way.

Schatten, a researcher at the Oregon Health Sciences University in Portland, said the goal is to produce identical monkeys that could be used to perfect new therapies for human disease.

The study appears today in the journal Science.

Most medical therapies now are tested first in mice, but monkeys would be more reliable in developing daring new techniques such as gene therapy or growing new organs from stem cells, Schatten said.

"It is a huge leap from a mouse to a patient," Schatten said. "The monkeys could fill that scientific gap.

"Medical research needs to have healthy, genetically identical animals so cures can be perfected before they are tested on humans," he said.

In their research, Schatten and his colleagues created monkey embryos in the laboratory by combining sperm and egg. When the embryos grew to an eight-cell stage, they were each split into four parts, with each part containing two cells. These then were nurtured into new embryos.

In effect, he said, the single embryo became four embryos, all genetically identical. The new embryos then were implanted into the uteri of different mothers.

In the first test of the technique, the researchers produced a single animal, named Tetra. A twin to Tetra was implanted, but miscarried.

Now, Schatten said, four mother monkeys are pregnant with cells taken from two separate embryos. Three of the mothers were implanted with two unrelated embryo splits, and the fourth mother was impregnated with a single embryo split.

Schatten said it will not be known until May, when the animals are born, which of the split embryos are developing into infants.

"It is likely that we will have genetically identical monkeys born to different mothers," he said.

The technique is not cloning in the sense of producing a genetic duplicate of an adult, such as was accomplished with the famed Scottish ewe named Dolly.

Instead, Schatten said, the technique clones genetically identical infants that arose from the same embryo. It is virtually unknown, he said, for identical twin rhesus monkeys to be produced naturally.

Schatten said genetically identical monkeys could be used to develop treatments using embryonic stem cells, the ancestral cells from which all organs and tissue grow during gestation.

Research using human embryonic stem cells is controversial because to produce the cells requires the death of an embryo.

Stem-cell research, however, offers the promise of growing new organs to replace ailing hearts or livers, or to cure diabetes.

His research, Schatten said, might make it possible to split a monkey embryo and use one part to produce a live monkey, while using the other embryos parts to produce stem cells. Those stem cells would be genetic matches to the live monkey. The stem cells then could be used to grow new organs, which could be tested on the live monkey.

For instance, he said, genetically matched stem cells could be used to grow insulin-producing organs that could be transplanted into the live monkeys to test a promising technique for curing diabetes.

Federal troops comb Russian-controlled areas for rebels

By LYOMA TURPALOV
The Associated Press

SHALI, Russia — Russian troops, battered by surprise rebel counterattacks in Chechnya, were placed on alert Thursday and dug deep trenches in vulnerable villages to fend off new attacks.

After making steady progress against Chechen rebels since ground troops entered the republic in September, the Russian offensive stalled this week: Rebels attacked towns that Russian forces claimed to control and put up fierce resistance in Grozny, the capital, where fighters are entrenched.

Russia claimed to have retaken control of the town of Argun this week. But fighting continued outside of Gudermes, Chechnya's second-largest city, said Lt. Col. Anatoly Yurasov, the deputy head of an Interior Ministry mobile unit.

Russian forces continued heavily shelling Grozny, and troops were fighting rebels from trenches in some of the city's neighborhoods, the Interfax news agency reported, citing military sources. The report described the situation in Grozny as unchanged from recent days.

In Shali and Argun, Russian troops dug trenches in preparation for possibly having to fend off rebels again, the NTV television channel reported. Other units surrounded rebel formations in four other towns in the Shali region, Interfax said.

Following the rebels' weekend counterattacks, all military checkpoints and stations in Russian-controlled areas of Chechnya have been placed on alert and provided with additional ammunition and armored vehicles, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported.

In another move to weaken the rebels, Russia this week declared that all males in Chechnya between ages 10 and 60 would be investigated for involvement with the rebels and be barred from entering or leaving Chechnya.

The Blind Boys of Alabama to perform Jan. 21 at McCain

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
Kansas State Collegian

Ricky McKinnie began to play the drums in high school and continued to study music in college. When he was 23 years old, he lost his sight due to glaucoma. Now, at the age of 47, McKinnie still is using talents he gained with sight to move audiences to higher levels.

When Clarence Fountain was 2 years old, he had a severe case of pink-eye. Too much bluestone water was used for treating his case, which it ended in the loss of his sight.

What the men have lost in sight, they have made up for in music.

McKinnie is the drummer and business manager and Fountain is the lead singer for The Blind Boys of Alabama.

Fountain and The Blind Boys of Alabama have sung the praises of higher powers for more than 60 years. They have performed their gospel music in small tent shows, as well as on Broadway.

On their next stop, the group is set to perform at 8 p.m. Jan. 21 in McCain Auditorium.

McKinnie said the group will move their audiences to higher levels.

"The audience will be both spiritually and emotionally moved, as well as energized by our music," McKinnie said. "We intend to bring excitement, emotion and spirituality to the college."

Fountain said the group has traveled to Russia, Italy, France and Spain. It also has played for colleges such as Duke University and University of California-Los Angeles.

"We've been all over the world singing gospel music. We've played to college campuses before and have gotten a great response, because people love music," Fountain said.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain, said the group has never performed at K-State before and was selected for the diversity of the programming. Jackson said they would appeal to a wide variety of people.

The show is in conjunction with Martin Luther King Jr. Day events.

"It happens to fall perfectly with some of the other events that are going on around campus," Jackson said.

The group began in the 1930s under the name Happy Land Jubilee Singers, and in 1948, the group recorded its debut album, "I Can See Everybody's Mother but Mine."

ticket information

Ticket prices are $20 for a public ticket, $18 for senior citizens and $10 for K-State students and those 18 and under.

The group changed its name in 1950 to the Five Blind Boys of Alabama.

"The blind part of it is something that the Lord saw fit to be that way," McKinnie said.

The members performed through the '50s, '60s and '70s, but their big break came in 1988 when they started the Broadway musical Gospel at Colonus, in which the group co-starred with actor Morgan Freeman. The show ran for 15 weeks and won an Obie Award.

The Blind Boys were awarded the NEA National Heritage Fellowship in 1994. The following year, the group signed with the House of Blues Music Company.

Only three of the original members and four new members remain in the group. The three original members are Fountain, second lead singer Jimmy Carter, and jubilee singer George Scott. The four new members of the group are Caleb Butler, a bass player with more than 20 years of experience in the band; Joey Williams, lead guitar player and road manager; Donald Dillon, rhythm and guitar player, and McKinnie.

Cat Crawl in Aggieville to benefit Kansas deafblind children charity

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

An afternoon of drinking and eating along with contests, raffles and auctions will benefit a non-profit organization for deafblind children.

Katlyn's Hope, Inc., is sponsoring the first Cat Crawl in Aggieville on Jan. 22.

Rhonda Lyne, Katlyn's Hope volunteer, said participants in the Cat Crawl will go to six different drinking establishments, where prizes donated by Manhattan businesses can be won by participating in games, trivia contests and raffles.

Some of the prizes include an autographed K-State football, gift certificates, basketball tickets, music and a pair of Birkenstocks.

Registration and check-in for the Cat Crawl will begin at noon at Fast Eddy's. Each participant will receive a T-shirt. At 12:30 p.m. the crawl will begin officially with a 3-ball tournament, Lyne said.

After Fast Eddy's, the crawl will continue on to Porter's, Lucky BrewGrille, Auntie Mae's Parlor, Tula's Out of Bounds Sports Bar and Grill and finish up at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon with live music and a food bar.

Jeff Denney, manager of Auntie Mae's, said the crawl is a good chance to become involved in a charity.

"It sounds like a good cause," Denney said. "We like to help out as much as possible."

He said Auntie Mae's will have a raffle for crawl participants.

Lyne said each bar will offer different activities and drink specials.

"We plan to spend about an hour at each bar," she said. "There will be snacks available, but the alcohol isn't included. Participants will have to buy their own alcohol."

Lyne said participants in the crawl have to be at least 21 to register.

"It's $12 to register for the Cat Crawl in advance and $15 the day of," she said. "Registration forms can be picked up at Streetside Records, K-Rock or any of the participating bars."

Lyne said she thinks the crawl will be a fun way to raise money for a good cause. All proceeds will go to benefit Katlyn's Hope.

Katlyn's Hope, which is based in Wellington, Kan., is a charity that was started in order to provide help for deafblind children.

Shari Willis, president and co-founder of Katlyn's Hope, along with her husband, Jeff, began the organization in honor of their daughter, Katlyn, who died from a respiratory virus when she was 7 months old.

Katlyn was born with microphtalmia, a condition that causes blindness and hearing loss.

After Katlyn's death, Willis said she wanted to help other deafblind children.

"I told Katlyn that we were going to work as hard for other kids as we did for her," Willis said. "That was my promise to her."

She said Katlyn's Hope was started because there weren't any organizations to benefit deafblind children.

"All of the money Katlyn's Hope raises goes to deafblind children in the form of educational scholarships," Willis said.

She said Katlyn's Hope has had walkathons in Lawrence but this is the first event in Manhattan.

"I've always wanted to do something in Manhattan," Willis said. "Manhattan is just a great town and a great place to have the Cat Crawl."

She said fundraisers such as the Cat Crawl are good ways to help deafblind children like Katlyn.

"Katlyn was a very, very special child," Willis said. "Katlyn's Hope is a great way to see how her life still continues to make a difference in others."

Union adds lights, music show to bowling, billiards experience

By AMY CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

Free admission will attract almost any student. Add some food and fun, and you have Rock'It Bowl and Billiards' grand-opening celebration.

From 7 to 11 p.m. Tuesday, the K-State Student Union bowling alley will have the grand opening of Rock'It Bowl and Billiards, an alternative to the daily bowling and billiards experience.

Rock'It Bowl features both activities with a multimedia light and music show. Lasers and colorful light patterns will move to the music of an enhanced state-of-the-art sound system. Fog and black-light effects over the bowling pins will complete the atmosphere.

The celebration will showcase Dave Lewis, KMAN-AM 1350 and KXBZ-FM 104.7 disc jockey, as the evening's entertainment. Lewis will be there with Allstar DJ. Prizes will be awarded throughout the night, and refreshments will be provided by Chartwells. Subway will offer food specials through the evening.

Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions director, attributed the addition of Rock'It Bowl to the Union's desire to remain competitive.

"The concept has been around a long time. It's not a fad," Snyder said. "It has remained popular. We knew that it was what students wanted, so we brought it to K-State."

Dan Brase, bowling alley employee and freshman in pre-business administration, said the addition of Rock'It Bowl and Billiards is a welcome one.

"It will be a good thing for people to come here for something different on Friday and Saturday nights," Brase said. "It will bring more people into the Union."

Normally, the cost of Rock'It Bowl will be $8 for students and $10 for the general public. This fee will be charged to everyone who enters, regardless of participation.

Terri Eddy, Union recreation director, said the fee will cover bowling, billiards and shoe rentals.

"Where else can you go on Friday and Saturday nights and only spend $8?"

— Terri Eddy, Union recreation director

Eddy proposed the idea last June. She said she feels Rock'It Bowl will be affordable for those who wish to take advantage.

"Where else can you go on Friday and Saturday nights and only spend $8?" Eddy said.

Dan Smith, sophomore in print journalism, said the hours would make Rock'It Bowl popular with the students.

"The later hours will make it more convenient," Smith said. "It will also bring in new people."

Ben Howell, sophomore in architecture, said he was excited about the combination of bowling and billiards.

"Since the pool tables are included, $8 is a good price," Howell said. "People probably wouldn't come and bowl for 2 1/2 hours, but they would bowl and play pool."

Regular hours for Rock'It Bowl and Billiards will be Friday and Saturday nights from 11 p.m. to 1:30 a.m.

Koch problems escalate with pollution penalties

By STEVE BRISENDINE
The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The pollution penalties handed down Thursday by the Environmental Protection Agency against Koch Industries are the latest in a series of problems for the Wichita-based company.

The company's doings, involving one of America's richest families, read like scripts from such departed night-time dramas as "Dallas" or "Dynasty." The list includes everything from intrafamily squabbles to political intrigue to long, multimillion-dollar court battles.

These examples from the past three years alone:

— Bill Koch, one of the four sons of founder Fred Koch, sued the two brothers who run Koch Industries — one of them his own twin.

His suit claimed they cheated him and other dissident stockholders out of millions of dollars.

— A jury found that Koch underreported the amount and quality of oil it purchased between 1985 and 1989 from federal and American Indian leases and should compensate the government.

— The company's political contributions and involvement in public affairs came into question.

Koch has won its share of legal battles, though — including the biggest, an assault mounted by Bill Koch that widened the split in the already-divided family.

Last June, after listening to 10 weeks of testimony, a federal jury decided that Charles Koch, the chairman and chief executive officer of Koch Industries, did not cheat dissident stockholders when those stockholders sold their interests in 1983.

The former stockholders, led by Bill Koch, had sought $339 million in damages. With interest and punitive damages, the figure could have exceeded $1 billion.

Bill Koch — the twin brother of Koch executive vice president David Koch — didn't give up, though.

He continued to pursue a whistleblower lawsuit that led to another federal jury's verdict against Koch Industries later in the year.

In December, a jury in Tulsa, Okla., found that Koch had underreported its oil purchases in almost 25,000 instances.

No damage has yet been assessed, but the judge could fine the company a maximum of $214 million in penalties on the 24,587 claims the jury found to be false. The jury recommended the company pay $553,504 to compensate the government, but that figure could exceed $1.4 million under federal statutes.

Comments from both sides after that verdict pointed up just how deep the family division runs.

"I think my father would be incredibly shocked to see this company was built on theft after he died," Bill Koch said. "I think that it would have destroyed him."

Koch officials called the lawsuit "another unfortunate manifestation of Billy's obsessive 19-year campaign against the company and his brothers."

That defeat was followed by another court victory for Koch, however. In late December, a judge ruled that Koch Industries did not breach its contract with Pizza Hut by backing out of a $23 million deal to purchase the pizza company's former world headquarters in Wichita.

Koch said the building had environmental problems and was in need of extensive repair. A clause in the sale contract allowed Koch to get out of the deal if it concluded such problems existed.

The company's doings, involving one of America's richest families, read like scripts from such departed night-time dramas as "Dallas" or "Dynasty." The list includes everything from intrafamily squabbles to political intrigue to long, multimillion-dollar court battles.

Congressional Democrats tried but failed to establish a clear link in 1997 between the Koch family and Triad Management Services, a controversial GOP consulting firm that spent more than $1 million on Kansas races in 1996.

David Koch and Koch Industries are generous political givers and rank among top donors nationally and in Kansas.

Federal election reports show David Koch has given $100,000 to the Republican National Committee's state election effort in the current political cycle and gave $330,000 to various GOP committees during the 1998 election cycle.

"attempted to remove her clothing."

Although the incident allegedly occurred Oct. 30, charges were not filed until Nov. 1.

"When the incident was reported, we subsequently filed charges," Irvine said.

The former pitcher also is facing attempted rape charges for a separate incident that allegedly occurred Oct. 2 and for which Reid was arrested on Tuesday. Reid's preliminary hearing for this charge will occur in the next week or two, Irvine said.

Reid was dismissed from the K-State baseball team Wednesday, but he will retain his scholarship and financial aid.

LIBRARY

The requested OOE increase was to cover inflation, Hobrock said.

"The library needs $350,000 in new other operating expenditures just to cover inflation," he said. "Thus, it jeopardizes our maintaining of subscriptions again."

Hobrock said the state could raise either faculty salaries or the OOE, and it chose faculty salaries.

"It's a pretty tough year," he said. "We're happy for what's there, but it's troublesome."

Hobrock said student tuition money probably still would go to the book budget for the library, something students were not expecting.

Student Senate passed a resolution in February 1999 supporting the $1 per-credit-hour tuition hike, but it was passed with other expectations.

"When we first passed the resolution supporting the tuition increase, we fully expected the Legislature to do their part and match it, but due to the budget crunch and the problems we have recently, I don't think anybody knew what to expect," Jason Heinrich, student body president, said.

Heinrich said Student Senate is going to lobby for the state Legislature to add the money for the library during Cats in the Capital on Feb. 16 and State Education Day on Feb. 23.

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate governmental relations chair, said it was disappointing not to get both the OOE request and the matching funds, but it was especially disappointing to the students not to have the library fee matched.

"We entered into this not seeing it as just a straight fee, but as a partnership with the state to help financial problems," he said.

The original argument against paying a privilege fee for the library was that students did not feel like the library was a privilege,Lenkner said.

He said it will be hard to get the matching funds and OOE increase back in the budget because there are other agencies fighting to get back in also.

"The combination of the library fee with tuition increase are two major instances where students are shouldering the entire burden," Lenkner said.

SGA

students, faculty and administration who are members. Senators have benefited from Campus Compact, and Heinrich now is trying to bring Campus Compact into classrooms through presentations made to K-State faculty and Faculty Senate.

"I am trying to show how courses, students and faculty at K-State can benefit the community," Heinrich said.

Another of Heinrich's accomplishments includes joining Leadershape. Through the Office of Leadership Studies and Programs, a one-week leadership training seminar at Rock Springs will be available. The session will introduce techniques about how students can contribute to a greater good and to themselves. Participants will be asked to identify a vision and then issue a challenge to implement that vision.

Transportation is another issue SGA hopes to tackle this semester. This year, Heinrich said he plans to propose a shuttle bus. During the start of the program, the shuttle will have four stops: Bramlage Coliseum, University Commons Apartments, Chase Manhattan Apartments and the K-State Student Union. If the program catches on, more stops will be proposed. However, the popularity of a shuttle program remains to be seen.

"In Kansas, people are used to getting in their cars and going," Heinrich said.

SGA members are concentrating on bringing these campus issues to a close before their terms expire.

"A lot of the things we've been working on have been research," Worcester said. "Hopefully, we'll see some those things come to a conclusion, and students will see the benefit."

TAX HIKE

with a statewide computer network would cost $10 million alone.

He acknowledged that parts of his plan are costly but said they were necessary to provide students with quality education.

The House and Senate committees introduced bills on Thursday incorporating some of Bond's proposals.

Although several committee members said they liked the plan, Bond probably will face a tougher challenge from other legislators, who are considering ways to cut spending.

Legislators find themselves in a budget bind because state general fund revenues are running $9.3 million below projections this fiscal year, while fiscal 1999 ended with revenues $73.4 million below estimates.

House Appropriations Chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, said he likes most of Bond's proposals but the revenue shortfall rules out a tax increase or extra spending.

South Carolina faces flag furor

■ Confederate flag flying over Statehouse decried.

By LEIGH STROPE
The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Decrying the Confederate flag as a symbol of slavery and racism, nearly 50,000 people marched to South Carolina's Statehouse on Martin Luther King Day Jr. to demand the banner be taken down.

They also said the slain civil rights leader should be honored with a permanent state holiday. South Carolina state workers now can take off on the King holiday or another of their choice, including one of several tied to Confederate anniversaries.

"The flag is coming down today," marchers sang as they walked six blocks from a downtown church to the Statehouse. Some carried signs reading, "Your heritage is my slavery."

Across the country, Americans remembered the slain civil rights leader Monday with marches and speeches urging the nation to commit itself to King's principles and fulfill his dream of racial harmony and equality.

This was the first year that the King holiday was observed in some form in all 50 states, and the 15th year it has been celebrated as a national holiday.

In Atlanta, Vice President Al Gore joined King's widow, Coretta Scott King, and other family members in placing two wreaths at King's grave. King, who was assassinated in Memphis, Tenn., in 1968, would have been 71 Saturday.

"Today, nearly 32 years after we lost him, we still need Martin Luther King Jr. more than ever," Gore said from the pulpit of Ebenezer Baptist Church, where King served as pastor during the civil rights movement.

"Martin, where are you now? 'We shall overcome' needs to be more than just a look into our past, but a way to find the resolve to find the true America we know we can be at last."

President Clinton helped paint a community computer center in Washington, D.C.

"Every time you give a little, you always get more back," Clinton said. "Let's remember that as Dr. King's enduring legacy."

Among the celebrations elsewhere:

■ Operation Hope, a community group in New Orleans, honored King by offering $50 for guns, no questions asked. The group said the weapons would be turned over to police to be destroyed.

■ Several hundred people of many different races marched in Rochester, Minn., where the Rev. Jesse Jackson was the featured speaker. Seven-year-old Naava Johnson came to the march with her grandmother. If King had never been born, the little girl said, "We'd still be slaves."

In Remembrance

STORY BY COURTNEY DUFFIELD ■ PHOTOS BY STEVEN DEARINGER

Candlelight vigil, walk symbolize unity

Members of the Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity sponsored a walk and candlelight vigil Monday night in remembrance of the civil-rights activist Martin Luther King Jr.

The service, which was in the All Faiths Chapel, was part of a week-long tribute to King.

Daron Fowler, sophomore in apparel and textile design and coordinator of the candlelight vigil, said the service was special to the members of Alpha Phi Alpha because King was a member of their fraternity.

"Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. became a member of Alpha Phi Alpha in 1954," said Brandon Clark, junior in social sciences and president of Alpha Phi Alpha. "He basically believed in the qualities that our fraternity stands for — manly deeds, scholarship and love for all mankind."

The service started with a short walk around campus. Crowd members sang as they walked.

"In the civil rights days, they would come together and walk," Clark said. "They walked to show their unity."

After the walk, the crowd returned to All Faiths Chapel for the candlelight vigil.

Clark welcomed the audience members and thanked them for coming.

Robyn Reed, who was named Miss Black and Gold last fall by the fraternity, sang "Amazing Grace."

"I feel it is a song that is really touching to African-Americans, " Reed said.

Reed, junior in social sciences, said it was part of her responsibilities as Miss Black and Gold to support the members of Alpha Phi Alpha in their community

Boycott of Super Bowl threatened

By DICK PETTYS
The Associated Press

ATLANTA — The Rev. Jesse Jackson's Rainbow/PUSH Coalition is threatening to launch a tourism boycott of Georgia on Super Bowl Sunday to protest use of the Confederate emblem in the state flag.

State elected officials of both parties made it clear Monday they have no interest in changing the flag, despite the threat.

"I'm saying what I've said all along — we have a lot of issues on our plate, and this is just not one that's in the mix right now," said Gov. Roy Barnes, a Democrat.

Civil rights activists hope to capitalize on publicity generated when Atlanta is the host of the Super Bowl on Jan. 30 and will call for a tourism boycott that day, said Joe Beasley, Southern regional

Students required to use Internet to vote in next student body election

By ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Another service will be added to current online services such as access to grade cards, athletic tickets and enrollment this semester — electronic voting.

Students will be able to vote in the upcoming student body elections only through KATS.

Travis Morgan, Election Committee chair, said K-State will be going through an outside vendor, votehere.net. He said students will have to log on to KATS and then click on a vote button that will send them to the votehere.net Web site. Once voters are at the Web site, they can select the college they are enrolled in, and the site will send them to the ballot for that college.

Jason Heinrich, student body president, said votehere.net is a secure system to use for electronic voting. He said a lot of different universities and some county and statewide elections have used the site for voting. votehere.net also has a patent on its security system.

"They definitely have proven themselves to be successful," Heinrich said.

Morgan said students will be able to vote only once through votehere.net.

"Once you have voted under that ID number, it will show you voted, and you can't vote again," he said.

Gayle Spencer, director of the Office of Student Activities and Services, said using an outside vendor for electronic voting probably will cost about $4,000 more than having a paper ballot vote as in previous years, but she said it will be worth it.

"It will get rid of some of the issues that came up with last year's elections," Spencer said.

In last year's election, Joe Ashley, 1999 Election Committee chair, was found guilty by Student Tribunal of tampering with the election by releasing information about the balloting early.

Morgan said this is the reason he wanted to go to electronic voting.

"I felt the image of this position needed a lot of change. It will be a way I can help the students make these elections better," he said. "I will not see the results until the day of the announcement."

Morgan said he is excited about the upcoming elections because people will be able to vote from any place that has Internet access. The new system will allow students at K-State-Salina to vote for student body president as well as enrolled students studying abroad. However, if students in Manhattan have questions, there will be one polling booth in the K-State Student Union. Students still will vote electronically at the booth, but they will be able to ask questions.

"It should be a lot of fun and increase voter turnout," Morgan said.

Heinrich said other universities that have used electronic voting have seen an increase of voter turnout of more than 200 percent.

This year's electronic voting is just a trial, but Heinrich said he hopes everything goes well so electronic voting will become a permanent part of K-State's student body elections and won't have to be done through an outside vendor.

"If it goes well, we'll do it in-house next year," he said.

Attempted robbery leads to man's arrest

■ Call by gunshot victim ends in his incarceration.

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

An attempted aggravated robbery Thursday night ended in the arrest of a gunshot victim on a Geary County warrant.

Charles T. Washington, 20, 411 S. 16th St., was arrested by Riley County police on a $20,000 warrant for first-degree attempted murder, kidnapping, aggravated burglary, aggravated battery, aggravated assault and endangering a child.

He was taken by Junction City police to the Geary County Detention Center after his arrest.

Riley County police first found Washington after a 911 call at 7:15 p.m. Thursday alerted them to shots fired in the 400 block of South 16th Street. When officers arrived on the scene, they found Washington suffering from a gunshot to the right side of his stomach.

After giving officers a false name, Washington was taken to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue with a non-life-threatening injury, said Lt. Herb Crosby of the Riley County Police Department.

"Upon further investigation, officers properly identified the victim and arrested him on the Geary County warrant," Crosby said.

Washington told police he was exiting his vehicle when he was approached by an unknown black male who pulled a .45-caliber handgun and demanded money. The two men struggled over the gun for a short time, and Washington said that when he turned and ran from the scene, the suspect fired two rounds.

Washington was hit once in the right side of his stomach, where the bullet entered and exited his body.

The RCPD still is investigating the attempted robbery, Crosby said.

"We don't have any suspects at this time," he said. "We're just trying to follow up on our leads so far."

Manhattan man stabbed Sunday

By ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

A Manhattan resident was stabbed early Sunday morning.

Jeffrey Lee Sims, 25, 3756 Powers Lane, Apt. 22, was stabbed sometime between 12:05 and 12:30 a.m. at K Hill and was admitted to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue at 3:16 a.m.

Sims had a small puncture to his lower left abdomen and superficial facial injuries, said Sgt. Joshua Kyle of the Riley County Police Department. Sims was treated and released.

Kyle said Sims reported he was stabbed by four males while he was on K Hill, which overlooks the Kansas River, off of Kansas Highway 18.

There were no witnesses to the stabbing, and it is not known why Sims was on K Hill, Kyle said. The case is under investigation.

Fog forces airplane to miss runway, land in nearby field

LIBERAL, Kan. — Four people received slight injuries when their plane missed the runway and landed in a field early Monday near Liberal.

The Cessna 172 was piloted by Steven Grier, 23, of Anchorage, Alaska. The aircraft crashed when he attempted to land the plane due to heavy fog about 12:20 a.m. The Kansas Highway Patrol said the plane was totaled when it crashed near U.S. Highway 54 and Seward County Road G.

Grier and his three passengers were taken to Southwest Medical Center, where they were treated for their injuries and released. David Lapham and Gregory Ryan, both 23 and of Harrah, Okla., and Jason McDonald, 23, of Yukon, Okla., were Grier's injured passengers.

The patrol did not know where the aircraft was coming from or its destination. The Federal Aviation Administration has been notified and will investigate the accident.

Rally on steps of Statehouse raises awareness of poverty

TOPEKA — About 80 people rallied on the south steps of the Statehouse on Monday to increase awareness of poverty and push legislators to do something about it.

Groups sponsoring the rally included Kansans Respond, a statewide organization that lobbies for the poor; the Campaign to End Childhood Hunger, of Wichita; and the Kansas Association of Community Action Programs.

Organizers chose to have their event on the state holiday honoring Martin Luther King Jr.

Participants held signs with slogans that included, "Poverty Hurts Us All" and "Fight Poverty with Legislation."

Many Kansans remain poor, despite a relatively strong economy and the lowest unemployment rates in two decades, said Mary Becker, executive director of Kansans Respond.

"These people are not seen," she said. "Their income status doesn't get reported, and it doesn't get addressed."

Minorities face isolation, race issues in Manhattan

Panel members discuss difficulties adjusting to community's cultures

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not so long ago, James Butler had some carpet replaced in his Manhattan home.

He and the man replacing the carpet talked about their lives and experiences in the Army.

When it came time for Butler to pay the man, he asked him if he wanted to be paid in cash or with a check.

"When I was a freshman, I had a culture shock. There were not a whole lot of people who looked like me, and I only heard Spanish in Spanish class"

— Leo Prieto, senior in modern languages

The man said, "You boys sometimes have checks that bounce."

Butler paid the man in cash, but the effects of such prejudice remain.

"The most enduring suffering is to be made to feel inferior," he said.

Butler, a member of the Kansas Commission of Civil Rights, joined other Manhattan leaders and residents for a town hall meeting Saturday to talk about what it is like being in a minority group in Manhattan.

Some of the panel members talked about the isolation involved in being a minority member in the community.

"I feel so lonely here. I don't have a support system here," said Tammy Goodson, past president of the Native American Student Body.

Grace Hwang's father was one of the first Taiwanese students at K-State. Growing up in Manhattan, she said she didn't feel as different ethnically or racially, but different politically.

"I grew up, and I felt isolated," she said.

Sheila Hochhauser, Manhattan resident and former state representative, said she felt isolated as a non-Christian in this community. She said it was difficult for her to walk into her daughter's school the first day of school after Thanksgiving and see a Santa Claus flag flying. A rabbi from Topeka calls it the December dilemma, she said.

The recent debate on the fate of the Ten Commandments monolith also emphasized the fact that Hochhauser lived in community with a vocal Christian majority.

KRISTINA GLENN/COLLEGIAN

Kathleen Bechtel, Candi Pitts and Karen McCulloh listen during a race-relations meeting among members of the Manhattan community Saturday evening at Manhattan City Hall. The meeting was part of a continuing week-long celebration in honor of Martin Luther King Jr.

"It was a very lonely time. There were all those letters in the newspapers about Jesus Christ and the Christian nation," Hochhauser said. "I really felt uncomfortable in this community."

For minority students, the adjustment from home to the predominantly white K-State campus can be difficult.

"When I was a freshman, I had culture shock," said Leo Prieto, former Hispanic American Leadership Organization president and senior in modern languages from Garden City. "There were not a whole lot of people who looked like me, and I only heard Spanish in Spanish class."

Prieto said he had problems finding Mexican foods, and he missed the Spanish television he watched back home.

One of his goals was to get a Spanish channel to Manhattan, which was realized when Univision was added.

Racial discussions traditionally have been black and white, but Hispanics are becoming the largest minority in the country, he said.

"People are starting to pay attention," Prieto said. "We have always been here."

Panelists and members of the public expressed their outrage at the K-State football team defense using the name "lynch mob." One man in the audience suggested that people stop attending the football games, and another suggested a sit-in at the football complex to bring attention to the issue.

Juanita McGowan, moderator of the event, closed by saying she thought the meeting was in the spirit of racial harmony.

"I think Martin would smile upon us as community today," she said.

City, campus partnership for transit system remains under discussion

■ Separate plans lend doubt to cooperative transit plan.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the city of Manhattan and K-State narrow their options on separate transportation studies, it still is unclear whether the two will have enough in common to develop a partnership for a public transit system.

For nearly two years, the city of Manhattan and K-State have had separate contracts with the Kansas City, Mo.-based TranSystems Corp. to study transportation options for the future. Despite similarly broad studies, the two sometimes have had different focuses.

At present, there are at least three different proposals on the transit issue.

On the university side, Rita Newell, chairwoman of the K-State's transportation subcommittee, is preparing to deliver her final report to the Campus Development Committee before her group is disbanded for reorganization.

The report recommends a shuttle system to relieve the growing parking problem on campus. Newell said one reason the shuttle was chosen over earlier TranSystems options, such as a multilevel garage, was its popularity in surveys and forums.

However, Newell said the advisory report was designed to narrow options, not to begin blueprints or even suggest if the system should be campuswide or citywide.

"It was never to decide what kind of shuttle system or details about it," she said.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services and member of the transportation subcommittee, said a part of the problem designing any shuttle system is savings vs. efficiency. People generally have said they want a 10-minute wait for each shuttle, which would raise costs, he said. In addition, the 44-passenger buses for such a project would cost between $200,000 and $250,000 each.

"To a certain extent, we know and K-State knows we need to work together."

— Bruce Snead, city commisioner and transportation steering committee member

There is also the issue of whether to work directly with the city.

The city had hoped to partner with K-State to help finance the program and add support, but the city finished its studies with TranSystems months before the university did.

Bruce Snead, Manhattan city commissioner and member of the city's transportation steering committee, said the commission is looking at a three-route bus system estimated to cost $26 million over 20 years.

Snead said the city is not waiting for K-State to finish its study, though. The city almost certainly will take the lead in a transit system while working on other facets of its transportation plan, such as improvements to U.S. Highway 18 and completing the Linear Park bicycle trail, he said.

"All along there's been a desire to cooperate with K-State, and I think that desire is reciprocal," he said. "To a certain extent, we know and K-State knows we need to work together."

However, Abbott said it would be difficult for the city and university to work together for several reasons. Not only is there lag time between the city and university studies with TranSystems, but both also have different goals.

The city program is designed for the next 20 years, while K-State's parking troubles are immediate, he said.

"Our friends at the city have 'Connecting to 2020.' We're connecting to 2000," he said.

The university has to do what works for its users, and any shuttle or garage system is a waste of money if no one uses it, Abbott said.

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said his plan, developed with student government officials this summer, is ready for that concern.

Heinrich said he wanted a new university plan because a previous proposal suggested expanding an existing parking lot.

Reducing the number of cars on campus is the key, Heinrich said, not spending millions of dollars to make more parking spaces.

Heinrich said he supports more expensive parking permits to fund the program, but wants to make permits for the Bramlage lot less expensive to encourage shuttle use.

"I'm definitely not in favor of a student fee," he said.

The K-State system also needs to start small, he said, because people might not use it, and if they don't, the three new buses can be shifted to other programs, such as gameday parking. He also said K-State has social hurdles to overcome if it wants to sell a shuttle system.

"Most Kansans are not from places with public transportation," he said.

Heinrich said he doesn't want to get K-State involved in a citywide transit system yet.

The plan Heinrich has now, which he hopes to present to Student Senate on Thursday, involves three buses moving between the Bramlage parking lot, Chase Manhattan Apartments and the K-State Student Union parking lot.

Senate education proposal wastes fresh ideas

One hundred million dollars is a lot of money.

In fact, it is too much.

But that is how much money Senate President Dick Bond proposed generating from a sales-tax increase to fund his education proposal. The plan includes a proposal requiring school districts to consider making students wear uniforms.

In addition, it would lengthen the school year, create full-day kindergarten classes, abolish tenure for teachers, ensure up-to-date technology and require students to have a speaking knowledge of Spanish and demonstrate mastery of basic skills before graduating from high school.

If this sounds like a lot of changes to fit into one proposal, that's because it is.

In fact, it is too much.

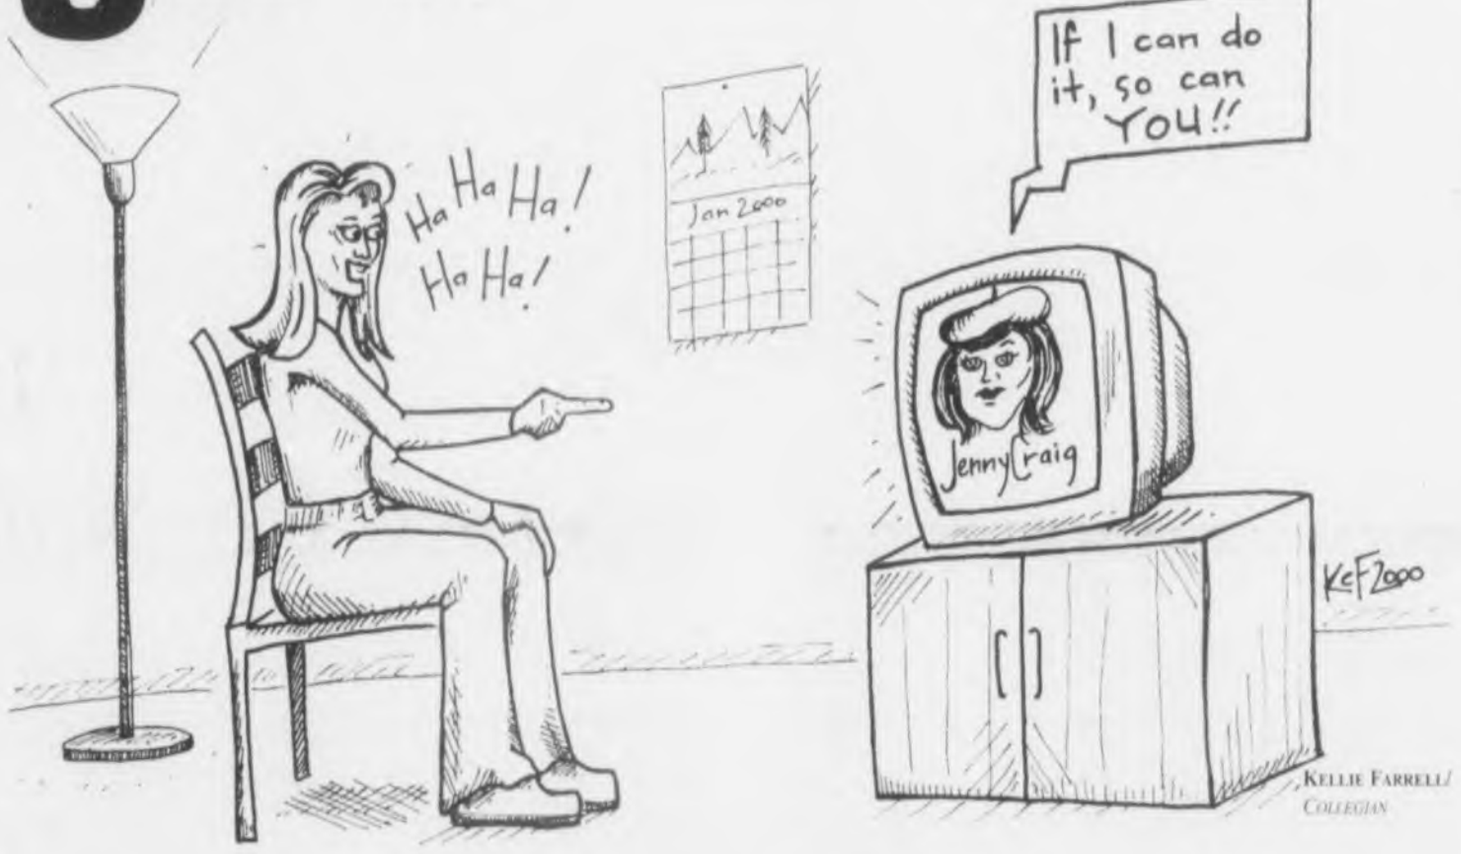
Asking taxpayers to fork over $100 million all at once is a tough task, even when education is the issue.

This is sad, because so many of the components of the plan seem to be worthwhile.

The value of each of these changes is debatable. Certainly, knowledge of Spanish is valuable in today's global environment, and the best time to teach children is during their young years. Updated technology also has few glaring drawbacks.

Other parts of the plan — such as uniforms and full-time kindergarten — would draw only mixed support. Adding these onto the proposal and pushing the cost upward could spell doom for the entire plan.

Unfortunately, the Kansas educational system desperately needs to be improved. In a recent report by Education Week magazine, Kansas received a "D" for the way resources are allocated at state schools.



If a proposal were to pass, it would bring much-needed funds to schools. However, while aiming for the stars, Bond might have shot down any chance his plan had.

He should reassess his plan and assure that state schools at least will receive some help in improving themselves.

laugh it up

New Year's at home leads to realization that laughter truly can be medicine; tough part might be getting proper dose

KELLIE FARRELL/ COLLEGIAN

Sitting on my mother's new cranberry-colored couch, I gazed at the television that brought me into the year 2000, MTV-style.

The clock passed over to midnight, and I realized that New York City was not going to implode, taking away almost two million drunken and glitter-embalmed Times Square attendees.

In my jealousy, I began wondering how it was that I had been led to my current position in life (literally at first, and then on a more "life in general" scale). I then began wondering how it was that I was going to continue it, millennial-style (in other words, change my priorities and immediate goals-style). On this night of such great social potential, my New Year's Resolution began forming in my sometimes nutty little head.

After my envious and non-blinking stare at everyone in the Central Time Zone of America celebrating as if they had witnessed a Republican slaying, I flipped on over to the new Adam Sandler flick.

Amid my attempts at holding down laughter, I realized that my evening had really not turned out so badly after all. I realized that I had laughed more in the last hour than I had in the past two days. I actually was feeling euphoric on my supposed disaster night.

Even though this was the only millennium night of all millenniums that I probably ever will see, Sandler was not so bad to hang out with. Even though the true dedication to my social life had been shot down, I had saved the Christmas money. And even though my new glitter-embellished dress with the glitter-embellished arm drape lay lonely and never to be worn on the bed I had flung it onto in my small tantrum, I realized that this was such a petty problem — such a petty problem that it occurred to my self-pitied sake that I probably even had gotten a decent ab workout from laughing at Scuba Steve. Maybe I was onto something.

I frequently forget how easy it is to become consumed with self-pity at ridiculously petty situations, most of which I probably won't remember the majority of in the morning anyhow.

Embarrassment, as well as the pain that one supposedly feels from doing crunches, began to set in.

So what might be the point of these ramblings? I suppose it would be that I finally came to the conclusion that I simply need to stop looking at every situation so negatively. Laughing my rear off at something as easy to find on television as yet another "Saturday Night Live" veteran making a movie had been a relief.

Now, I know that resolutions usually go right out the door with things like French verb conjugations, but laughing is easy. I think everyone needs to laugh more. I know that someone out there already has lost the hope of becoming a non-smoker, so why not try this?

Of course, this might be easier said than done, because life is simply not much fun sometimes. But is it not sensible to think that if one takes a moment to look at the lighter side of a situation, then maybe a more forceful and effective approach will be utilized in an effort at a positive or at least tolerable resolution?

Look at our current president of the United States. He did not have such a, shall I say, positive situation on his hands last year. He lied under oath. He humiliated his wife and daughter. He got impeached. The laughable side of this situation? Although he now is living without Hillary in the White House, he still has the cat and dog. Pets can be a godsend as long as one is not allergic.

Look at Linda Tripp (not literally, if you so choose). She surely is hating that she is the butt of media jokes. She must be living with what might be the lowest self-esteem that a woman is capable of having. The laughable side of this situation? Well, now she has enough money to have a face lift. That should make a lot of people, including herself, happy and laughing.

Finally, look at Monica Lewinsky. Despite her shattered reputation, she is hanging out at London movie premieres. Despite the reality that she most assuredly will never work in the White House again, she got a huge gig with Jenny Craig.

Shoot, if she loses 60 pounds, it has been reported that she might make a million dollars. I wonder how unhappy she is about that?

Laughter has been said to be the best medicine. Even if whomever is reading this has a class in five minutes, it soon will be over. If you are not yet enrolled in it and need it to graduate this semester, try to laugh. At least let a smile creep on your sad face. This might simply mean that you have one extra semester because of one three-hour class. That equals out to more of the lovely college life.

Commemorative week opportunity to open eyes for 1st time

Who are you? Describe yourself, now, in five words. Who are you?

Are you a thinker? A lover? Are you a student? Teacher? Writer? Scientist? Secretary? Custodian? Woman? Man? Cavalier? Pacifist? Iconoclast? Who are you?

Take those five words. Look at them. How many of you said "white?"

Anybody?

I almost am never conscious of my race. It's hard to be, on this campus, in this country — when you're white. I never sit back and go, "Well, gee, I'm sure proud to be white today." To me, race is a non-issue. I don't care what race I am, or you are, for that matter. I really don't. But then, I've never had to. I grew up first in Maine, then in Kansas, both places where racial diversity is minimal. Diversity was having someone with a tan in class.

Some say this isn't the right perspective. We should acknowledge and be aware of the differences around us, they say, embrace our diversity. I say there's something to that, but for some of us, it's just too much trouble.

I don't know where my ancestors came from. I probably could find out, but I don't care. I don't extract any portion of my identity from my race. To me, it's a glaringly artificial and superficial way of looking at ourselves.

So it's tempting to sigh at this whole "Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week" and give up on it as something that's just not for me.

But then, I've never been on the outside looking in.

I've never been branded an outsider on something as obvious and simultaneously indisguiseable as my skin. Never had racial slurs written on my locker or my books. Never had that core facet of my very identity assailed by the society in which I lived.

We like to sit back and congratulate ourselves for our color-blind society, the same society which gave blacks the right to vote in 1965 — as Dennis Miller puts it, back when "we were South Africa without the diamond mines." The same society that nearly tore itself to shreds after the Los Angeles riots, scars of which still run deep. The same society that still sporadically uses racial profiling to detain suspects. The same society that clubbed Rodney King and killed James Byrd Jr.

My God, we've got a long, long way to go, but we have to go sometime, and it might as well start here.

A lot of cities across the country celebrate their diversity every day, simply by working, moving, circulating itself. At K-State, we can cloister ourselves quite easily, and our perception of our society can narrow into a tight focus on whatever's in our hand at the moment.

We can't pass this opportunity up, a chance to move beyond the boundaries we define ourselves by. This isn't about you, or about me. It's about us — every single one of us.

In our culture, no matter how Pollyanna we want to be, no matter how color-blind we think we are, some of us don't have the luxury to be racially anonymous. Some of us fall prey to our own fears and hates emerging in another's skin. Some of us feel the heat of that hatred. For those who haven't had to see the world in terms of race, either by being sheltered or simply naive, it's time to see things differently. It's a time of education as well as a time of celebration, a time of unity.

For a lot of us, it's seeing our society with eyes that have never opened before.

Column clouded by lack of knowledge about sex

Editor,

The following is a response to the column "Exploitation" by Travis Weigel, which appeared in Friday's issue of the Collegian.

First, allow me to quote Weigel. "Sex and sexuality are all around us and have become a part of our daily lives." In fact, difficult as it might be to believe, human sexuality has existed since the dawn of the species. It is how all of us, Weigel included, came to be. Not a day goes by that every normal, healthy person alive does not think about sex. To say that sex has become part of our daily lives is like saying that eating, sleeping or urinating have become part of our daily lives.

Secondly, I would like to address the statement "sex sells." When a retailer uses an attractive, provocatively dressed person to endorse a product, that is not sex.

If Weigel — or anyone else — does not understand this, then I would be delighted to show them some pictures of people having sex and some pictures of attractive, provocatively dressed individuals and explain the difference. An attractive person does not equal sex. Even a nude, attractive person does not equal sex.

These companies are not using sex to sell their products; they are using people who inspire sexual thoughts in the minds of the viewers, but that is an entirely different thing. If you truly believe that sex sells, then I invite you to make an X-rated advertisement that actually includes sex and see what response you get.

This brings me to my third, and final, point. The title of the column is "Exploitation," and an example of this concept given in the text is the Nitro Girls of WCW. First of all, the men on WCW tend to wear less than the women and often are not portrayed as particularly intelligent, either. This, however, is entirely irrelevant. The exploitation to which Weigel refers is predicated on the notion that the appearance of the human body, especially certain parts of it, are sinful and dirty.

America is one of the few remaining first-tier nations where large segments of the population still cling to this ridiculous myth. In Europe, for example, Weigel would likely be the laughing stock of the university for printing such drivel.

It is a good thing that the capabilities of the human body are not considered sinful and dirty, or else showing them off in a basketball or football game would be considered exploitation as well.

Vegetarianism continues its rise in popularity in America today

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A trend has developed in the past 20 years in the United States — vegetarianism.

Swinder Janda, assistant professor of marketing and international business, said he and Phil Trocchia, assistant professor of marketing and international business, conducted a study to find out more about vegetarians and why they choose this lifestyle.

Janda said 1 percent of the population in 1978 considered themselves to be vegetarians, whereas today, the number has increased to 7 percent. However, he said this does not truly reflect the number of people in the United States who do not eat meat.

"There is no way that a person can define vegetarianism as one specific type," Janda said. "Many people choose to eat some type of meat, such as fish or sometimes chicken, and still call themselves vegetarians. We must be careful when using the term and defining it."

Janda said the study was conducted in two parts — a quantitative and a qualitative study. In the first study, Janda said he and Trocchia conducted 12 in-depth interviews. He said they had the people describe why they are vegetarians and what they do and do not eat.

Through these interviews, Janda said they discovered five main motivations for why people become vegetarians — ethical concerns, health reasons, sensory responses, images of cannibalism and reference group influence. He said the two main reasons why people choose to change their eating habits center around the treatment of animals and health issues.

"More Americans are concerned for animal welfare than ever before," Janda said. "Things like confined spaces the animals are kept in, the treatment of animals and the use of hormones are things that concern people in this country.

"A lot of people are also concerned with their own health and have chosen to cut red meat or all meat from their diets to become more healthy."

Janda said that after the in-depth interviews, he and Trocchia moved to a quantitative study in which they surveyed 600 people in the Midwest. From these surveys, they began to reach several conclusions. For example, Janda said women and young people were more likely to become vegetarians than men and older members of the population.

He said that in a region of the country where raising cattle is a substantial industry, much of the older population is hesitant to change a lifestyle they have been raised with. He said men accept that women are more likely to be vegetarians.

"These results might be because of the regional scope of the surveys," Janda said. "In this region, red meat is a major part of much of the older population.

"I expect that as we broaden the scope of the study toward the coasts, we will see these results change."

Brian Grove, executive chef at the K-State Student Union, said he has noticed an increase in the amount of vegetarian items served in the Union. He said the Union Food Court has increased its selection of meatless items, such as serving one or two vegetarian entrees in the demonstration area next to the salad bar and always having a vegetarian soup. He said the biggest selection is on the salad bar, where there are 30-40 items to choose from.

"A lot of people who are not necessarily vegetarians like the meatless selections that we have on our menu sometimes," Grove said. "When they come back around on the menu, people continue to eat it."

Grove said he has noticed in the past five to seven years that there has been a dramatic increase of vegetarianism in the United States. He said he does not think this trend will diminish because more and more people are concerned with living healthier lifestyles.

"Healthy eating is here to stay," Grove said. "I think we will see this trend continue to grow as more people think about how to live longer in relation to how they eat."

Mary Molt, assistant director of housing and dining, said the Department of Housing and Dining Services has added more vegetarian items to its menu in the past 10 years. She said dining services is working on two new tofu recipes for students to try.

"We have many hot vegetarian selections at every meal, so people can have something hot rather than the traditional yogurt or salad," Molt said. "However, although we do sell a high number of vegetarian items, it is hard to say that all of those students do not eat meat. Many like the vegetarian items."

Molt said garden burgers, meatless pastas, hot vegetables and dishes with ingredients such as eggplant commonly are served during lunch and dinner in the three dining halls on campus.

"Students are beginning to think more about how much fat they are eating and the effects in the long term," Molt said. "We have expanded our menu so much in the last 10 years that we hope that anyone can find whatever they want to eat and enjoy it."

Janda said he and Trocchia will be broadening their study to include the entire United States and some foreign countries within the next year. He said they then will begin to compare the results to those from Western Europe and Asia to see the relationship between different cultures.

Deadline to change password approaches for e-mail users

BY MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students, faculty and staff must change their e-mail account passwords by Feb. 10, according to the director of Computing and Network Services.

"We'd like students to get into the habit of changing their passwords at the start of each new semester," Harvard Townsend said.

If passwords are not changed on Feb. 10, CNS will change them automatically.

To get the new password, students must go to Hale 313 with their student ID and receive their new password.

Students who access their K-State e-mail accounts said they appreciate the added security changing passwords afford them.

"Changing my password last semester was an inconvenience, but it's worth it if I don't have to deal with someone hacking into my e-mail account," said Jennifer Stover, sophomore in pre-veterinarian medicine. "Security measures are necessary because you don't want others to have access to your mail."

After the all-university password change in September, break-ins to the system have decreased dramatically, Townsend said.

"Since then, we have had very few break-ins on central systems, but we get probed regularly by hackers looking for vulnerability," Townsend said. "The biggest problem with break-ins this fall has been with servers in departments rather than centrally managed servers."

Larry Robertson, consulting manager for the Information Technology help desk, said hackers can affect students not only by ruining home pages and files, but also by acting as the student.

Townsend said he agreed.

"A hacker could break into your account and send e-mail that appears to be from you," Townsend said. "This could be very embarrassing and possibly damaging to your reputation."

Townsend said that last semester 23,000 out of 30,000 users changed their passwords before the Sept. 20 deadline.

About 3,000 people flooded the Information Technology help desk three days after the deadline.

Some students experienced difficulty finding a password the system would accept, Townsend said.

Students can locate information on specific criteria a new password must meet by following the instructions on the CNS Web page.

"This was very frustrating for a lot of people," Townsend said. "We didn't do a good job of instructing people on how to choose a good password."

e-mail information

The deadline to change K-State e-mail passwords is Feb. 10. Here are some things to keep in mind when updating those passwords.

- There are three ways to change e-mail passwords. Through the CNS Web page, www.ksu.edu/password, through the Unix server, and at the Information Technology Help Desk, Hale 313.
- A good password should be something that is difficult for others to guess, yet easy enough for you to remember.
- Don't use a password that is your nickname, the name of family members or pets, your birthdate, or your favorite color, TV character, hobby, etc.
- Passwords must be at least six characters — five of which are not repeated — long, must not be a dictionary word preceded or followed by up to two digits and must not be found in the dictionary used by password crackers.
- Old passwords not changed will be reset on Feb. 11.
- To reactivate a computing ID, fill out the interactive form at www.ksu.edu/activateid.

BEATEN UP

Men's team falls behind on fundamentals, effort

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

COLUMBIA, Mo. — It just wasn't K-State's day.

Actually, it was Clarence Gilbert's day, and for a number of reasons. Gilbert, who celebrated his 20th birthday Saturday, led the Missouri Tigers to a 73-56 victory over the Wildcats at the Hearnes Center with a game-high 25 points and five-of-nine shooting from three-point range.

The Cats (8-6, 1-2), who have hung their hats on defense and rebounding in the past, were outdone by Tigers (9-6, 2-1) in both as they were out-rebounded 46-33, including 16-6 on the offensive boards.

Head coach Tom Asbury said the Cats were beaten in most areas.

"Every way conceivable: shot selection, defending the three and, especially, rebounding.

"I don't think we played anywhere near the intensity that we have recently, and we needed to do that," he said. "We went into this game wanting a plus-15 and ended up a minus-13. That's embarrassing."

Senior forward Tony Kitt attributed K-State's poor rebounding to a lack of exertion.

"Effort. We didn't exert the effort that we know we're capable of doing," Kitt said. "It just wasn't there. It all boils down to effort."

Asbury said K-State's rebounding woes were due to simple fundamentals, which led to Missouri's 18-4 advantage in second-chance points.

"We weren't boxing out," Asbury said. "I haven't watched the tape, but I suspect that was a huge part of it. We've got a solution to that if guys are doing their jobs, but clearly the guys weren't doing their jobs today."

On offense, K-State never found rhythm and continuity, committing 20 turnovers and shooting 39 percent from the field, including three-of-16 from beyond the arc.

"We never had any rhythm of flow," Asbury said. "Granted, Quentin (Buchanan) was never in the game in terms of his contribution. But he played pretty hard.

"Galen (Morrison) didn't take a good shot all night. He started rushing and panicking a little bit. He just didn't shoot it very well. It was just a very, very poor performance."

The first half saw the Tigers jump out to an eight-point lead off the shooting of Gilbert, who opened the contest with back-to-back treys — something that plagued the Cats all day.

Just when it seemed the Cats were climbing back, the Tigers would battle back with another great play.

Road woes continue

K-State suffered its 16th consecutive loss to Missouri at the Hearnes Center. The Wildcats' last win in Columbia was on March 2, 1985, when they defeated the Tigers 69-54.

Dix impressive in first half

Red-shirt freshman Kenyatta Dix led the Wildcats in scoring in the first half with nine points but failed to score after the intermission. In the second half, he was zero-of-four shooting, and his nine points were two short of his career high of 11.

Edge on the glass

Missouri had an 18-4 advantage over K-State in second-chance points after outrebounding the Wildcats by 13 for the game. The Tigers grabbed 16 offensive boards against the Cats.

Kitt records double-double

Senior forward Tony Kitt scored 21 points and grabbed 11 rebounds to lead K-State against Missouri.

Injury report

Sophomore Travis Reynolds is out for three weeks with a high-ankle sprain sustained in the Kansas game on Wednesday night. Senior Josh Reid isn't expected to be back until late January or early February after suffering a broken foot in practice on Dec. 20. Reid underwent surgery on his foot on Dec. 27 in Manhattan.

Up next

K-State will play the visiting Iowa State Cyclones at 8 p.m. Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum. The Cyclones (15-2 overall, 3-0 Big 12) are coming off an 86-72 victory Sunday against Colorado.

■ Weekend victory over Texas A&M sparks team's confidence, edge needed to compete.

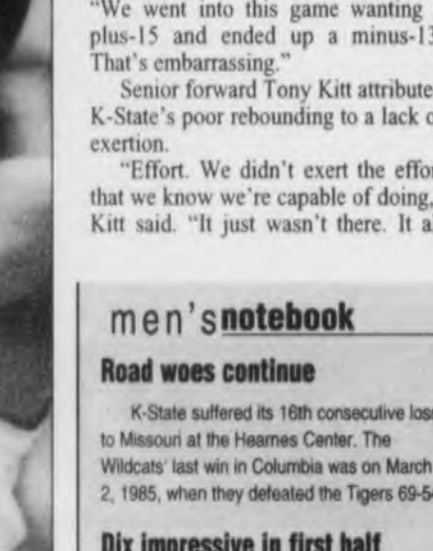
BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team will look to extend its 2-game winning streak tonight against Texas Tech.

The game tips off at 7 at Bramlage Coliseum and pits the Cats (9-8, 2-2) against the No. 14/15 Raiders (13-2, 2-2). K-State is riding the emotional tide of its 67-62 road win against a tough Texas A&M squad.

"Everyone understands how hard it is to win on the road in the Big 12, and any victory you get on the road is extremely significant," head coach Deb Patterson said. "But even more so, I think our team gained a lot of confidence because we handled full-court pressure, we defended at an extremely high level in that game, we out-rebounded our opponent and we had a very solid inside/outside attack."

The Cats' post players continued their outstanding play against A&M. Senior forward Nicky Ramage led the team with 23 points, and senior forward Angie Finkes added 16 points.



"Every game, we have the mindset to be strong, post up and work hard," Ramage said.

The Cats will need to maintain that level of play against a Tech team that stumbled early in Big 12 play but has responded with wins over Oklahoma State and Colorado. Patterson said Tech enters the game in a different situation.

"Tech is not in the habit of having two early season Big 12 losses, so every game they play is a game in which they are going to be extremely on edge," Patterson said.

Women's track places 1st, defeats Cowboys

STEVEN DEARINGER/COLLEGIAN

Amanda Crouse begins her leg of the 1600-meter relay race during the KSU Invitational K-State on Saturday at Ahearn Field House. Crouse won the mile earlier in the day with a time of 5:00.61. K-State won the meet with 164 points.

BY MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's track team placed first in the five-team KSU Invitational on Saturday, while the men's team was overcome by Emporia State late in the meet to finish second.

The meet was also a dual between the Cats and Oklahoma State for both the men and women, and the Cats beat the Cowboys in each.

"What we saw was that some people did a good job of keeping busy over the break, and some people didn't," K-State head coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Everyone knows who is who."

Highlighting the afternoon for the women's team was senior All-American pole vaulter Erin Anderson, who set a meet record of 12 feet, 9 1/2 inches.

Another standout for the team was senior Anna Whitham, who won the weight throw with a season-best and meet-record 60 feet, 1/2 inches. She also set a personal record of 47 feet, 3 1/2 inches in the shot put.

"When you look at some of the performances that were turned in like Erin and Anna, you've got people that are turning in national-qualifying type performances this early — that's pretty good, "Rovelto said.

The women won seven of the meet's 16 events, among them the debut of freshman cross country All-American Amy Mortimer, who placed first in the 800 meters with a time of 2:11.13. Sophomore Amanda Crouse took first place with a time of 5:00.61 in the mile, while junior Korene Hinds placed first in the 1000 meters with a time of 2:53.62.

The Cats also placed well in the shorter distances.

Junior Carmen Wright won the 60-meter high hurdles with a time of 8.83, and junior Terresha DeRossett capped the string of events won for the Cats with a high-jump mark of 5 feet, 8 1/2 inches.

The K-State men's team took an early lead backed by the performances of its throwers and pole vaulters. However, the Cats faltered late in the meet because of decimating injuries

Junior Tamel Sisney threw a season-best 58 feet, 3 inches in the weight throw and a 55 feet, 5 inches in the shot put to win both events, while senior Todd Petersen, freshman Tony Thompson and freshman Adam Polansky finished second, third and fourth, respectively, to sweep the shot put for K-State.

"If I had to rate myself on a grading scale, I'd give myself a C-plus," Sisney said. "My technique is still not around, but I did have some consistency today."

Sophomore Jim Gruenbacher took first in

John Rocker's outburst needs more than psychological evaluation, should be used to spur discussion

Just when baseball had began to overcome the racist imagery brought about by former Cincinnati Reds owner Marge Schott, along comes Atlanta Braves pitching sensation John Rocker.

In the course of a few short weeks, Rocker has gone from hurling fireballs on the pitchers mound to slinging racial epithets at reporters. This guy has put his foot in his mouth so many times he's got a recipe for Nike casserole.

For those of you unaware of what is now known as the "John Rocker incident," a little background information is in order: while riding in a car with an anxious sports reporter, Rocker said bad things about homosexuals, Asians, immigrants, black people, your mother, the Pope, the Bible and Johnny Carson.

Not exactly your typical Sunday cruise.

Then when Rocker's unpleasentries showed up in the most widely read sporting magazine in the nation, Sports Illustrated, the baseball world was turned upside down.

The immediate response from the media and the public alike was that Rocker should have been more cautious with his words in the presence of a reporter.

In short, he should have kept his mouth shut.

However, Rocker's inability to hold his tongue has proven to be invaluable. It has highlighted an important issue in sports that has gone overlooked for too long - the need to reevaluate race relations and racial tolerance.

In the shadow of Martin Luther King Jr. Day, it would be a travesty to allow Rocker's situation to pass by without taking note.

An important concern is that the Rocker debacle has done little to spur public outrage outside of minority groups and Braves' fans. Public support for the removal of Rocker from the Atlanta roster has been limited, and calls for harsh and decisive punishment have all but ceased.

It took intense pressure from concerned citizens, angry fans and the Rev. Jesse Jackson himself to convince Major League Baseball commissioner Bud Selig to take action against Atlanta's young star. Selig's ultimate decision on the issue resulted in mandatory psychological evaluation for the misguided Atlanta reliever.

Selig's poor attempt to placate Rocker's staunch critics has made a mockery of the situation altogether. Selig knows as well as you and I do that the prescribed psychiatric punishment will do little to cure the underlying racial issues.

Rocker's trip to the couch likely will resemble an opposing hitter's attempt to hit his fastball; there will be a lot of motion, but little will actually get accomplished.

We simply can't expect Selig's lightweight punishment to produce the needed alterations in Rocker's prejudicial behavior. In fact, there might be no definitive way to show Rocker, a self-proclaimed redneck, the damage and disappointment that his ill-spoken words have created.

In light of the situation, Rocker's father has been quick to express contempt for his son's prescribed punishment. He told reporters that the decision against Rocker was "the worst assassination against a young man" he'd ever seen.

In a sense, he might be right. We shouldn't bother to "assassinate" Rocker for his mistake; his neighbors, teammates, and opposing fans will do a far better job than we could ever hope to.

But punishment or not, it is vital that the sports community use Rocker's comments to spur on meaningful discussions regarding race relations. If the Rocker incident goes overlooked, it will be a great injustice to the very people that Rocker so offended by his words.

We can't afford for sports to send the message that racism, or discrimination in any form, is acceptable as long as the perpetrator promises to apologize afterward and then goes into treatment. If we do, the greatest travesty of the John Rocker situation will not be his comments, but rather our inability to use Rocker's mistake as a catalyst for renewed dialogue and progress towards increased racial harmony.

Braves fans have known for years of the caustic attitude and racially insensitive actions of superstar reliever John Rocker. Now, the world knows of Rocker's shortcomings and the shortcomings of sports in general.

It is to be hoped that groups will use the knowledge and attention gained from Rocker's mistake to move forward.

And with luck, John Rocker will find a relief role not only on the field, but also in the arena of social and racial justice.

K-State freshman guard Quentin Buchanan pulls down a rebound as Missouri guard Johnnie Parker attempts to knock the ball away during first-half action Saturday afternoon at the Hearnes Center in Columbia, Mo. The Tigers defeated the Wildcats 73-56.

TIGERS

With 3:32 to go in the half, freshman guard Kenyatta Dix's two free throws pulled K-State within four, but Tiger sophomore guard Keyon Dooling, who came into the contest averaging 16 points per game, fired back with two straight three-pointers, just six of his 10 points.

Just three K-State players scored in the opening half, including Dix's team-leading nine points. K-State had only seven field goals in the half.

Kitt, who led K-State for the game with 21 points and 11 rebounds, said the Cats' offense stems from its defense, and because the defense played poorly, so did the offense.

"I don't think we got into sync, defensively," Kitt said. "Our defense creates our offense, and we didn't get the stops tonight, and our offense didn't come."

Despite K-State's poor performance, Dix said Missouri's defense had a lot to do with the win.

"Missouri's a great defensive club," Dix said. "They deny everything, and I think that was one part of it. We had our problems getting out on the wings,and that created problems for our offense."

BASKETBALL

On offense, the Lady Raiders are led by freshman center Plenette Pierson, who has averaged 13.7 points per game, but Tech features a balanced attack that has four players with double-digit scoring averages.

"Their front court, with Plenette Pierson, Keitha Dickerson and Tanisha Ellison, is very formidable," Patterson said. "It's as an athletic a front court as you will see in the Big 12 and is very agile. Plenette Pierson has established herself as one of the most talented freshmen in the league."

To combat Tech's athleticism, Patterson said the Cats will have to rebound well.

"We obviously need to be very aggressive and active on the boards, because they're more athletic than us across the board" Patterson said. "And we must work very hard to limit their shot opportunities to one shot."

When the Cats are on offense, Patterson said they will need to do a better job of protecting the ball, although they have won their past two contests despite averaging 20.5 turnovers.

Patterson said that does not represent the Cats' play.

"It sounds strange to hear a coach say this, but I really thought we managed the game well," Patterson said. "Nicky Ramage had been injured for the two-day period prior to the Tech game and had not practiced. She had nine of those turnovers, and a lot of those were because she was rushing and was a little bit out of sync.

"It was kind of uncharacteristic for her, and I thought, really distorted the appearance of the type of game that was," she said.

Tech enters the game averaging 11.7 steals and will use intense full-court and half-court man-to-man pressure defense to try to force the Cats to turn over the ball.

"They bring one of the best defensive guards in the country to the floor in Katrisa O'Neal," Patterson said. "She creates a lot of offense for that Texas Tech club strictly by steals. It's important that we play mistake-free basketball in the half-court."

TRACK

the pole vault with a season-best 15 feet, 1 inch, while freshman Dustin Schmidt was right behind, placing second with a vault of 14 feet, 7 1/4 inches.

"Overall, I thought it went pretty well," Gruenbacher said. "But when it came down to the last few vaults, I think I could have done a little better, but this is still the best I've jumped this year."

While the competition on the men's side might not have looked to be impressive with two Division I teams in K-State and Oklahoma State, one NCAA Division II team in Emporia State and two NAIA teams in McKendree College and Oklahoma Baptist, Rovelto said the competition was still strong.

"Just because they are smaller schools doesn't mean that they're not quality programs, because they are," Rovelto said. "The two NAIA teams that were here are top-five programs, and Emporia State is usually a top-five program, so you're looking at three of the best teams in the country at those levels."

Students have opportunity to tour, earn credit while studying abroad

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spots still are available for students looking to take short trips abroad as a way to kick off their summer vacations.

Tours to destinations such as China, London, Prague and South Africa are a great way to see the world while earning K-State credit at the same time, said Elfrieda Nafziger, coordinator for Group Study Abroad at the Office of International Programs.

CLASS CREDIT
Students can earn three hours of undergraduate or graduate credit in courses offered at each seminar.

"There are about 10-12 summer opportunities available for students at the moment, but not enough students know about these in particular," Nafziger said.

K-State's visit to China will be led by Max Lu, assistant professor of geography, on May 15-25.

The nearly $3,400 fee for the excursion pays for each student's round-trip plane ticket, hotel accommodations and most meals, and will give students the chance to visit points of interest in cities such as Beijing, Hong Kong, Shanghai and Xi'an.

"In Beijing, for example, we'll visit the Great Wall and the Forbidden City," Lu said.

Lu said he will conduct two informational meetings for touring students before the first flight from Kansas City International Airport to Beijing.

He said the trip's purpose was to introduce K-State students to a country many probably have never explored properly.

"I want to show students things that are unique about China," he said.

The seminar's fee also includes tuition for three hours of undergraduate K-State credit, under Geography 680: Seminar in Regional Geography.

Kisangani Emizet, assistant professor of political science, will be leading a tour group to South Africa on May 14-29.

Stops on the tour will include the city of Soweto, where race riots in the 1970s brought the country's anti-apartheid movement to the attention of the entire world, and Robben Island, where Nelson Mandela spent many years in prison. The group also will visit with local political scientists to discuss the country's integration during the last decade.

Emizet said the only requirement for students making the trip to Africa is reading a small book to gain understanding of the country's background and rich political history.

Upon their return from overseas, students then will be asked to complete a small assignment for their tour leader.

"I'm asking students to write a small paper when we get back to give me an idea of their own experiences," Emizet said. "It's critical for them to write about what they saw in order to understand it."

The South African seminar will count as either Political Science 401 or 791.

A trip led by English professor Don Hedrick from May 21 to June 7 will include both London and Prague. He said it is mainly a way to introduce touring students to the way theater has evolved in Europe.

Attractions on this particular tour will include the reconstruction of William Shakespeare's Globe Theatre in London, as well as Prague's Charles University, which, at more than 600 years old, is Central Europe's oldest university.

The "Theater, Spectacle and Power" tour will count as either English 395 or 799, depending on whether students take it for undergraduate or graduate credit.

The deadline to apply for one of these three trips is today, but the leaders of the tours said it possibly could be extended for a month or so to allow students the chance to sign up.

"The deadline can be extended, probably until sometime in February," Lu said.

Nafziger said that while the tour leaders might delay application deadlines, some programs need the money required for the trips within the next few weeks.

"With some programs, the organizations need the money by Feb. 1, but some of the programs are more flexible," she said.

If money is an obstacle in joining one of the three programs, Nafziger said options are available to allow students low on cash the chance to join the tour groups.

"All of our programs have financial aid available, because you can earn K-State credit through these seminars," she said.

Emizet said the Office of International Programs was willing to help students wanting to travel with the seminars.

"We want to try and make it easy on the students," he said. "They can pay in installments. We're not asking them to provide all of the money at once."

The opportunity to study abroad, even for a few weeks at a time, is a great way to introduce K-State students to the world beyond Manhattan.

"Mark Twain once said that travel is fatal to prejudice," Nafziger said. "These seminars are a nice way to open students up to new experiences."

Baseball coach pushes to bring golf to Aggieville

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This summer could bring golf to Aggieville, if K-State baseball coach Mike Clark has his way.

Despite little news since this summer, Clark said he and his wife, Julia, still are working to begin construction of a miniature golf course in the area; he's just been busy with the upcoming baseball season.

"I haven't talked to my architect in about a month," Clark said.

He said he hopes to break ground some time this spring and open at least by the summer.

Since the February 1998 Aggieville fire burned down several businesses and cleared an open lot, there was speculation as to what would fill the spot. Clark began negotiations last year to construct a course on the lot, including an amendment to city zoning codes.

Clark said he plans to place two 18-hole courses in the lot, situated between The Futon Store and Speedwash Laundry, to fill a void in the district. In particular, he made reference to the loss of the Campus and Varsity movie theaters in recent years.

"When they lost their theaters, they lost that entertainment venue," he said.

Clark said he's had the idea for a course for six to seven years, around the time Putt-Putt Golf & Games left the east side of town near today's Dillons Superstore. The holdup in the plan, he said, was finding a good location.

Rusty Wilson, owner of the lot and Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, approached the Clarks with the location to lease. Since then, Clark said he has tried to learn the finances and planning of the course as he goes.

Clark said he hopes for a family atmosphere for the course that works well with the surrounding businesses.

"It is a unique situation because of all of the dining areas nearby," he said. "We're going to do our best to have a positive family atmosphere. I can't see us open to midnight."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said businesses are anxious for the new course.

"People tend to think of us as a bar district, and we're so much more than that," she said.

Finding a new tenant for the area isn't difficult, Sieben said. Aggieville virtually sells itself, she said, and a golf course in the area not only diversifies the district but serves customers too far away to use the other course at Wildcat Creek Sports Center.

Jonathan Fatley, manager of Wildcat Creek, said the new business is a good idea and should do well without hurting business at his miniature golf course.

Fatley said there are so many options at Wildcat Creek with volleyball, a driving range, a batting cage and the full size golf course, and the miniature golf course is a tiny part of the center's business.

"We wish them well," Fatley said.

Physical fitness consultants lead students down road of healthy living

Melissa Blaski, senior in kinesiology and nutritional exercise science, demonstrates one of the weight machines in the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Blaski and five other fitness consultants help people find a weight program that's right for them.

The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex's fitness-consultant program began in 1993 with one consultant. After the expansion in 1995, the number eventually grew to six, where it stands now.

As the need for the service grew, the expansion led to a first-floor office and room for more consultants for the program.

"We see over 300 people per semester," said Derek Walters, assistant director of recreational services.

Students, faculty or anyone with a membership to the rec complex looking to get in shape and create a fitness program specified for their lives can receive advice from six fitness consultants waiting to help.

Lori Strack, graduate assistant in wellness and certified personal trainer, is one of the six consultants. The other trainers are Rikki Comfort, senior in nutrition and exercise science; Travis Redeker, junior in kinesiology; April Moeder, senior in kinesiology; Melissa Blaski, senior in kinesiology and nutritional exercise science; and Laura Williamson, senior in nutrition and exercise science.

Strack said services provided include everything from advice on nutrition to body-fat testing. Blood pressure can be tested and weight orientation can be done on the Cybex and Nautilus machines. The Sub-Max VO2 test, which measures the level of cardiovascular fitness, also is available.

Stress, depression and previous health all are topics of questionnaires filled out to help create the optimal program.

"We are a resource center," Strack said. "If we don't have it, we will find it."

As part of the free service, the consultants soon will install a computer program, "Tri-Fit," that will enable them to enter information and print a report for the user to take home, Strack said.

Those interested either can walk in or call to make an appointment. The preliminary appointment will involve the questionnaires and basic program set-up. Tests can be run but probably will be finished with another appointment.

Blaski, working toward a master's degree in corporate fitness and massage therapy, said she likes working with her clients.

"I really enjoy helping people," Blaski said. "It makes me happy to know I'm helping people help themselves feel better."

Blaski said most students she sees come in for an exercise program. They want to lose weight and feel healthier.

She said she had known about the wellness center and heard from a friend about the job opening. Openings come when students graduate, and announcements are made mid-semester for the following year.

Blaski said the best way to sum up the program is information.

"You have the questions," Blaski said. "We have the answers."

"WE ARE A RESOURCE CENTER. IF WE DON'T HAVE IT, WE WILL FIND IT."

health question

SCHALLES

Q: How do students know what diet is right for them?

A: Any healthy eating plan is based on a variety of foods as portrayed in the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Food Guide Pyramid. Despite the recent popularity of fads such as high protein, low carbohydrate diets, health organizations still recommend increasing amounts of fruits, vegetables and whole grains.

For weight management, regular exercise gets the best long-term results, coupled with a good, common-sense balance of healthy foods. Obsessive dieting, severe fat restriction and the elimination of favorite foods usually causes more harm than good, with short-term results.

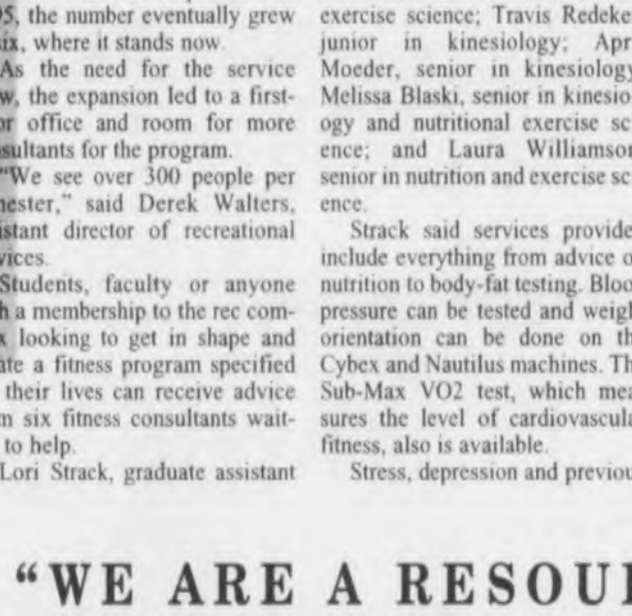
Health officials discount weight-related myths about the pill

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
Kansas State Collegian



Six simple words — "Don't worry, I'm on the pill" — might be music to a man's ears, but the pill might be causing its users some unfounded worries.

In today's weight-conscious society, weight gain rumored to spring from taking the pill is creating quite a stir. Stories of people gaining 15 to 20 pounds are causing some users to question benefits of the oral contraception.

"I've gained weight, but I can't attribute it to one certain thing," said Annie Reimer, freshman in open-option, who is taking birth-control pills. "It's a lifestyle change more than the pill."

The average weight gain that can be attributed to taking the pill is only about three to five pounds.

"There can be side effects of any hormonal treatment," said Reita Currie, registered nurse and health education and promotion adviser at Lafene Health Center. "Weight gain is blamed on the pill, but it is a process of maturing and lifestyle change."

Many users don't notice any significant weight gain after taking the pill.

"My appetite increased, but I didn't gain weight," said Abby Maze, freshman in biology and premedicine, who also uses the pill.

A number of area women continue to use the pill despite the minimal weight gain. Oral contraceptives are the No. 1 method of birth control in Riley County. Kathy Dickey, Riley County Health Department nursing supervisor, said 75 to 80 percent of the women who come to the Riley County Health Clinic are taking birth-control pills as a preferred contraceptive method.

Dickey said the benefits of taking the pill outweigh any small weight gain. The main benefit is pregnancy prevention. The pill has a 99-percent efficiency rate when used correctly and on a regular basis. Although the pill is effective at preventing pregnancy, it offers no protection against sexually transmitted diseases.

"We still encourage condoms used with birth control for the best STD protection," Dickey said.

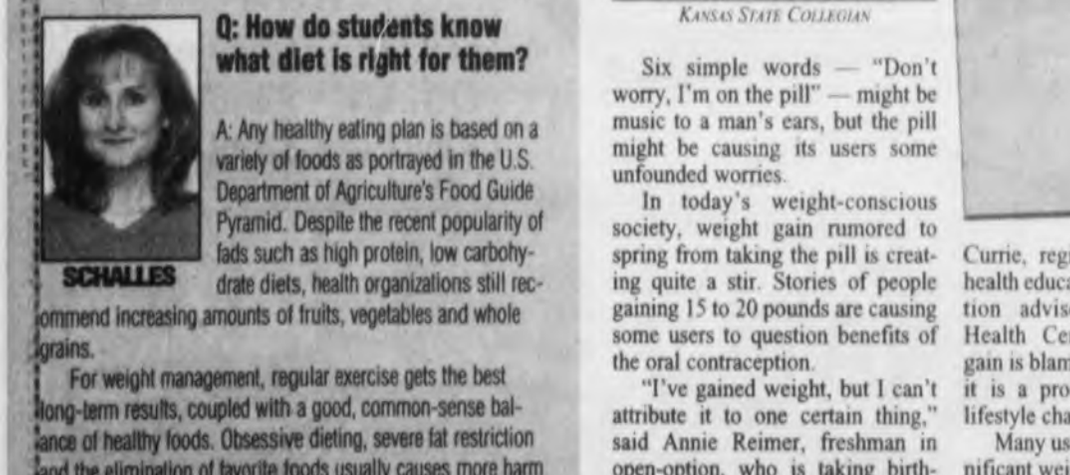
Other benefits of the pill include a decrease in the chances of developing certain cancers, a decrease in disorders related to iron deficiencies and a reduction of premenstrual syndrome symptoms.

Women also can use the pill to determine when they want to have their periods, enabling them to plan around vacations and weekends.

Studies also have shown the pill can help improve acne in certain cases.

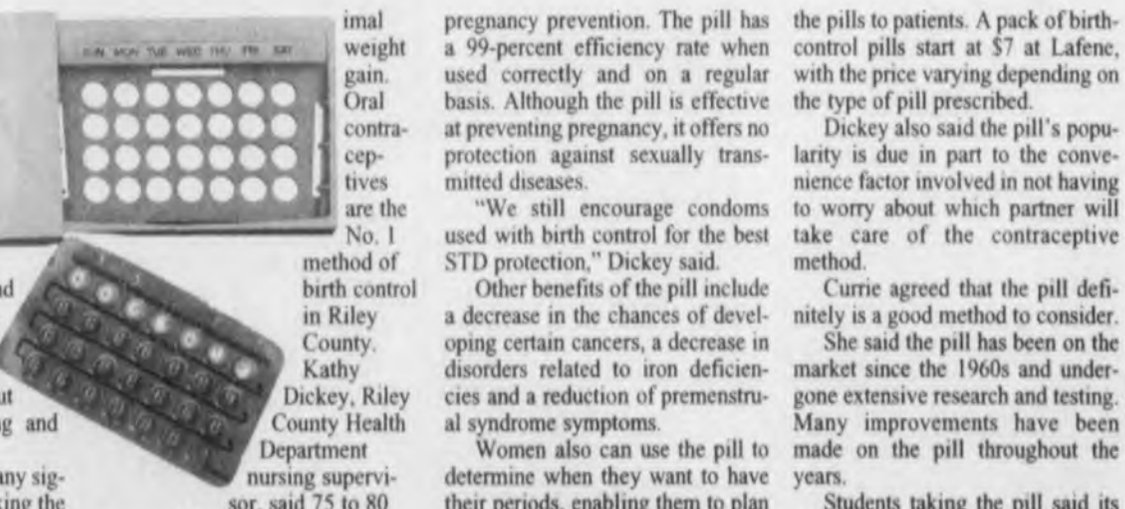
Another advantage of the pill is the cost. After undergoing a routine exam, doctors then can prescribe the pills to patients. A pack of birth-control pills start at $7 at Lafene, with the price varying depending on the type of pill prescribed.

Dickey also said the pill's popularity is due in part to the convenience factor involved in not having to worry about which partner will take care of the contraceptive method.



Currie agreed that the pill definitely is a good method to consider.

She said the pill has been on the market since the 1960s and undergone extensive research and testing. Many improvements have been made on the pill throughout the years.



Students taking the pill said its dependability made up for any flaws.

"I think it's a very trustworthy form of birth control when used effectively," Reimer said. "The benefits definitely outweigh any side effects."

Northview Elementary School participates in Seeds in Space program

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fourth-grade students at Northview Elementary School will team up against schools around the nation as Star Station One joins with NASA in a hands-on experiment and competition called Seeds in Space II.

"Every school district in the nation will have the ability to do science like NASA," said Daniel Bateman, space science educator at the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Center in Hutchinson.

Participating classrooms will be given tomato seeds that have been exposed to three different environments, plant them and devise a creative report explaining the results.

Each classroom will receive three different packets of seeds — one that has been flown on a NASA space shuttle, one exposed to an underwater habitat and a control packet that was kept under controlled conditions on Earth.

"Every class will do great work for themselves," Bateman said. "The competition lies in how they do the science and how their results are tabled out."

Jane Pickett, a fourth-grade teacher at Northview, and her class will team up with Karen Bargabus' fourthgrade class. Both teachers said they are looking forward to the experiment and giving their students an opportunity to learn more about the science process.

"It's a chance for children to practice science skills in a real-life situation that goes beyond our classroom," Bargabus said. "I'm hoping it will give the children a better, deeper interest in science knowledge and help them realize how much work goes into scientific discoveries."

MORE INFO?
To learn more about the Seeds in Space II program or the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Center, contact Daniel Bateman at (800) 397-0330, ext. 353, or e-mail him at danielb@cosmo.org by Thursday.

Pickett said she and Bargabus chose to sign up for the experiment for a number of reasons.

"We've been doing action research for about four years with the fourth- grade class to teach children the science process," Pickett said. "This is an opportunity to do research kids could participate in and see the results."

The main challenge for the students is to discover whether the seeds from space or from the underwater habitat grow, germinate or reproduce any differently than the control group. Each class will produce either a two-minute video or a write a two-page report based on its scientific discoveries. These results will be sent to the Cosmosphere for judgment.

"They will be judged on how well they present in an entertaining and informative way," Bateman said.

In addition to participating in the competition, Pickett said the project provides opportunities for students to enhance their scientific knowledge.

"My major goal is for the kids to get a healthy understanding of the science process and to realize that you do science everyday in daily life," Pickett said. "Some choices in life are scientific."

Bateman said NASA sponsored a project several years ago much like Seeds In Space II.

"I imagine it is because NASA sponsored a program similar to this one about 14 or 15 years ago," Bateman said. "NASA and the Space Flag Science Division do outreach together, and that is probably where they came up with the idea."

Star Station One, a trademarked organization, is a 62-partner institution consisting of museums, such as the Cosmosphere, which teach about the international space station.

"NASA looked at us and said, 'Why don't we work with them?'" Bateman said.

More than 50 Kansas classrooms have signed up to participate in the experiment. The deadline for registration is Thursday.

The results of the experiment must be received at the Kansas Cosmosphere by April 17. Bateman said results will be announced at that time, and awards will be presented to state and national winners.

"The state-winning teacher will receive a space CD ROM package and a space educator's handbook. The students will receive a T-shirt, screen saver and a commemorative poster," Bateman said.

"Winners at the national level will receive some pretty cool prizes. The teachers will receive an all-expense paid trip to the space station educator's conference in Houston in 2001. The students each get a $100 savings bond."

Bargabus said she thinks even non-winning students will gain other rewards from this experiment.

"It's a chance for children to practice science skills in a real life situation that goes beyond our classroom," Bargabus said.

To display their discoveries with the seeds, as well as other scientific experiments conducted by students at Northview, they will have a science fair from 9 a.m. to noon Feb. 5, in the gymnasium. The fair is open to the public, and members of the Triangle fraternity will be judging the experiments.

Rustin Bargabus, junior in electrical engineering, said the fraternity is trying to get more involved with the community by participating in activities like the Northview science fair.

"We wanted to get involved with something off-campus and with the community," he said. "I'm excited to get to work with the kids and help them out with their science projects."

Hawaii County prosecutor might pursue drug charge against Whitney Houston

Security finds marijuana in singer's bag at airport.

By JEAN CHRISTENSEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HONOLULU — Authorities are deciding whether they will file drug charges against pop star Whitney Houston.

Houston allegedly was found with half an ounce of marijuana at an airport security checkpoint but boarded her flight before police arrived.

Hawaii County Prosecutor Jay Kimura said he would wait for the results of a police investigation before deciding whether to charge the 36-year-old singer.

He said the most likely charge would be promoting a detrimental drug, an offense punishable by up to 30 days in jail and a $1,000 fine.

Kimura said his office typically does not pursue mainland suspects who are charged with petty misdemeanors such as marijuana possession. He said Houston could be served with a summons if she ever returns to the islands and could be arrested if she ignores the summons.

Houston was stopped Jan. 11 at a security checkpoint at Keahole-Kona International Airport while on her way to board a United Airlines flight to San Francisco.

The airport is on the island of Hawaii, 167 miles southeast of Honolulu.

During a search of her bag, a security officer allegedly found the marijuana and seized the bag. Airport security officers, who can arrest passengers only for crimes related to airport security, told her to stay with them until police arrived, police said.

Houston left the scene and boarded her flight, which departed about a half hour before police arrived, Big Island police representative William Donham said Monday. The Hawaii Tribune-Herald of Hilo reported that her husband, Bobby Brown, was traveling with her.

After San Francisco, Houston was heading to her East Coast home to prepare for a trip to Europe on Monday night or Tuesday.

Although she was one of the leading nominees at Monday's American Music Awards in Los Angeles, Houston was not scheduled to perform or attend the ceremony, awards spokesman Paul Shefrin said.

Representatives of the public relations firm that represents Houston were off for the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday and could not be reached.

The police spokesman said officers did not treat the situation any differently because it involved a celebrity. He noted that the airport is five miles away from the nearest police station and the amount of marijuana allegedly found was relatively small.

"I would imagine that they were busy," Donham said. "It's not a major crime. I don't think you realize how much dope does go through this island. We're one of the major growing areas in the country."

However, Houston and Brown have had run-ins with Hawaiian authorities before.

In 1997, Honolulu police investigated a report that Brown slapped Houston in the face during a quarrel in a mall parking lot. Police said they closed the investigation after Houston refused to cooperate.

That same year, Brown threw a punch at a Maui bar patron who had reached out for Houston. Brown missed and instead hit a county liquor control inspector in the ribs.

Last effort to contact spacecraft ends in silence

By MATTHEW FORDAHL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PASADENA, Calif. — NASA gave up trying to contact the missing Mars Polar Lander on Monday, confirming what had been suspected for more than a month:

The $165 million spacecraft was dead on arrival.

Engineers at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory listened for the spacecraft one last time and heard only silence.

"It is closure in the sense that I think we did everything we could to re-establish contact, and, yes, it's time to get on to other things," project scientist Richard Zurek said.

The spacecraft vanished Dec. 3 while trying to land on Mars.

It was to have studied the atmosphere and dug for ice during a 90-day mission.

It is suspected that the three-legged lander burned up in the atmosphere, crashed on Mars or tipped over on the rugged surface and damaged itself, though NASA has not confirmed any one of the possible explanations.

An internal JPL board and a team of independent investigators are looking into the failure as well as the loss of the Mars Climate Orbiter, which apparently burned up in the atmosphere last September because of a mixup between English and metric units.

The investigators also will take a hard look at NASA's entire Mars program.

At least some answers are expected by mid-March, about a year before the next Mars orbiter and lander are set to launch.

Each failed contact attempt eliminated a possible explanation for the silence. The final effort assumed the spacecraft's clock was scrambled and it didn't know when it was supposed to listen for a signal from Earth.

Efforts are under way to try to snap a picture of the lander's parachute from the Global Surveyor, a spacecraft in orbit around Mars, but its camera might not be sharp enough to pick up the parachute.

You'll never want to sell this book back.

Santana wins best album award

■ American Music Awards presents honors to Carey, Twain, Backstreet Boys.

By David Germain
The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Carlos Santana's band won best-album honors at Monday's American Music Awards for "Supernatural," a commercial comeback that put the rock guitar maestro on top of the charts for the first time in his 30-year career.

Shania Twain won two awards, for best pop-rock female artist and best country female artist.

"Supernatural," mixing Santana's searing instrumentals with vocals by such collaborators as Dave Matthews and Lauryn Hill, beat out two teen sensations, the Backstreet Boys' "Millennium" and Britney Spears' "... Baby One More Time."

Later in the evening, the Backstreet Boys topped Santana and 'N Sync for favorite pop-rock band, duo or group.

Santana took the stage to a standing ovation.

After thanking his parents, siblings and wife, he invited his producer, Clive Davis, to join him. "Your music has soared," Davis told Santana. "To musicians everywhere, this is a special moment, because it's this man."

Backstage, the 52-year-old Santana said, "A lot of people told me they didn't want to work with me because I'm old. Mr. Davis believed in me. We both believed we had a masterpiece in our belly."

Spears won for favorite new pop-rock artist. "This has been such an amazing adventure for me, this whole year," she said.

TLC was chosen as favorite soul-rhythm and blues artist on the strength of the album "FanMail."

Country winners included the following: Brooks & Dunn, favorite band, duo or group; Montgomery Gentry, new artist; and Garth Brooks, album for "Double Live."

"They say live albums never do anything. Thank you once again for not listening to the rules," Brooks said.

DMX won for favorite rap-hip hop artist. "I wouldn't have done this without Lord and savior Jesus Christ," he said.

Three awards were announced before the show: Red Hot Chili Peppers for favorite alternative artist, Phil Collins for adult contemporary artist and "Wild Wild West" for soundtrack.

Whitney Houston, who tied with Twain and Spears for most nominations with three, was departing for Europe on Monday night or Tuesday and did not plan on attending the show, awards spokesman Paul Shefrin said.

He said her absence was unrelated to an incident in Hawaii last week, when airport security guards said they found about half an ounce of marijuana in her bag but she boarded her flight before police arrived.

Nominees for the 27th annual awards were chosen by music industry representatives. The winners were decided by about 20,000 music fans nationwide.

Nominees for the 27th annual awards were chosen by music industry representatives.The winners were decided by about 20,000 music fans nationwide.

Besides awards in 20 regular categories, the show featured results of an Internet poll on listeners' favorite musical artists for each decade from the 1950s through the 1980s.

Elvis Presley was named favorite artist of the 1950s, the Beatles were picked for the 1960s and Stevie Wonder won for the 1970s.

The show also included an Award of Merit for Gloria Estefan, who was honored with a musical tribute featuring 'N Sync.

Mariah Carey received an Award of Achievement for her "rare and distinguished accomplishments." Michael Jackson and The artist Formerly Known as Prince are the only previous winners of that award.

Launch of 'smart rock' will determine missile's ability to aim, hit its targets

By Robert Burns
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — If all goes as planned Tuesday, a 121-pound "smart rock" will steer itself into the path of a mock warhead about 140 miles above the central Pacific Ocean. The military hopes it will create a celestial collision that will give the multibillion-dollar national missile defense project a big boost.

Or maybe not.

The "smart rock" — actually a highly sophisticated missile interceptor — is still learning, and Pentagon officials are quick to say that while they hope for a success they will not be surprised if the interceptor misses its target. After all, they say, this is a testing program and setbacks are to be expected.

This is not any run-of-the-mill testing program, however. At stake, in the Pentagon's view, is the nation's ability to defend itself against the kind of long-range missile threats that could emerge in the next decade.

North Korea, for example, is said to be developing a missile with enough range to reach U.S. soil, although it has not tested it in flight and agreed recently to halt missile testing for the time being. No other non-NATO country, other than Russia and China, possesses an intercontinental ballistic missile.

If Tuesday's test from Vandenburg, Air Force Base, Calif., proves successful, it could lead to a decision this summer by President Clinton to commit the United States officially to building a defense against missile attack at a cost of at least $12.7 billion.

If it fails, there will be another chance as soon as April to demonstrate that strategic missile defense is feasible — just one of several criteria the president has set for deciding whether to deploy it.

Clinton also will take into account the cost at a time when the armed forces are hard-pressed to buy the conventional weapons they say will be needed in the decades ahead.

There's also the effect on relations with Russia and China, both of which are strongly opposed to a U.S. national missile defense.

In his 2001 budget, to be unveiled Feb. 7, Clinton is expected to ask Congress for an additional $2.2 billion for the program.

That would buy an arsenal of 100 interceptors and pay for more testing and spare parts.

"This is a very high-priority program," chief Pentagon representative Kenneth Bacon said Friday. "We are working very hard ... to get the president the information he needs from the technical side to make a decision sometime this summer.

"Obviously, if we have a series of tests that are deemed to be failures we couldn't say that this was ready to deploy," he said.

If Clinton gives the go-ahead this summer, a missile defense could be ready to begin operating in 2005, although some Pentagon officials closely involved in the program said they think that is too ambitious a timetable.

The first flight test of the missile interceptor — known as a "kill vehicle" or by its Pentagon nickname, "smart rock" — was last Oct. 2. A third test is scheduled for April or May. The first test using the final version of the interceptor is not scheduled until 2003.

Although the missile used in the October test encountered some glitches en route to its target, it managed to score a hit by prompting the Pentagon to assert that it had demonstrated that a warhead carrying a nuclear or biological weapon can be totally destroyed and neutralized.

Critics are less certain. They doubt the reliability of a national missile defense and fault the Pentagon for planning only three interceptor tests before recommending a deployment decision to Clinton this summer.

"Regardless of the outcome of the upcoming test, it is already clear that the three tests will not provide sufficient basis to determine whether the ... system will work," said Tom Collina of the Union of Concerned Scientists, which opposes deployment.

Pentagon representative Bacon said it is not yet clear what degree of success must be achieved in the three tests.

"I can't tell you what will constitute the evidence we need to call this system ready to deploy," he said.

Republican, Democrat nominees vie for support before Iowa caucuses

Republicans fight for conservative vote

BY MIKE GLOVER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JOHNSTON, Iowa — There's a still-unresolved fight for the support of social conservatives, a force in Republican politics, with just a week until Iowa caucuses launch the presidential nominating season.

Four of the six Republican rivals are contending for that vote, to varying degrees, but the issue has yet to be settled.

"You get huge changes in the last seven to 10 days as people really focus," said publisher Steve Forbes, in an interview Sunday on Iowa Public Television. "I come from the business sector, where competition is a daily fact of life."

Forbes opened the final week before the caucuses traveling around the state delivering sharply conservative themes in an intense grassroots bus tour, but he was not the only candidate expressing a similar sentiment.

Activists Gary Bauer and Alan Keyes, along with Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch, offer similar conservative themes that have divided the Republican right. One effect of splitting the conservative vote has been to dilute the effect of conservatives who have yet to coalesce behind one contender.

Polls generally have shown Texas Gov. George W. Bush ahead, with Forbes in second place in Iowa and all the others in single digits. Bauer has hit the airwaves with new commercials and is crisscrossing the state in the final days.

He said the commitment of his backers will pay off.

"I think that with the passion level we've got among our supporters, we're going to be pleased on caucus night," Bauer said.

He has sought to separate himself from Forbes, reminding social conservatives of Forbes history on issues such as abortion.

"I have a 25-year record on the sanctity of life," Bauer said on "Fox News Sunday." "I'm not a Johnny-come-lately like Mr. Forbes."

Keyes has his own appeal, with a fiery speaking style and an in-your-face conservative message. In the latest GOP debate, he declined the offer to give a closing statement and instead led the candidates in a nationally televised prayer.

With almost no organization, he got 8 percent of the vote in the last precinct caucuses.

"I think people who watch those debates have already decided who is outstanding," said Keyes, also speaking on Fox.

Hatch has registered as barely a blip in the polling for Iowa's caucuses, but he aired a 30-minute commercial Saturday night, largely devoted to blasting President Clinton.

"Don't you think it's time that somebody speaks substantially on what's going on rather than 30-second spots and signs and hoopla, really that's what we've been getting during this campaign," said Hatch, who joined Bauer and Keyes on Fox.

Arizona Sen. John McCain appeared for a campaign debate in the state but isn't competing in the caucuses.

Polls show Forbes with more success in building backing among the right as he argues that he has the resources to take the conservative debate to Bush.

"You see it in my whole campaign," Forbes said. "They realize I have a broad-based, principled message that has brought people together."

Gore tops Bradley with black supporters

BY RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Al Gore holds a huge advantage over Bill Bradley among black voters, a group with significant influence later in the Democratic nomination fight. They help form the vice president's "Southern firewall."

GORE

Even with victories in New Hampshire and a few other early primary states, Bradley couldn't topple Gore without more support from blacks, particularly in the South.

That's why the Bradley campaign is questioning the vice president's commitment to blacks and reminding voters about the former New Jersey senator's own record on race relations.

The hurdles facing Bradley are high, but not insurmountable, according to Democratic pollsters and activists.

"Blacks are serving as Gore's Southern firewall — If Bradley happens to win Iowa and New York, then they go south and Gore has a remarkable number of black voters," said Democratic pollster Ron Lester, who surveys for several black congressmen. "Black voters have no reason to leave Gore, but if Bradley can blow Gore out in a couple of states, he might be able to catch on."

The candidates debated Monday — Martin Luther King Day — in a minority-run forum in Iowa.

Polls consistently show blacks backing Gore over Bradley by a 2-to-1 margin. That edge won't help in Iowa or New Hampshire, where few blacks are registered to vote, but the effect grows later on.

In nearly half of the 11 states conducting Democratic primaries March 7, blacks made up at least 10 percent of the vote in the 1992 presidential primaries. Still, Bradley's ties to New York and other Northeast states, and his ability to raise money in California, bode well for his chances in large states on that day.

Two days later, votes will be cast in South Carolina, where 43 percent of the Democrats who participated in the 1996 primaries were black.

On March 14, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Tennessee and Texas conduct primaries. Oklahoma is the only one of those states without a sizable black vote.

"Gore's going to come out of the South with enormous margins, and it's basically going to be all over but the crying," said David Bositis, an expert on black voting patterns with the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington.

"I wouldn't say it's automatic," said Silas Lee, a political pollster from New Orleans. He said Gore has yet to prove his black supporters are passionate enough to turn out and vote.

Analysts say Gore owes most of his support to President Clinton, who is viewed favorably by nine out of 10 blacks.

"Thank God I don't have to run against Bill Clinton," Bradley jokingly told an Iowa youngster Monday.

service, and that this is one of the fraternity's biggest community-service projects.

Next, Donald Fallon, K-State coordinator of religious activities, talked about his own personal experiences with racial tensions and experiences reported in the news.

"I've been involved for many years because of the awareness of what Martin Luther King Jr. stood for," Fallon said.

Fallon said he heard King speak at K-State in 1968. He said he took his son to the speech to hear King's message that all people are created with God's love.

"I saw him in January 1968, just before he was killed in Memphis," Fallon said.

After Fallon's speech, members of Alpha Phi Alpha lit candles and said a few words in remembrance of King. They then lit the candles the audience members were holding.

Following the lighting ceremony, Telisa New, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications; Sherice Phillips, sophomore in sociology; and Erika Cannon, sophomore in mathematics sang "Total Praise."

Clark said that as a national fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha is trying to build a memorial to King. He said it was passed by Congress in 1998 and would be built in Washington, D.C., at the Washington Mall.

"We are trying to build a memorial to him in D.C.," Fowler said.

Fallon concluded the service by having the audience sing "We Shall Overcome."

director for Jackson's Rainbow/PUSH Coalition.

Beasley said black National Football League players will be urged to protest the return of the Super Bowl to Atlanta until the flag is changed.

The Confederate emblem was added to the state flag by legislators in 1956, two years after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled school segregation unconstitutional.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People started a similar boycott Jan. 1 against South Carolina for flying the Confederate battle flag over its Statehouse.

Tourism is Georgia's second-largest industry behind manufacturing, accounting for $18 billion a year. Atlanta, the state's largest city, accounts for about 60 percent of that revenue.

"We have African-Americans in such high places in business and government ... and it would hurt them as much as anyone else," the governor said of a boycott. "I would certainly hope they (boycott organizers) would rethink that position."

Georgia Sen. Eric Johnson, a Republican, said he does not think the state's mood has changed since Democratic former Gov. Zell Miller tried and failed to push a flag change through the Legislature in 1993.

FLAG

■ Oregon Gov. John Kitzhaber was cast as President Kennedy in a play about King's life at Willamette University in Salem, Ore. Frank Thompson, assistant director of the Corrections Department, got the role of King.

■ Several hundred people marched through downtown Memphis to Claiborne Temple, where King had strategy meetings while leading a sanitation workers' strike in his final days.

■ In Arizona, which became the only state to establish the holiday by popular vote in 1992, 5,000 people gathered in a park to celebrate after a march through downtown Phoenix.

Not everyone used the occasion to celebrate King. In Oneonta, Ala., a group blocked from flying the Confederate flag at the courthouse brought its own pole and did it anyway, to honor Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee's birthday, which is Wednesday.

"Everybody wants to talk about Martin Luther King, and we're tired of it. We want them to talk about our hero," said Benjamin Hestley, commander of the 38-member St. Clair Camp 308 of the Sons of Confederate Veterans.

At the South Carolina rally against the flag, state police estimated the crowd at 46,000 people.

Frederick C. James, a retired African Methodist Episcopal bishop, said he was reminded of marching with King in Washington.

"We were just about as sure in 1963 that we were going to be victorious with the civil rights law, which was enacted in 1964, as we are now that this flag will come down off of that Statehouse," he said.

A few white marchers joined the mostly black crowd.

Margaret Abbott, 59, wore her grandmother's Daughters of Confederate Veterans certificate around her neck. She said her ancestors fought in the Civil and Revolutionary wars so she could have freedom of choice, and she wants the flag removed.

"We have a lot more important things to do than fight over this stupid flag," she said.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is waging a tourism boycott against South Carolina over the flag. Many marchers from out of state honored the boycott by spending Sunday night on cots in church basements instead of checking into hotels.

"This is the kind of thing we need to be doing on Martin Luther King's birthday," Martin Luther King III, King's son, said at a prayer breakfast. "The flag is a terrible symbol that brings a lot of negative energy. And while we believe the flag has an appropriate place, it just does not belong on top of the Capitol because it is not a sign of unification."

South Carolina raised the flag in 1962 during the Civil War centennial, and it flies atop the Statehouse along with the U.S. and state flags.

Supporters say the banner is a symbol of the state's heritage and honors Confederate soldiers killed in the Civil War. More than 6,000 Confederate flag supporters marched a week ago at the Statehouse.

Only South Carolina's Legislature can lower the flag.

While South Carolina is the only state still flying the flag from its Capitol, Georgia incorporated the symbol into its state flag in 1956.

Jackson's Rainbow/PUSH Coalition now wants tourists to boycott Georgia until the emblem is removed. Activists are threatening to begin the boycott on Jan. 30, the day of Super Bowl in Atlanta.

Movie sequel to 'Friday' tops box-office charts

BY DAVID GERMAIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The friendly mouse has given way to the neighborhood bully.

"Next Friday," starring Ice Cube as a man on the run from a vengeful bully, bumped off the reigning box-office champ, the mouse tale "Stuart Little," according to industry estimates Sunday.

The sequel to the 1995 film "Friday" took in $14.5 million Friday through Sunday. The movie has grossed $19.1 million since opening Wednesday.

"Stuart Little," the No. 1 movie three of the past four weekends, dropped to second place with $9.7 million.

"The Hurricane," which opened in limited release for Academy Award consideration around Christmas, expanded to 1,454 theaters Friday and came in at No. 3 for the weekend with $9.1 million. The movie stars Denzel Washington in the prison saga of boxer Rubin "Hurricane" Carter.

"Girl, Interrupted," starring Winona Ryder and Angelina Jolie as mental patients, also broke out of limited release and grabbed fourth place with $8.2 million in 1,902 theaters.

"Supernova," a sci-fi adventure featuring James Spader and Angela Bassett, fizzled with $5.7 million in 2,280 theaters, debuting in eighth place.

Playing in just 1,103 theaters, "Next Friday" averaged an impressive $13,146 a screen, compared with $6,259 for "The Hurricane" and $4,311 for "Girl, Interrupted."

The first "Friday" movie did a modest $27 million at theaters but went on to become a video hit. "Next Friday" already has done about two-thirds of that box-office business and grossed twice its production budget in just five days.

With strong appeal to black moviegoers, the film also benefitted from release during the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday weekend, when movie-going is up because many people have Monday off work.

Landon Lecture speakers named

■ Former reporter, military official 1st to accept invitations for spring.

By JOSEPH HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

K-State has put the first two names on the schedule of speakers who will deliver Landon Lectures this spring.

Bob Woodward, a former Washington Post reporter who — along with Carl Bernstein — revealed the Watergate scandal to the American public, is slated to speak at 10:30 a.m. March 29.

Gen. Richard B. Myers, a K-State graduate who recently was appointed vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff — the second-highest military position in the United States behind only the chairman — will speak at 10:30 a.m. April 26.

Both lectures will be in McCain Auditorium.

Landon Lecture Series Chairman Charles Reagan said he was pleased with the selection of the first speaker, Woodward, because he had set a precedent for investigative journalism.

"The lecture series looks for people in prominent positions in public life and for journalists who cover public life," Reagan said. "Bob Woodward was a natural selection."

Reagan also said he was happy when Myers accepted the invitation he personally delivered to him at a football game last year.

"We were thrilled when he was named vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff," Reagan said. "It's always nice to have a K-State grad come back to speak. He is only the second — the first was Marlon Fitzwater."

Edward Seaton, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series patrons, said he supported the selection of both Myers and Woodward.

He said he had known for some time that negotiations were under way with both men, but that finalizing the deals was difficult.

"These people are very busy," Seaton said, "and it's hard to find a time to get them scheduled."

Reagan said both Woodward and Myers agreed to deliver lectures some time ago but deciding on a date had delayed any announcement.

"Usually, people will tell us 'yes' in principle, but then it becomes a matter of finding a time to actually get them in to speak," Reagan said.

He said he is pleased with both speakers announced for this semester and with those from fall 1999, but there still were more invitations out.

Civil rights activist Lani Guinier speaks Tuesday night in McCain Auditorium. Guinier said the topic of affirmative action has been such a polarizing topic that people have taken sides without talking about it.

Miners used to take canaries into mines to determine if the atmosphere was toxic, said Lani Guinier, keynote speaker for Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

If the canary's fragile respiratory system gave way, then the miners knew entering the mine would be dangerous, Guinier said.

"I would like to talk about democracy and reclaiming the democratic vision," Guinier said. "I would like to talk about the canary."

She said democracy has to do with the ability of people getting together to solve problems.

"That is what democracy is about," Guinier said.

Using the metaphor of the canary and the miners, she discussed King's vision and methodology. The canary symbolized all people who are not represented, such as people of color and women, and the miners represented the atmosphere and environment which surrounds the canary.

Guinier said the way to a better democracy was to let the story of the canary be told, to let the unrepresented share their stories. She cited a statement King gave in a 1959 speech stating the importance of listening to the victim in order to transform society to benefit everyone.

"We blame the canary. We locate the problem in the canary and assume there is a way to fix it. We give it a pint-sized gas mask so that it can withstand the toxic atmosphere," Guinier said. "We need to fix the atmosphere in the mine, not just the canary."

She began by discussing democracy within public education. She cited several mission statements she said would be ideal for institutions of higher education, such as producing knowledge,

Jason Haslouer, freshman in agricultural education, hopes for a strike as he releases the ball in the Union recreation area Tuesday night during Rock'It bowling.

Laser lights spun and music filled the air as participants found their way through the fog to welcome the opening of Rock'It Bowl and Billiards on Tuesday at the K-State Student Union.

The recreation area was opened free to the public from 7 to 11 p.m., unveiling a new activity. Participants bowled and danced to the sounds of Dave Lewis of Allstar DJ. Bowlers were invited to participate in contests of bowling skill and knowledge of trivia, winning prizes donated by Budweiser, Pepsi Cola Bottling and other local vendors.

Jake Fajin, junior in architectural engineering, said the lights and music added to the bowling experience.

"It is an enhanced version of bowling," Fajin said. "It's a party atmosphere, like a club."

Jason Haslouer, freshman in agricultural education, said Rock'It Bowl will become popular with students if the word gets out.

"If more people hear about this, they will definitely be out," Haslouer said. "This keeps you from being cooped up all the time. ... This will bring more people out to get involved at the Union."

Haslouer also said he thought Rock'It Bowl will be an alternative to the Aggieville scene.

"It has pool tables like Fast Eddie's," Haslouer said. "It will bring people here to the Union instead of the bars."

Some students, such as Zac Cook, sophomore in biological and agricultural engineering,

Commission to consider plans for strip-mall area

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan City Commission unanimously adopted a resolution Tuesday night to consider a developer's plan for property on the east side of town. However, many commissioners said they would follow the tentative deal with a watchful eye.

In his presentation, Demetrios Dellaportas, First National Development Ltd. consultant, outlined the company's plan to develop 34-35 acres of land east of Fourth Street between Bluemont Avenue and Leavenworth Street.

The plan is to turn the area into a shopping center with as many as 30 tenants, Dellaportas said. The firm has worked in other areas on the outskirts of Chicago and Santa Fe, he said, keeping dollars in communities and existing businesses in the new developments.

"We will accommodate them (existing businesses) to stay in this district and flourish," he said.

Dellaportas also said redevelopment would fix the "atrocious" traffic situations like the intersection where Bluemont and Tuttle Creek Boulevard meet.

Accepting the resolution makes few commitments for the city, Ron Fehr, acting city manager, said. According to the resolution, the city will agree to work with only this developer for a time, he said.

Fehr said the next steps for the resolution will involve accepting a stronger preliminary agreement and setting a date for public hearings to establish the area as a redevelopment district.

Along the way, First National would be expected to submit a more detailed redevelopment plan and its economic feasibility.

Under the resolution, the city will consider allowing the developer to work in the area as a tax-increment financing district. Such a district, Fehr said, would set a tax cap for the area before it is developed. Any amount of property tax collected from the area greater than the cap can be reinvested in the area for projects such as sewer and street improvements or relocating businesses now in the area.

Normally, the city would issue bonds to pay for those improvements in a tax-increment district, Fehr said, but First National has offered to pay the amount and be paid back by the city.

However, city commissioners did not receive answers to all their questions on how First National would implement those changes. No specific tenants have been mentioned for the area, and Dellaportas said city administration would need to rely largely upon First National's expertise to provide a mix of successful large and small retailers.

Residents and business owners from the area, who could be displaced by the redevelopment, spoke against the plan.

Several recruits give verbal comittments to K-State football

Team now has nine verbal, non-binding commitments for 2000 season.

By MIKE VIETTI
Kansas State Collegian

It might be the off-season for football, but K-State coaches have been hard at work recruiting players for next year.

K-State now has nine verbal, non-binding commitments for next season, five from high schools and four from community colleges.

Josh Scobey originally signed with K-State out of high school two years ago, and after a two-year stint at Northeastern Oklahoma A&M, he finally will become a Wildcat next season.

Scobey rushed for 1,135 yards on 214 carries last season while scoring 15 touchdowns. He was named a second-team National Junior College Athletic Association All-American.

"Josh is more of a slashing type running back with a lot of speed, and he hits the hole really quick," NEO A&M head coach Dale Patterson said.

Patterson has coached four running backs who since have moved on to the National Football League, and he said Scobey could be his fifth someday.

"He ranks right up there with all of them," Patterson said. "Overall, he's one of the best I've ever had."

Linebacker Ken Greene of Independence Community College, Independence, Kan., is another of the Wildcats' commitments. Greene was leading his team in tackles when he broke his leg midway through last season.

Despite the injury, he still was named to the Jayhawk Conference's second-team defense.

"He was such a tremendous football player; and we're really going to miss him," Independence head coach Chip Schuler said. "He always had a tremendously positive attitude, and he always did everything the coaches asked him to."

Greene played defensive end his first year at Independence, but he made the switch to middle linebacker last season and expects to play there for K-State. Since he broke one of his legs, Greene has spent time rehabilitating and said he'll be ready to go next fall.

"I expect to come in and play when I get there," Greene said. "The only area I could get a little better in is my tackling."

Greene said Oklahoma State, South Carolina and Minnesota also were recruiting him.

K-State also went deep into the Big Red country to land offensive lineman Ryan Schmuecker of Lincoln, Neb. Despite playing his high school football in Nebraska, Schmuecker said he felt no obligation to play college football there.

"K-State is an awful good place to be," Schmuecker said. "There's a great opportunity to play football there, and the coaches are great as well."

Schmuecker said he expects to be a red shirt next year in an attempt to add strength and size to his frame. He also was being recruited by Nebraska, Iowa State and Colorado State.

The Cats are expected to sign between 15 and 17 players Feb. 2, the official signing day. K-State coaches are prohibited from commenting on recruits until then.

TAKE note

Hash giver The founder of Italy's Radical Party was convicted for the second time Tuesday of handing out free hashish.

Marco Pannella was ordered to pay a $3,700 fine and given a suspended sentence of two months and 20 days.

The case dated to December 1995, when he handed out about 3 grams of hashish to crowds in Rome's central Piazza Navona. Pannella has long crusaded for the legalization of hashish and marijuana, contending it would cripple the Mafia's lucrative drug-dealing business.

Three years ago, Pannella was handed a four-month suspended sentence for distributing free hashish and marijuana at a Roman flea market in 1995.

Tuesday's conviction comes as Italy's center-left government bickers over a proposal to legalize hashish and marijuana presented by the largest party in the coalition, the Democratic Left. Conservative leaders have denounced the proposal.

Pannella's past campaigns, which include hunger strikes and the distribution of money, have helped push through referendums legalizing divorce and abortion.

Cocaine shuttle A delivery service that made cocaine easy to order led to the indictment of 10 men accused of catering their drug trade to upper-class professionals in prime Manhattan neighborhoods.

"Cocaine distribution and use is destructive of society, especially when it becomes as easy to order as pizza," U.S. Attorney Mary Jo White said in a statement.

Hundreds of names, addresses and telephone numbers of customers in numerous residential buildings on the Upper East Side, the Upper West Side, Chelsea and Soho were listed with the service, authorities said. The organization also allegedly delivered to restaurants and bars.

After an order was placed, a delivery person posing as a livery cab driver would meet the customer at a prearranged location, according to the indictment.

Two of the defendants were being retained without bail. Two others were awaiting court appearances, and the others had not yet been arrested.

University of Illinois halts lethal testing on animals

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Bowing to protests from students, the University of Illinois has suspended first-year veterinary school lab experiments that can kill dogs, rabbits and pigs.

The decision to stop such experiments through the spring semester came after complaints from veterinary students and members of People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals.

Twenty-six students, a quarter of the first-year veterinary class, signed a petition last fall saying they would not participate in animal labs during the spring semester.

The veterinary school has used about 100 dogs and pigs annually to teach animal physiology, including a course in which students inject drugs into dogs to change their heartbeat or their rate of breathing.

The students have called for nonlethal alternatives to accommodate students who object, such as videotapes and computer programs.

Officials said they will use the spring semester to decide whether to resume experiments or make some changes.

Veterinary college Dean Ted Valli said the school also would stop conducting experiments using dogs bought through animal dealers. Critics say such dogs might be obtained through theft or other objectionable means.

Clinton offers aid, attention to 4 Third World countries

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As the Clinton administration heads into its final year, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright singled out four countries — Colombia, Nigeria, Indonesia and Ukraine — for special attention and U.S. aid.

"Each can be a major force for stability and progress in its region, and each is at a critical point along the democratic path," Albright said in a speech on democracy.

Albright did not say how much assistance the administration planned for the four countries beyond $1.6 billion for Colombia that she announced on her trip to the South American country last weekend.

"The struggle in Colombia is not between right and left, rich and poor, or between one ethnic group and another," she said. "It is between those who want to pursue prosperity and social development democratically and those addicted to criminality, violence and corruption."

Nigeria, she said, has had its U.S. aid nearly quadrupled under President Clinton in an effort to help Nigerians deal with threats to stability and democracy. The African country is faced with a high-stakes test of democracy, Albright said, and "we must do all we can to help them succeed."

Indonesia's President Abdurrahman Wahid deserves support as he tries to stabilize the economy, deepen civilian control of the military, establish the rule of law, maintain national unity and respect human rights, Albright said.

She called Ukraine a partner and friend of the United States, threatened with economic decline, corruption and crime. "We will continue to help our partner move down the path to deeper reform, fuller freedom and sustained growth," she said.

Wrestler throws boa in ring for N.C. gubernatorial race

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Ric "Nature Boy" Flair says he wants to follow the lead of fellow wrestler Jesse "The Body" Ventura, now Minnesota's governor, and run for North Carolina's top office.

Flair said Monday on the "Live with Regis and Kathie Lee" TV show that he was interested in the job, possibly as an independent candidate.

"I'm putting together a team, and I'm going to take a shot at it," Flair said after the show.

Flair, part of the World Championship Wrestling circuit, has played heroes and villains in the ring, always with elaborate robes sporting rhinestones and peacock feathers.

"I may have to tone down a few things, but I think charisma can go a long way," Flair said.

Flair, whose real name is Richard Morgan Fliehr, has lived in Charlotte since 1974 and has dabbled in Republican politics. He has raised funds or campaigned for Sen. Jesse Helms, Rep. Sue Myrick and Sen. Lauch Faircloth.

At least seven Democrats or Republicans have entered the field to succeed Democratic Gov. Jim Hunt, who has served two consecutive terms.

training leaders and producing citizens who are able to support themselves in our economy.

She gave three examples of case studies that dealt with minorities and the unrepresented.

In each case study, the minorities excelled after their problems were recognized and dealt with by changing the environment — not the canary.

One case study focused on a law in New York City that required all police officers to be at least 5 feet, 10 inches tall. Many women who wanted to be police officers challenged the law, and it was changed.

Guinier said that instead of using their size to prevent crime, women would become involved in the community. This involvement helped to decrease deviance.

"These women identified troubled men in society that had had past problems and went to them," Guinier said. "The incidence of violent crime went down. These women were keeping the peace but changed the way women police looked at their job."

The final case study she discussed dealt with the issue of admissions into higher institutions of education.

She challenged the validity of standardized aptitude tests and their prediction of knowledge and of how well one will do in the future. She said they needed to be more real to life, and that they were not a prediction of how well one actually would do in college and in life.

To understand who's qualified, Guinier said people need to ask what criteria is necessary for the task.

"If we bring in all of the canaries along with the miners, we can convert what would have been a tragedy into a triumph," Guinier said.

After her presentation, Guinier, the author of three books, was available for a book signing.

Christie Meller, graduate student in speech communication, theater and dance, said she was impressed how Guinier put an original perspective on issues relevant to K-State.

"I think she really showed how a woman can become successful in a white-male-dominated society and still hold on to her cultural roots," Meller said.

New RCPD director plans to work with community to solve problems

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department has a new director for the first time in 22 years,

Former Wichita Police Chief Mike Watson took over the position at RCPD when Alvan Johnson retired after 22 years as the police director in Manhattan.

Although Watson wasn't scheduled to begin his duties until Jan. 3, Watson's first task as director was to attempt to curb any Y2K problems Jan. 1 at the Emergency Operations Center.

After serving as a Wichita police officer for 24 years and the city's chief for 4 1/2 years, Watson contacted the International Association of Chiefs of Police and applied for the position when he learned of Johnson's retirement.

Watson, a 1970 K-State graduate, said he always wanted to take the position in Manhattan but didn't expect Johnson to leave.

"Alvan had been there for so long and I didn't expect him to leave," Watson said.

"But when I found out the position was open, I had to look in on it. I was at the point where I could have retired in Wichita, but I always wanted to give back to the area in Manhattan."

Former Riley County Law Enforcement Agency Chairman Bruce Snead said the agency began looking for Johnson's replacement in April.

After Johnson notified the board of his resignation, the agency contacted three consultants and more than a dozen community members to produce a profile of Manhattan's new police chief.

WATSON

Snead said the agency then reduced 57 initial applicants down to six. The agency conducted a two-day interview process Nov. 8 and 9 with the six applicants, including Watson, two applicants from RCPD and three others.

Snead said Watson's service in Wichita and his community policing efforts made him a solid choice for the position.

"His community-oriented policing was very attractive," Snead said. "He seemed to fit the position the best. Mr. Watson's experience in Wichita was very favorable and he brought a knowledge of Kansas State University, Manhattan and the surrounding area."

Watson's community policing in Wichita was extremely successful earning international and national praise. In his 4 1/2 years as police chief, Wichita's crime rate dropped every year and reached its lowest level since the 1970s.

Bob Circle, executive assistant chief of the Wichita Police Department, worked with Watson for 25 years and said Watson's community philosophy positively affected crime fighting in Wichita.

"Mike Watson not only had a major impact on the community, but a major impact on the police department," he said. "He totally transformed law enforcement in the area. He pulled the community and the law enforcement together. Watson definitely left his mark."

Watson and the Wichita police department received the prestigious Webber Sevey Award for quality in policing, given only to three departments in the world.

In 1998, Watson was named the Law Enforcement Professional of the Year, a state wide award presented by the Wichita Crime Commission.

"My philosophy of policing is working with the community to determine problems in the community," he said. "It was extremely successful in Wichita, and I definitely want to have more interaction with the community in Manhattan."

Watson's community programs included neighborhood watch, crime prevention, work with victims groups and juvenile crime prevention.

Circle said Watson trained the officers in Wichita to be crime solvers, not just report takers.

"He made officers into problem solvers instead of report takers," he said. "He trained the officers to look for underlying causes and then work for a solution."

Watson said he hasn't made any structural changes yet at RCPD, but he will continue to talk to officers and community members to determine what policies will work most effectively.

"I want to discuss with the community, officers, students and even bars to determine what works," he said. "But I'm going to be here for a while before I change any structural matters."

Groups threaten violence if Cuban boy stays in U.S.

BY REBECCA SINDERBRAND
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Leaders of several Cuban-American and religious groups that want Elian Gonzalez returned to his father in Cuba said Tuesday they were prepared to call for protests and acts of civil disobedience if the child is not sent back soon.

They urged Attorney General Janet Reno to enforce the decision of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and release the boy to his father's custody in Cuba before Congress or the courts become any more involved.

"The attorney general doesn't even need to wait" for the courts and Congress to act, said Rep. Jose Serrano, D-N.Y. "She has the final say. There is still time for her to send Elian back to Cuba."

He sharply criticized some groups that oppose the boy's return, saying they have inserted themselves into the process.

"Both political parties are in a race to see who can 'out-Miami Cuban' the other," Serrano said.

The assembled activists had tough words for the Florida courts, contending that state Judge Rosa Rodriguez, who issued an order blocking Elian's return, deliberately concealed campaign ties to man who has been prominent in the effort to keep the boy in the United States.

Calling the judge a disgrace, Serrano said, "Judge Rodriguez should resign from the bench."

Those in attendance also denounced Congress for considering legislation that would grant U.S. citizenship to the six-year-old over his father's objections.

Campbell said she had met with the father, Juan Gonzalez, and other family members, and promised them her organization would fight on their behalf.

"Nations don't raise children," Campbell said. "Fathers and mothers and families raise children."

Online procedure to make voting process easier for students

K-State elections will take a turn for the better this semester by making a switch to online voting.

The change is being made partly in response to issues that arose in last year's election for student body president and partly to widen voting availability. Both offer a rare glimpse of wisdom emerging from the office of Student Body President Jason Heinrich.

Heinrich appointed Travis Morgan to serve as the Election Committee chair for his term, and Morgan has taken steps to ensure there will be no repeat of the fiasco that occurred during the last election under his predecessor, Joe Ashley. During that election, Ashley was found guilty by Student Tribunal of tampering with the election by releasing information about the balloting early.

Now, under Morgan's direction, the elections will be conducted entirely online. This will be made possible through the use of votehere.net, which will be accessible through the KATS site.

This will ensure that voting is completely fair, as no student will have any part in tallying the results. They also will have no prior knowledge of any results.

While it is doubtful that a situation similar to that which arose last year ever would be repeated, it is comforting to see that efforts have been taken to ensure that there is no chance of it.

In addition, this move will allow students to vote for their student government while eating Cheetos or watching television at their own home. Therefore, students who do not normally take part in voting will have an opportunity to have a voice in choosing their leaders.

▶ OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The main benefactors of the plan appear to be students who previously did not venture to one of the voting destinations. It also will be a boon to students who are studying abroad, and students at K-State-Salina, who again will be allowed suffrage.

All the kinks have not been worked out yet, though. The committee is toying with the idea — a bad one — of cutting short the length of elections and allowing students less of a chance to cast their vote. This would negate one of the main points of online voting, which is to increase voter participation.

However, if Morgan and the elections committee decide wisely, they will have taken an excellent step to improve the voting system and student government as a whole.

MAKING A MARK

Atlanta Braves pitcher has right to voice opinion, should remain unpunished for his racist remarks

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

John Rocker has become a household name — not only in New York, but pretty much anywhere that has news media.

Rocker, who pitched in several post-season games last season, became a target of aggression for many New York baseball fans by provoking Mets fans in the National League Championship Series and Yankees fans the World Series.

Mets fans poured beer on him when he was getting ready to take the field, in addition to throwing bottles at him. One Mets fan spit in his face when he was entering the dugout after taunting him because he struck out a New York hitter.

Rocker didn't win the favor of Yankees fans, either. He was pelted with batteries and other objects during the World Series.

All of this, however, is nothing compared to what would follow in upcoming months.

In a December interview with Sports Illustrated, Rocker's chance to have the last word with New York's baseball fans turned into a nightmare. Rocker went from a 25-year-old leftie with an attitude to the most hated man in America. Overnight.

When asked if he would ever play for a New York team, he said, "I would retire first. It's the most hectic, nerve-racking city. Imagine having to take the (No.) 7 train to the ballpark, looking like you're riding through Beirut next to some kid with purple hair next to some queer with AIDS, right next to some dude who just got out of jail for the fourth time, right next to some 20-year-old mom with four kids. It's depressing."

Rocker went on to share his feelings about New York City itself: "The biggest thing I don't like about New York are the foreigners. I'm not a very big fan of foreigners. You can walk an entire block in Times Square and not hear anybody speaking English. Asians and Koreans and Vietnamese and Indians and Russians and Spanish people and everything up there. How the hell did they get into this country?"

Rocker's heaviest critics have demanded he be banned from baseball, but so far he's only undergone a psychological evaluation as ordered by Major League Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig.

Most everyone agrees that what he said was racist, bigoted and uncalled for, but the big question is, what should be done about it?

The answer is nothing.

Major League Baseball is a private organization, so the First Amendment — "Congress shall make no law … abridging the freedom of speech" — does not grant Rocker the right to say whatever he wants and walk away unpunished by the organization for which he works. The First Amendment does not protect him in the private sector.

He is at the mercy of baseball, just as he would be if he walked into a sold-out Shea Stadium — which it will be if he ever pitches again — and gave everyone the finger.

The difference is that Rocker did not grab the microphone at Shea Stadium and make these statements to Mets fans in the middle of a baseball game. Instead, he made them in an interview with Sports Illustrated in his hometown of Macon, Ga., during the off-season.

Rocker has the right to his own opinions and, if a magazine asks him what he thinks about a certain subject or a group of people, he has the right to say what he thinks.

K-State President Jon Wefald brought some unwanted attention to himself when he made a controversial statement in a letter about the University of Texas in late September.

Granted, Wefald's comments were nowhere near the extremity of Rocker's statements and in no way does Wefald deserve to be mentioned in the same column as he, except for the fact that Wefald made one mistake that Rocker did not.

When Wefald said, "Very few people will cheer for the Longhorns because the University of Texas represents, in most people's minds, incredible wealth and arrogance," he took it upon himself to speak for all of us (Coincidentally, I agree with Wefald).

Rocker only spoke for himself.

Wefald later apologized for what he said and, recently, so did Rocker, in an interview with ESPN.

The only thing Rocker did was exercise bad judgment. Even though I strongly disagree with his viewpoint, he is not at fault for having an opinion different than me, Selig or Hank Aaron, a critic of Rocker and executive in the Braves' front office.

If Rocker can survive spring training with his angry teammates, a constant following by a controversy-hungry media, and a season of hostile crowds in every ballpark that he visits (including Atlanta's Turner Field), he will have learned a lesson that is far greater than the one that any fine or suspension could teach, and he will have paid his sentence in full.

Students need to know individual instructors' policies, Honor System rules

The beginning of a second semester under the umbrella of the Honor System — the new method adjudicating cases of academic dishonesty at K-State — provides a welcome opportunity to review the operation of the Honor System and to highlight areas to improve.

It is important to remember the responsibility we all share for keeping the ideals of academic integrity intact. When Don McCabe, professor of organizational management at Rutgers University and founder of the Center for Academic Integrity, came to visit K-State, he said that when faculty fail to make reference to the Honor System and use it to report violations of the Honor Code, students will not either. The success or failure of this program — particularly in its infancy — critically depends on the involvement of the faculty. How can one expect students to be concerned about their level of academic integrity if their teachers do not express concern over whether they cheat?

A number of students have reported their instructors did not take the time to explain the Honor System and/or their policies regarding groupwork, old tests, materials allowed in the testing environment, old labs and projects and other particulars that often are unique to each class.

Instructors across campus vary in their approach to teaching — often what is acceptable in one class is unacceptable in another. For instance, some instructors look favorably upon groupwork with lab experiments. Others accept groupwork on the lab but not on the lab write-up. Still others find groupwork on any aspect of a lab to be distasteful. Such varied opinions can coexist in the same department or even in the same course, depending on the section.

Clearly, not all students always are aware of the variations in policy among a set of courses. For example, depending on experience, many students generally are inclined to believe groupwork is acceptable unless told otherwise. It is important not to get stuck thinking something is appropriate in one class simply because it is appropriate in another. If you have questions about what resources to use on assignments, or if you are unaware of your course's specific cheating policy, ask your instructor.

Likewise, faculty members often are surprised to find their opinions differ from those of their students when it comes to groupwork. Don't be — nor should you be surprised to find your opinions vary from those of your students on a number of other issues concerning academic honesty. Differences in teaching styles and types of work assigned make it necessary to give students specific instruction each time they enter a new classroom for a new semester.

If you are a faculty member and are uncertain about how to approach a discussion of academic honesty and the Honor Code, consider the following:

■ Discuss the idea that there is a shared responsibility between students and faculty for ensuring that learning takes place. Note that it is the instructor's responsibility to make certain that the information being given to the students is factual, current and relevant to the class. Note that lecture notes on the World Wide Web, unless given by the instructor, are not a substitute for attending class. Likewise, notes from previous sections or from classmates should not be a substitute, either.

■ Discuss the consequences of cheating — namely the XF policy. Students found in violation of the Honor Code are given an XF on their transcript: an F, showing they failed the course, and an X, showing the reason they failed was because of cheating. Note that the X will not come off their transcript unless the student participates in a special class sanctioned by the Honor System director.

■ Talk about your policies on groupwork, on the use of old material, labs, assignments, papers, etc.

■ Discuss your policy on tests — what items are allowed in the testing environment, should students review with old tests, can students review together, etc.

■ Remind them of the Honor Code pledge: "On my honor as a student, I have neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this academic work."

The above should only serve as a framework for a presentation. Use what works best for your class.

If you have further questions on reducing cheating in your class, or if you are a student who has questions about the Honor System in general, refer to the Web site www.ksu.edu/honor.

Thank you for your continued vigilance, and for helping to guarantee the quality of the academic environment at K-State.

Posters on sale at Union

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
Kansas State Collegian

Jeff Judy and Dominic Livingston, sales representatives for Trent Graphics, are on a mission. They have driven 13 hours from Columbus, Ohio, to help K-State students decorate their rooms.

The poster and print sale kicked off Tuesday and will continue until Friday on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union. The posters will be sold from 9 a.m. until 5 p.m.

The posters and art work are shipped to Trent Graphics from Stroudsburg, Penn. After the show Friday, Judy and Livingston will travel to Texas before returning to Ohio.

Judy said there is a wide variety in the styles of works offered at the sale.

"We have a good quantity of art, music and movie posters," Judy said. "We have a pretty good selection of art prints that are hard to find and they are at good prices."

Amanda Nufer, senior in finance, said she was impressed with the selection.

"There is a lot of interesting stuff to decorate your walls with," Nufer said.

Livingston said students should check the sale out for a variety of reasons.

"They need to decorate their rooms, and the posters are cheap," Livingston said.

The posters and prints range in price from $2.95 to $27.

John Key, freshman in pre-health professions, said he already had been to the poster sale twice by early Tuesday afternoon and said he thought the prices are reasonable.

"It's a lot cheaper than other stores," Key said.

Key had purchased four posters ranging from Led Zeppelin to the Blues Brothers.

Key returned a second time because he had been debating on purchasing a "Mall Rats" poster and a print of John Belushi from "Animal House." The latter shows Belushi in his "College" sweatshirt holding bottle of Jack Daniels. Key said he liked the poster because he could relate to it.

Students will not only have a chance to find posters and prints. There are other benefits as well. The Union Program Council's Arts Committee sponsors the sale and will receive a portion of what Trent Graphics earns.

"Our sponsor gets 15 percent of the total sales," Judy said. "We have to have a sponsor at every school we go to."

The company sends representatives to colleges twice a year.

Livingston, who is in his second year as a sales representative, said the sale already has been a hit.

"It's real successful," Livingston said. "The posters sell themselves."

Supreme Court allows schools' closing on Good Friday

By RICHARD CARELLI
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court is allowing Maryland to require public schools to close on Good Friday, but the legitimacy of that law and Good Friday laws in more than a dozen states remains clouded.

The justices, acting without comment Tuesday, rejected an appeal in which a retired Maryland teacher said the school-closings law violates constitutionally required separation of church and state.

In a separate action, the nation's highest court turned away appeals by Quakers who say the Internal Revenue Service violates their religious freedom by charging fees and interest for delays in paying the portion of their federal tax that funds the military.

Among the states with Good Friday laws, only Maryland, Illinois and South Dakota require all public schools to close on that day each year. A federal appeals court struck down the Illinois law.

The justices still have before them a challenge to an Indiana law designating Good Friday a state holiday. They have not yet said whether they will grant full review to that dispute.

"This is not going away," said Dwight Sullivan, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer in Baltimore. "You have the Constitution being applied differently in different states."

Former teacher Judith Koenick said in her appeal that the Maryland law sends the message to non-Christians that the state finds Good Friday, and thus Christianity, to be a religion worth honoring, while other religions are not of equal importance.

> "You have the Constitution being applied differently in different states."
> — Dwight Sullivan, American Civil Liberties Union lawyer

"That message is particularly significant in this case because it is being sent to schoolchildren," she said.

Lower courts rejected her argument. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the long weekend's legitimate purpose is to avoid anticipated high absenteeism among teachers and students on the days surrounding Easter, the holiest of Christian holidays.

Good Friday, always two days before Easter Sunday, commemorates the crucifixion of Jesus Christ.

Montgomery County schools also are closed on Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement, and the first day of Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish new year. Those policy decisions are based not on anticipated absenteeism but on findings that large numbers of students would be absent if schools were open on those days.

Maryland law does not require school closings for any Jewish holiday. State law designates these public school holidays: Thanksgiving and the day after, Christmas Eve through Jan. 1, the Friday before Easter through the Monday after, Memorial Day and primary and general election days.

State and federal courts are divided, the justices were told, over the constitutionality of laws or governmental practices that deal with Good Friday.

Lawyers for Koenick have urged the court to bring order to the lower courts' chaotic decisions concerning governmental recognition of Good Friday.

However, lawyers for the Montgomery County Board of Education said the four-day holiday is anchored around the increasingly secularized holiday of Easter, which is a traditional time for Marylanders, like many other Americans, to begin Easter-related travel.

The justices were told that 13 states have Good Friday laws: Delaware, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, New Jersey, North Carolina, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Wisconsin.

California and Kentucky have laws establishing part of Good Friday as a holiday for government employees, and in Texas the day is an optional holiday for state employees.

In the Quakers' case, the court turned away arguments by three Religious Society of Friends members from New England and Pennsylvania. The action let the IRS continue charging late fees and interest in addition to their back taxes.

The appeals filed on behalf of Gordon and Edith Browne, who have homes in New Hampshire and Vermont, and Priscilla Lippincott Adams of Philadelphia, did not contest having to pay 100 percent of their tax bill when the tax agency forces their hand.

Instead, the Quakers cited a religious hardship and argued that they should be able to pay the back taxes without any penalties or interest.

They said that as a result of religious faith and study, they cannot voluntarily pay that portion of their federal income taxes which they determine are dedicated to war and war-related activities.

In rejecting those arguments, lower courts relied on a 1982 Supreme Court decision that said, "The tax system could not function if denominations were allowed to challenge (it) because tax payments were spent in a manner that violates their religious belief."

The K-State women's basketball team could smell victory Tuesday.

Unfortunately, they just barely missed tasting it, losing to No. 15/16 Texas Tech 51-47.

The Cats (9-9, 2-3) had the chance to tie the game with 1:44 remaining, but guard Kristin Rethman's three-point attempt circled the rim. Finally, two late K-State turnovers sealed the Cats' fate.

While Tech (14-2, 3-2) was a ranked team and favored to win, the game's result still was disappointing to the Cats.

"I never once thought in the beginning of the game that we would lose this game," Angie Finkes said. "This one slipped through our fingers."

For a while, it looked as if K-State might not even make it close.

After the Cats jumped out to an early 10-5 lead, Tech went on a 19-1 run in which guard Katrisa O'Neal stole the ball four times and scored 10 points.

"Coach (Marsha) Sharp talked to us about coming out and putting pressure on the ball and making it hard for them to get into their offense," O'Neal said. "Luckily, I came up with steals and got our offense going."

O'Neal's play highlighted what has been the Cats' largest problem spot throughout the year — their guard play.Head coach Deb Patterson said some of their problems were a due to a lack of quickness.

"It's the nature of our guards' strengths that they're great shooters but not real adept at being able to blow by somebody," Patterson said. "So even if you have an adequate handle, if you don't have the quicks to go by somebody, you can struggle."

One guard did have "the quicks" for a while, though.

The lone bright spot in the first half for the Cats was the play of Rethman. Normally a stand-still three-point shooter, she began creating shots by driving the lane. As a result, Rethman's efforts were rewarded with a team-leading nine points at halftime.

Despite her efforts, though, Tech led 27-19 at intermission.

In the second half, K-State came roaring back and outscored the Lady Raiders 16-10 to open the half. The Cats' run was led by forward Nicky Ramage, who, after scoring just four points in the first half, rebounded in the second half with 11 points in a seven-minute period.

"I just changed the way I handled the ball from the first half to the second half," Ramage said. "I just realized that I had to do something different against their posts. They had a huge vertical and liked to block shots. You just can't shoot over stuff like that."

The Cats continued to play Tech close for the remainder of the game but fell short. K-State's comeback attempt was hampered when Ramage fouled out with 4:41 remaining in regulation.

Before the loss of Ramage, the Cats' other post players struggled. Finkes scored just six points, and center Olga Firsova could added eight more. Patterson said that with the loss of Ramage, and with the two other post players struggling offensively, the team lacked an inside threat during the game's critical final minutes.

"We really missed their presence," Patterson said.

However, Patterson claimed responsibility for this problem.

"It's my job to make the job easier for our players in those critical moments," Patterson said. "We struggled during those last three minutes, and I take responsibility for that."

So close, yet so far away

The loss to the No. 15/16 Lady Raiders dropped the Wildcats to 2-5 all-time vs. Texas Tech and 0-4 on the season against ranked opponents. Tuesday's 4-point loss was the second time the Wildcats came within a hair's breadth of an upset in those games. Earlier this season, K-State lost by one point to No. 6 North Carolina State.

Ramage on a rampage

Senior forward Nicky Ramage sparked a 16-10 run that brought the Wildcats back from their halftime deficit against the Lady Raiders. Ramage poured in 9 of her 13 points during a 5:51 span early in the second half, outscoring the entire Texas Tech squad during that period and helping close the gap to two points.

Ramage notched double digits in points for the 15th time in the Wildcats' 18 games before fouling out with with 4:41 remaining.

Just for the record ...

Junior guard Kim Woodlee sank one of three from behind the arc, moving into a tie for K-State's career lead in three-pointers made. The record trey came with 8:18 remaining in the game and tied the score at 40. The three-pointer also tied Woodlee with Missy Decker atop the Cats' record book with 176. On the season, Woodlee ranks twelfth nationally in three-pointers made and 19th in three-point shooting percentage.

Iron women

For the second consecutive game, Woodlee and sophomore guard Kristin Rethman were on the floor for all 40 minutes. With senior guard Jenny Coalson sidelined by injury, Woodlee and Rethman both have been pulling extra duty since the start of league play, averaging 33 and 34 minutes, respectively.

Up next for K-State

The Wildcats will look to bounce back on Saturday against the Missouri Tigers (11-4, 1-3) at 7:30 p.m., in Columbia. The game will be broadcast live on WIBW-AM 580.

Cats to face Iowa State in Bramlage

■ Men's basketball team returns to home court play after Big 12 road losses.

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the K-State Wildcats are host to the Iowa State Cyclones at 8 tonight, the Cats will have to confront Marcus Fizer, the nation's 14th-leading scorer.

Fizer, a 6-foot-8-inch junior forward, has been a thorn in the side of the Cyclones' opposition this year, averaging 21 points and 7.4 rebounds a game.

In last season's two-game series, which the Cats (8-6, 1-2) swept, Fizer scored 21 and 18 points.

K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said Fizer is the best player in the Big 12 Conference and is very different from Kansas center Eric Chenowith, who burned the Cats last week for 22 points and 17 rebounds.

"If he's not the best player in the league, I don't know who is," Fox said. "He's a man among boys in the low post. It's going to be a battle with him.

"He can drive the ball into the post, and he's more efficient in the low post than a Chenowith is. They are really two different kind of players. I really don't think we can try to stop him, you can only try to contain him."

"Obviously, we have to do a better job of contesting the three-point shot."

— Mark Fox, K-State assistant coach

Fizer isn't the only weapon for the Cyclones against K-State, which will try to even its conference record after two straight road losses.

Senior guard Michael Nurse and junior guard Jamaal Tinsley have supplied a solid 1-2 punch for Iowa State (15-2, 3-0) as well.

Nurse has paced the team, averaging 11.2 points this season and connecting on 44 percent of his three-point tries.

Fox said defending against three-pointers is something that troubled K-State in its 73-56 loss Saturday at Missouri, when the Cats gave up nine treys.

"Obviously, we have to do a better job of contesting the three-point shot," Fox said. "They generate a lot of great outside shots because of having Fizer on the inside, so we have to try to protect against the three."

Tinsley, who transferred this year to Iowa State from Mount San Jacinto Community College in California, has thrived at point guard, where he has averaged more than six assists and 9.2 points.

The Cats' road woes have continued this season, and a return home couldn't come at a better time. K-State is 7-1 at home this season.

"We need to use our home-court advantage," Fox said. "We have to take care of our home court, because everyone has trouble winning on the road in our league. That's why we have to maintain our home.

"We have great student fans here, and we need them to come out and support us. It should be a good game."

K-State's bright spots this season have been the play by guards Cortez Groves and Galen Morrison, who have averaged 15.9 and 11.2 points, respectively.

Leading the way on the post is 6-foot-8-inch junior forward Tony Kitt, who scored a season-high 21 points Saturday against Missouri. Kitt enters tonight's game averaging 12.9 points and 9.4 rebounds.

Jimmy Johnson's retirement not surprising following Dolphins' disappointing season

VIEWPOINT

RICHARD SMITH

To start off the morning, let's engage in a bit of role-playing. Play along with me here, won't you? Pretend for a moment that you're the newly appointed coach of a National Football League team — one that limped into the playoffs, winning only twice in its final nine games.

Pretend that this team escaped the first round of the postseason with a narrow victory over the only team worse than them to qualify for the playoffs.

Pretend that your team got hammered like a college student at Mardi Gras in the second round, losing by the second-largest margin in NFL playoff history, with half the damage coming from the opposition's second-string players.

Now, the payoff: Pretend that a reporter asks about your chances for a Super Bowl run next season. Which of the following is your response?

A) "Clearly, we have a lot of rebuilding to do here. This team is a ways from the top, and we're going to have to make a lot of smart moves to get it there."

B) "We've got a good solid foundation here. I like the nucleus of our team. ... We just need to add to the mix."

C) "Frankly, I'd probably have a better chance of coaching the 1939 Green Bay Packers to the NFL title next season, even given the fact that most of them are, technically speaking, dead."

If you answered B, then you will get along just fine with the philosophies of newly appointed Dolphins head coach Dave Wannstedt, who answered in kind. Just don't count on that trip to the Super Bowl any time soon.

To the untrained eye, the team wearing Miami's uniforms during Saturday's Three Stoogesesque 62-7 loss to the Jacksonville Jaguars more resembled a Division II college team than an early season Super Bowl hopeful. The Dolphins' offense committed seven turnovers, often in bizarre and creative ways.

The defense, meanwhile, appeared baffled by the absence of flags to pull on the Jaguars' uniforms, making only a nominal effort at that "tackling" thing, as Jacksonville gained nearly 8 yards a play.

Coach Jimmy Johnson's subsequent retirement hardly was surprising. After four years on the job, Miami looks no closer to the top than when he started, Wannstedt's optimism notwithstanding. That brings to mind one question for Dolphin fans: Will future Hall-of-Fame quarterback Dan Marino postpone retirement for one more shot at a Super Bowl ring?

Now that Johnson is gone, the answer looks like "yes," although that might not be a good thing. Marino's 67.4 quarterback rating this season was easily the lowest of his career, and his 5-7 record as a starter doesn't inspire much confidence, either.

At 38, Marino is well past his prime, a fact that has become more evident in his performance.

His legendary fast ball has lost much of its zip, part of the reason for a career-high in interception percentage this season, and his creaky knees have made him a sitting duck against opposing pass rushes.

Further, at a point in his career when he needs more help than ever to compete, Marino can expect little from his supporting cast. The running game Johnson desperately tried to resurrect throughout his tenure showed no improvement last season, as Miami mustered only 3.3 yards a rush. Top pick J.J. Johnson was thoroughly average, and fifth-rounder Cecil Collins broke more neighbors' windows than tackles.

The receiving corps is equally average — only Tony Martin scares opposing corners, and he's nearing the end of the line himself. The offensive line is old and overrated, and the unit likely will be retooled in the off-season.

The bottom line is this: Marino might be confident that he still can win games in the NFL, but no one else should be.

Wannstedt needs to begin retooling the offense (including giving backup quarterback Damon Huard playing time), and Marino deserves a more dignified finale than to sit on another team's bench in his final year.

Marino owns every significant NFL passing record. His legend is assured. Super Bowl ring or not, he should walk away now, before he is forced out. As Jimmy Johnson already has found, not every legend gets a happy ending.

Quick hitters:

■ Chan Gailey's firing as Dallas Cowboys head coach was as ridiculous as any in recent memory. Cowboys owner Jerry Jones is fooling himself if he expects to squeeze another Super Bowl out of overrated Troy Aikman, over-the-hill Emmitt Smith and a lackluster supporting cast. Few coaches could have done better there than Gailey did this season.

■ OK, it looks like I'm a moron for predicting an Indianapolis-Minnesota Super Bowl, but I'll see if I can make up for it. This weekend's predictions: St. Louis 35, Tampa Bay 17; Jacksonville 24, Tennessee 21.

the area, said the focus was upon the city and the school district's welfare, but not the property owners.

"It's assumed we're just not important, it seems," she said.

Connie Bleuel, also a resident of the area, said she barely heard about the meeting at all, as her job keeps her away from home for weeks at a time. She urged the commission to keep residents like her informed before the decision is made.

Commissioners approved the resolution, but not without concerns.

Commissioner Carol Peak told Dellaportas and his associates she has a passion for improving the downtown district but wants a great deal more detail in First National's plan by Feb. 15, when the City Commission will revisit the issue.

Commissioner Bruce Snead also referred to residents' concerns, saying they will be considered if the deal continues.

"We will strive to make every opportunity to represent your values and your goals and hopefully accommodate your desires," he said.

Although two have been announced, Reagan said the series is continuing to search for more lecturers, both for this semester and for the fall semester.

"We always have invitations out," Reagan said. "We currently are talking to three — one of whom is Secretary of State Madeleine Albright."

Reagan declined to name who the other two potential lecturers were.

"We don't announce anything until we have a confirmed date," Reagan said.

Seaton — who is editor and publisher of the Manhattan Mercury — said he anticipates both announced lectures, specifically journalist Woodward.

"I think all of our staff will be very interested in hearing what he has to say," Seaton said.

were excited about a smoke-free environment where they can spend their weekend evenings.

"Smoking is what always makes these places so bad," Cook said. "The no-smoking policy is a big plus."

Billiards players will like the music playing during the regularly scheduled Rock'It Bowl, Justin Nichols, junior in political science, said.

"I am used to playing in bars. The music is nice to have in the background," Nichols said.

"This will be a good thing on the weekends. It will get more K-State students in here and less high schoolers," he said.

Pure fun was the reason Josh Eberline, freshman in pre-medicine, said he enjoyed the grand opening event. He said he would like the party-like atmosphere at all times.

"I would come out to the Union to bowl more often if it was more like this," Eberline said. "It is a lot more fun this way."

While some students who attended the grand opening already had experienced the laser-light bowling concept in other venues, Courtney Keith, freshman in psychology, and Mitchell Bailey, freshman in forensic pathology, said Rock'It Bowl provided an entirely different form of entertainment.

"We have roller skating, but it isn't anything as exciting as this," Keith said. "This is a fun way to get involved."

"This brings everyone together," Mitchell said. "It is something everyone can have fun doing."

More serious bowlers and pool players found the lighting and fog to be a distraction.

"Lights may distract a more serious bowler, but with the lowered lights, no one can see how bad you are," Cook said.

Rock'It Bowl will take place from 11 p.m. to 1:30 a.m. each Friday and Saturday night. Regular admission is $8 for students and includes unlimited bowling and billiards.

Clinton resurrects initiative for long-term-care tax credit

By TERENCE HUNT
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton, resurrecting an initiative that died in Congress last year, will propose up to $3,000 in tax credits to help 2 million Americans struggling to provide long-term care for elderly or disabled relatives.

The tax credit would be triple the size of last year's failed proposal and would cost $28 billion over 10 years. It will be announced today as part of Clinton's buildup to his Jan. 27 State of the Union address. An election-minded Congress will decide whether to enact it.

The president also will propose spending $1.25 billion over 10 years for local agencies that support family caregivers with counseling, training and care techniques. The money would be awarded to state and local agencies on aging,"created by the 1965 Older Americans Act.

White House officials said they believe they have a better chance of passing the plan this year because health care has become a hot issue in the presidential campaign as the baby boom generation moves toward retirement.

Democrats and Republicans alike are talking about proposals for prescription drug coverage under Medicare, health coverage initiatives, a patients' bill of rights, drugs over the Internet, long-term care and other programs.

"There's a growing momentum and a recognition that there's a lot of unmet health care needs, and this is one of them," said Chris Jennings, White House health policy adviser.

Last year, Clinton proposed a $1,000 tax credit for long-term care needs. The measure drew bipartisan support but did not make its way through Congress as the president fought with Republicans over tax cuts and ultimately vetoed their $792 billion tax-cut plan. This year, Republicans say they will offer a far more modest package of targeted tax cuts.

Clinton, in his final budget proposal before leaving office, tripled the size of the proposed long-term care tax credit this year at the urging of senior groups and health policy advocates, Jennings said.

If enacted, the credit would be phased in beginning with $1,000 in 2001, rising in $500 increments so that eligible people would receive $3,000 in 2005.

The credit would be phased out beginning at $110,000 in income for families and $75,000 for unmarried taxpayers.

ULTIMATE BREAK

BY TARYN FORT

Local band signs with Epic Music, will re-release latest album nationally

Ultimate Fakebook's career has experienced a rebirth of sorts.

The band that previously was signed with Noisome Records has graduated to the national label circuit of the music world. Signing with Epic Music, the home of Celine Dion and Ben Folds Five, has led the band into the new millennium with much promise.

The band's second album, "This Will Be Laughing Week," will be reissued as part of the national label contract. The reissued album will offer fans a new look at two of the band's songs.

"The record is scheduled to hit stores in May of 2000, and will be featuring two newly recorded versions of 'Far, Far Away' and 'Downstairs/Arena Rock,'" Eric Melin, Ultimate Fakebook drummer, said.

Melin said even though the contract is based in New York, the group plans to keep its roots in Manhattan.

"We will remain in Manhattan as a home base and continue performing locally," Melin said. "But we will also be expanding our touring and hoping to tour with a band like Ben Folds Five."

After playing several times in New York throughout the past year, Ben Goldman of Epic Records began following the band's shows. Goldman said he made the decision to sign the group after a show at The Hurricane in Kansas City, Mo.

"I pretty much knew I wanted to sign them after the first time I ever saw them live," he said. "I had heard a couple of their songs on CD, and seeing them live blew me away."

The transition to a bigger label is positive for the group, but some changes will be made, Melin said.

"Fakebook will have the power of Sony Music, distributed worldwide," Goldman said. "They are backed by a large team in New York, as well as all over the world. They will have exposure to fans everywhere."

Although the band's members are planning to keep Manhattan as their home base, more national touring will take place, they said.

"We are leaving for a small tour of the West Coast at the end of January," Nick Colby, bass guitarist, said. "This is a good locale in the country, and we do not plan on leaving just yet."

Melin said Fakebook's tour history probably played a role in its getting the contract.

"It is because of touring that we are signed now," he said.

Colby also said the band was lucky in its hopes and choices for this record deal.

"We took this process slowly, because it is easy to get manipulated in the music business," Colby said. "We ended up receiving almost everything we wanted in the contract."

Even though the record deal is a huge accomplishment, Melin said it didn't happen overnight.

"This is pretty much the coolest thing that has happened to us, but it has taken so much to get here," Melin said. "Our dream was to quit our day jobs, and now we can."

The record contract included an opportunity to make a video. If the band's success continues to grow, the members plan on taking advantage of the opportunity.

"A video is in our contract. Whether or not we do one will depend on sales," Melin said. "We think that if it will really help a certain song, we will do one."

The band, whose music has been called love-themed power pop, will be releasing a 7-inch vinyl record containing two songs. One is from the band's first album, "Electric Kissing Parties." The other is from its second album, which is expected to be available in the next few weeks.

With the reissue of "This Will Be Laughing Week," Fakebook is calling upon its fans to help with a cover redesign.

"We are going to unfortunately have to change some of the artwork for legal reasons," Bill McShane, lead singer, said. "Mainly, just the high school pictures that we snagged from a few yearbooks. So, we were thinking, why not get new photos from our fans?"

The majority of Fakebook fans who have heard about the new record deal are excited by the news.

Gemini S. Pankey, senior in speech and assistant manager at Streetside Records, said he feels the record deal said they will shed light upon other local talent.

"I think that Ultimate Fakebook getting signed will help bring long overdue attention to Manhattan's local music scene," Pankey said. "There are great bands in Manhattan — such as Ruskabank, Egomaniacs, Time Has Come and Podstar — that are good at what they do and have major label potential."

CeCe Lopez, a fan and K-State alumna, said she enjoys the group's live performances.

"Ultimate Fakebook puts on a phenomenal show," she said. "The atmosphere that is put off and the obvious talent of this band come into play through the fans. You want to be involved in their shows."

Khakis, capri pants here to stay in spring fashion trends

BY TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plaid exotic flowers and canary yellow leather are just the beginning to another wild season of fashion.

This year's spring line ranges from beaded denim to scattered sequins placed on tank tops. Leopard, zebra and cow prints are covering everything. All clothing that can be is multipocketed and hooded. This goes for men and women.

Deborah Meyer, assistant professor of apparel, textiles and interior design, said fashion is a new explosion, from brighter pastel colors to anything that shines.

"Ethnic products from India, like small embroidered mirrors, are showing up in the spring collections," Meyer said. "Designers are staying with the techno look, but in a more mainstream and lighter way. Retro from the late '60s and early '70s is going to be influential."

Tamra Armbrister, a customer service associate at The Buckle and junior in interior design, said top name brands are keeping up with the trends.

"Hawaiian prints and anything with a shininess to it is being applied to most material," Armbrister said. "Tommy Hilfiger and Polo are coming out with much brighter-colored clothing."

Armbrister said men's fashions constitute a comeback of 1980s West Coast activewear.

"Designers such as Billabong and Hurley are back in the stores for men," she said.

Women will be able to recycle some of last season's wardrobe, replacing a few two-strap tanks with racer-back tops.

Armbrister said khaki is still popular, as well as solid or plaid three-quarter-length button-up shirts.

Pairing two different color-coordinated prints is acceptable, according to many fashion magazines. It is acceptable to go with a solid top and print bottom, or vice versa.

Meyer said leather and denim are the two biggest additions to this season. Denim, in particular, can be worn for work or play, she said. Beading and embroidery dress it up.

"The big trend toward denim is going to be more than just jeans," Meyer said. "The denim clothing will include an applied finish. Leather is still huge, but it is more lightweight and also coming in bright colors that can be paired with a tank and worn in hotter weather."

For women, capri pants are back and here to stay.

"Capris are back. The difference is that some of them are not in spandex, causing them to be tighter fitting," Sondra Geffert, co-manager at Maurice's, said. "The capris that are out are coming in denim or khaki. Some are even longer than last season, extending past the calf. Other khakis are ending just above the ankle."

For men, a mix of khaki and denim will complete the look.

"Pants are mostly still khakis and dark denim, but more detailing is apparent on some cargo pants, and they are being made in lighter material," Armbrister said. "The difference between male and female is that the female jeans and pants have a flared leg. Male clothing is tending to stay away from the flared leg."

Meyer said fashion no longer is dominated by the designers of New York and Paris.

"In the past, designers told the industry what to do," she said. "Now, the consumers are telling the industry what to do. Designers are now looking to consumers on how to run the business. Hence, a mass market has evolved. More designers are coming up with economically affordable lines, such as a ready-to-wear line. Consumer behavior has become the key throughout the country."

Democrats oppose budget cuts agreed upon by House, Senate

BY JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — House and Senate negotiators reached agreement easily Tuesday on a bill making cuts in the current state budget, but Democrats won't sign off on the deal.

The Democratic opposition isn't expected to prevent passage of the bill because Republicans hold majorities in the Senate and in the House.

The bill decreases state general fund spending in the current budget by $65.2 million, or 1.5 percent, from the amount approved last year. The general fund is the largest source of money for Kansas government programs and where the state deposits most of its tax revenues.

Democrats' refusal to sign off on the deal probably will delay a final vote in both chambers by a day. Republican leaders had hoped it would go to Gov. Bill Graves today but changed that prediction after negotiators met.

The House will consider the final version of the bill first. Because it meets in the morning and the Senate meets in the afternoon, both chambers could take the bill up on the same day.

"We ought to be able to do it Thursday," House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, said.

Legislative leaders appointed a conference committee of three senators and three House members to draft the final version of the budget bill, two Republicans and one Democrat from each chamber.

The differences between the House and Senate were relatively small. The final version of the bill makes dozens of changes in the budget for fiscal year 2000, which ends June 30.

The final version will contain most of Graves' proposed changes in the current budget, though the governor proposed cutting slightly more general fund spending, $67.4 million.

Both chambers rejected Graves' proposal to reduce the current budgets of public schools by $13 per pupil, preventing a cut of about $8 million.

Both houses also stripped out $1.5 million Graves had added to the current budget to finance the state's April 4 presidential primary election, and added language to cancel this year's primary.

Missile-interceptor system test fails to hit target

BY ROBERT BURNS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In an apparent setback on the Pentagon's drive to develop a national missile defense, a prototype missile interceptor streaked into space Tuesday night in search of a mock warhead launched from an Air Force base in California but failed to hit the target, a Pentagon official said.

"An intercept was not achieved for reasons unknown at this time," spokesman Air Force Lt. Col. Rick Lehner said.

The mock warhead was meant to simulate a nuclear attack on the United States, and a successful intercept would have provided a dramatic boost to the Pentagon's effort to show missile defense can work.

The interceptor rocket was launched from a U.S. Army missile range on Kwajalein Atoll in the Marshall Islands, about 20 minutes after the target missile lifted off from Vandenberg Air Force Base at 8:19 p.m. CST and headed over the Pacific Ocean.

Lehner said Pentagon officials would conduct an extensive review of the test data to determine why the interceptor missed the target. He said the first preliminary report would not be available for at least 48 hours.

The interceptor launch went off as planned, Lehner said. "What happened after it got into space we do not know," he said.

Pentagon officials had asserted before the test that even if the interceptor failed to hit its target, there were other important goals for the test, including the first test of a computerized battle management system that is designed to communicate with the interceptor as it soars into space.

Lehner said there was no immediate word on whether these other aspects of the test worked as planned.

In remarks to reporters several hours before the test, Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said that if the interceptor, called a "kill vehicle," succeeded in hitting the target warhead — and if all of the radar, communications and other technical aspects of the test worked correctly — then the Pentagon would have met its self-defined minimum standard for recommending that the system is feasible to deploy.

An initial test last October resulted in a successful intercept.

"I think we just have to wait until all the results are in and see how they mesh together before we can say it's a successful integrated systems test," Bacon told reporters before the scheduled start of the test.

More than a dozen protesters had a vigil outside Vandenberg Air Force Base on Tuesday to protest the test.

"We were all holding up signs protesting this wrongheaded thing our government is doing," said Bud Boothe, a member of the Global Network Against Weapons and Nuclear Power in Space.

Nuclear powers Russia and China are the most vocal opponents of a proposed U.S. national missile defense, but it is North Korea — economically destitute, politically isolated and militarily hostile — that Clinton administration officials said poses the most immediate missile threat.

Thus the initial version of a national missile defense, as envisioned by Pentagon planners, would be designed mainly to counter a small-scale attack from North Korea. More robust defenses might be added later to shield American territory from missile attacks by other so-called rogue nations, like Iraq or Iran.

President Clinton might decide as early as this summer whether to go ahead with a national missile defense, which the Pentagon estimates will cost at least $12.7 billion over the next five years. It could be ready for use by 2005, although many officials involved in the program believe that might be too ambitious.

Russia is concerned that a U.S. missile defense system would undermine the deterrent value of its nuclear missile arsenal, as is China.

John Hamre, the deputy U.S. defense secretary, said Tuesday that Russia and China need not worry about the U.S. system, which would be designed to counter limited missile attacks from countries like North Korea.

Iraq weapons inspector not named

BY NICOLE WINFIELD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council failed to reach an agreement Tuesday on naming a new U.N. chief weapons inspector for Iraq, with Russia, China and France objecting to the secretary-general's candidate, Rolf Ekeus, and requesting further meetings.

The council president, U.S. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke, said ambassadors and foreign ministers would continue to discuss the matter among themselves until agreement is found. He said it could be several days, if not weeks, before an agreement is reached. No deadline was set and no new date scheduled for talks.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Monday that Ekeus was best suited for the job. In response, ambassadors from Russia, France and China sent Holbrooke letters saying they couldn't accept the appointment and requested new candidates.

Ekeus headed the United Nations first inspection agency for Iraq, the U.N. Special Commission, which was created in 1991 in the aftermath of the Gulf War to rid Iraq of mass destruction weapons.

The Russian and French ambassadors said Tuesday it was Ekeus' association with the old commission, tainted by allegations of spying on behalf of the United States, that made him unfit to lead the new agency. The U.N. Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission was created in December to replace the Special Commission.

U.N. Special Commission inspectors pulled out of Iraq in December 1998, ahead of U.S. and British airstrikes, and Baghdad has said they may not return.

"Ambassador Ekeus' candidature — though we respect him highly as a diplomat and very able personality — does not correspond to the criteria of having a new mechanism and ensuring the cooperation on the part of Iraq," said Russian Ambassador Sergey Lavrov.

Holbrooke said Ekeus remained a candidate for the post but that other names might be put forward. He said all ambassadors agreed that Annan had done his part in choosing a candidate and that the matter now rested squarely with the council to make a decision.

Seaton Hall University students killed in early morning residence hall fire

By AMY WESTFELDT
The Associated Press

SOUTH ORANGE, N.J. — Fire broke out at a university residence hall early Wednesday as hundreds slept, killing three people, injuring 62 and sending terrified students crawling in pajamas through smoke into the freezing cold.

Six Seton Hall University students were burned critically. One of them suffered third-degree burns over most of his body.

Many of the 640 residents of Boland Hall went back to sleep when they first heard the alarm about 4:30 a.m., thinking it was another in a string of 18 false alarms set off in the six-floor building since September.

Many soon heard screams for help and smelled the smoke.

"I opened the door just to check," Yatin Patel said. "All the ceiling tiles were coming down. I saw a ceiling tile fall on someone."

"It was panic. Everybody was just, 'Go! Go! Go!'" Nicole McFarlane, 19, said. She was treated for exposure because she left her room in only a short nightgown, a jacket and hiking boots.

The cause of the fire was under investigation.

The tragedy cast a pall of grief over the campus of the Roman Catholic school 15 miles southwest of New York City. Classes for the 10,000 students were canceled for the week. A memorial service was planned for later Wednesday. Sports events also were postponed through today.

"There's not much you can say at this time," said Newark Archbishop Theodore McCarrick, who came to offer support. "We're glad we're people of faith. The mystery of God's work is always a great mystery."

Patel, who lives on the third floor down the hall from the lounge where the blaze broke out, said he put a wet towel under his door, kicked out his window screens and threw his mattresses on the ground in case he had to jump.

At least two students did jump, witnesses said. Tim Van Wie, 18, of Flanders, said a friend jumped from the third floor and suffered a broken wrist and sprained ankle. Others tied sheets together to climb down from the windows, but firefighters arrived and rescued them by ladder.

Keara Sauber, 18, saw one fellow student shivering in a T-shirt and boxers, his skin completely blackened by burns. "His skin was, like, smoking," she said.

Two of the three male students killed were found in the lounge and the other was found in a bedroom nearby.

The victims, all 18, were identified by the Essex County medical examiner's office as Frank S. Caltabilota, John N. Giunta and Aaron C. Karol. The office did not release their hometowns, but friends and relatives said all were from New Jersey.

Two firefighters and two police officers were among those hurt. The injuries ranged from exposure and smoke inhalation to burns.

The blaze largely was confined to the lounge. Students said they frequently saw people smoking in the lounge, even though it is prohibited in lounges and hallways.

Essex County Prosecutor Donald C. Campolo said he did not have any information about whether the fire was suspicious. He would not comment on whether careless smoking might have caused the blaze. The Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms was assisting in the investigation.

"It will be a painstaking investigation," he said.

Fund-raising efforts continue for T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter's expansion, renovation

Bids for the construction and expansion of the animal shelter were given Wednesday to Dan Hall, engineer for BG Consultants.

Hall said the bid will be in the amount of $585,700, which will be used to contract Sunflower Builders. This recommendation will be sent to the City Commission in February for final approval. In addition, a private fundraising group has raised almost $50,000 and hopes to reach $100,000 by the end of January. Commissioner Karen McCulloh is leading the group, which hopes to raise additional money for an isolation ward, a night drop and a visiting room.

McCulloh said the estimate for the construction was around $720,000, which does not include other details and is more expensive than the amount Hall received in bids. The total expansion, including construction, will cost around $800,000, which will be paid for with bonds. Hall said he expects the construction to be finished by fall, weather permitting.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said City Commission will evaluate the $585,700 bid based on specific items and considerations the contractor will offer. He said the bids will have to be less than the estimate of $800,000, or they'll have to negotiate some cuts.

"We have the architectural estimate from the company. We have to see what the bids are," Snead said. "We want the lowest bid possible. That's what we desire."

The original shelter measures 2,220 square feet and was built in the 1980s.

"At that point in time, it took care of the needs of the community," said Terry DeWeese, director of the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation. "It's something that evolved over a period of time and got to a point where it began to grow."

But some said that even back then, the shelter was too small to accommodate animals, which led to an increase in animal euthanization.

"The facility was really too small to begin with," said Chuck Murphy, Riley County-Manhattan Health Department administrator. "The size of the facility does impact the euthanasia rate simply because you're less able to offer animals for adoption. The selection of animals is much smaller."

The new shelter, which will be built around the old one, will measure 4,494 square feet. The Riley County-Manhattan Health Department no longer will have control of this shelter starting March 1, Diane Stoddard, acting assistant city manager, said.

"The main issue is that the city itself is a recipient of services that the animal shelter provides, and the health department really isn't,"

Texas high school alters school logo to avoid litigation

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

A Texas high school will be changing its logo after K-State alleged the logo too closely resembled the Powercat.

"We are disappointed. We loved our logo," said Norman Reuther, principal of Flower Mound High School.

Flower Mound is a part of the Lewisville Independent School District, located north of the Dallas-Fort Worth area.

The Powercat is registered federally.

"If we don't show effort to protect it , we'll lose it," said John Fairman, assistant vice president for university relations and director of licensing.

Flower Mound had three options: enter in a licensing agreement with K-State, change the logo or be subject to legal action.

"We're not in a position to become involved in a protracted court case over this," Reuther said.

Thirty-one schools in 14 states, including five in Texas, have licensing agreements with K-State.

The schools are asked to enter into a $1 licensing contract for two years, which would allow the schools to put the logo on their stationary, fields or uniforms.

Stolen cars recovered in vehicle-theft bust

By ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Five of six stolen cars were recovered Wednesday after what a Riley County Police Department official is calling a confusing series of events.

Sgt. Hank Nelson of the RCPD said that around 3 a.m. Wednesday the police got a call about a vehicle burglary going on. The suspects, described as three white males in dark clothing, left the scene before police arrived.

Nelson said a witness gave a description of the car, and at about 5 a.m., a patrol officer saw a vehicle matching the description.

Police chased the car but lost sight of it and found it a little later, Sgt. Tim Hegarty of the RCPD said.

The car had been ditched by the suspects, he said. The police later found out the car was stolen.

The police then were led to another car that turned out to be stolen. The police recovered a total of four more stolen cars that way.

"What drew the officers to those stolen cars, I don't know," Nelson said.

Hegarty said the stolen vehicles probably were related to the vehicle burglary and the first stolen car.

"Their tactic was to flee and to find another car to steal," he said.

Five of the cars were stolen from Manhattan, and one car was stolen from Topeka and driven to Manhattan, Hegarty said.

There were about a dozen other vehicle burglaries reported throughout Wednesday that Hegarty said probably are related to the suspects of the stolen vehicles.

"More vehicle burglaries will be reported as people discover them," he said.

No arrests have been made, and the case is under investigation.

Athletic department's Ahearn Scholarship Fund sets record for monies raised

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

The Ahearn Scholarship Fund set a record in the past fiscal year for monies raised, exceeding the previous year's collection by more than $600,000.

"We raised a little over $3 million, as far as cash, for the Ahearn Scholarship Fund," said Michael O'Brien, associate director of Athletics for Development. "Total, with gift-in-kinds, securities and those types of things, we were at $3.5 million."

Gifts-in-kind include contributions of products, services, equipment or merchandise that can be credited toward an Ahearn Scholarship Fund membership based on fair market value.

Ernie Barrett, director of special projects, deals strictly with capital improvements and gifts-in-kind, Lon Floyd, development officer for K-State, said.

"Ernie knows a lot of people that can donate to put a whole project together," Floyd said.

"Things like the indoor workout facility, I think that was totally private donations."

Barrett, in Kansas City, Mo., on business, was unavailable for comment.

With scholarship and operational costs on the constant upswing, O'Brien said, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has become increasingly dependent on gift income to maintain the athletics program at its optimum level.

"We're always trying to generate new individuals to join the Ahearn Scholarship Fund," O'Brien said. "And at the same time, we solicit people that are current owners to possibly increase their gift.

"You can never raise enough money. Last year was a record, and we're going to try to increase that from the previous year."

The scholarship fund provides scholarship support to more than 250 men and women student-athletes, many of whom receive a full scholarship, which includes tuition, fees, books, housing and meals.

Student-athletes of all 15 intercollegiate sports at K-State receive scholarship funding from the scholarship fund, O'Brien said.

There are a variety of methods of giving to the fund. K-State receives monies from direct contributions, bank drafts, electronic fund transfers and credit cards.

Some people choose to endow a scholarship, which may be designated to a particular sport, to be awarded annually by the athletics department.

Other donors decide to give gifts by will, in which a donor can perpetuate support to the athletics department by making a bequest to the department in a final will.

Several companies want to participate in the fund's matching gifts program, in which the corporation receives credit in the scholarship fund for its total contribution by doubling or even tripling the gift's effect.

Steve Mammola, in his second year as assistant director of development and corporate relations, handles the corporate sponsorships and corporate relations.

During football games, corporations can contribute money to the scholarship fund by sponsoring the team in three specific categories: touchdowns, interceptions and sacks.

In turn, the company will donate monies in accordance with the football team's statistics in those three particular facets of the game.

Mother admits suffocating son by putting child in sack

TAMPA, Fla. — A young mother accused of killing her baby by putting him in a plastic bag to stop his crying pleaded guilty Wednesday in exchange for a 30-year prison sentence.

In an arrangement with prosecutors, 22-year-old Crista Decker pleaded guilty to second-degree murder.

Decker had been charged with first-degree murder in the Aug. 27 death of her 6-month-old son, Gabriel Ellis Decker. She initially told authorities that Gabriel vanished from her minivan in a shopping center parking lot as she looked for a shopping cart.

Detectives became suspicious, and Decker later confessed that she put the baby in a plastic bag to quiet him, then tossed the bag, with the baby inside, into a trash bin.

Lawmaker charged by police in fatal hit-and-run accident

HARRISBURG, Pa. — A state lawmaker was charged Wednesday with vehicular homicide in a hit-and-run accident that killed a pedestrian last summer.

Rep. Thomas Druce, 38, said he left the scene of the July 27 crash after thinking he struck a stop sign. Kenneth Cains, 42, was killed.

Druce said he did not stop but drove to the Capitol nearby to check his vehicle for damage. He said he did not know anyone had been killed until he was notified recently by police.

Police, however, said the legislator's explanation was inconsistent with what appeared to be blood, skin and hair found on the Jeep Grand Cherokee he was driving.

The investigation had stalled until police received an anonymous tip recently about the leased Jeep and Druce's whereabouts on the day of the accident.

A witness said the vehicle was speeding and that the driver turned a corner and left the scene after the crash.

On Tuesday, Druce, a Republican from Warminster, just outside Philadelphia, said he would take responsibility for the accident.

"This is a very tragic accident," Druce told The Intelligencer Record of Doylestown. "There was nothing malicious on my part. I was the driver of the vehicle. I must take responsibility, and I intend to do that."

The Jeep Grand Cherokee was repaired after the accident for $3,000 and then was returned to the dealership where Druce had leased it. He said he started a new lease Aug. 3 to avoid charges for high mileage.

Comedy Central adds Dole to its coverage of elections

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Since losing the 1996 presidential race, Bob Dole has used his humor to pitch Dunkin' Donuts, Visa check cards and even a book of jokes. Finally, the cable network Comedy Central noticed.

Dole, the former Kansas GOP senator, will provide analysis of the lighter side of the 2000 presidential campaigns for the network's "InDecision 2000."

"After all the campaigning I've been through, it's nice to be on the other side for once," Dole quipped in a news release.

Dole will offer commentary from the Republican National Convention next summer and at other points in the campaign. Network executives approached him with the idea.

Dole spokesman Doug MacKinnon said the former majority leader should make his debut in February.

American Ethnic Studies program director receives award for promoting diversity

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Juanita McGowan, recipient of the Commerce Bank Presidential Award for Distinguished Services to Minority Education, attributed her service spirit to her mother during an award reception Wednesday night.

"I'm just trying to do the work that I've been taught," McGowan said. "I just try to give and give because my mom told me that if I give, I will be blessed.

"When you are blessed, you become a blessing, and that is my intent—to be a blessing to K-State University and to this community."

Several criteria are used to determine the recipient of this award. The person must be an outstanding teacher in minority courses or in a discipline where material pertinent to minorities has been integrated successfully.

The person also must continue to develop an educational program for minority students or for the campus environment that contributes to the well-being of minority students.

"I realized years ago that my mission in life is to promote diversity," McGowan said.

McGowan has been involved with enhancing diversity on K-State's campus for 18 years and has worked within the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Education and Human Ecology.

"She has consistently promoted campus diversity through her teaching, developing multicultural student leadership, mentoring service, program planning and in her current contribution to multicultural curriculum in the school," said Kathy Greene, director of educational support services.

Juanita McGowan received the Commerce Bank Presidential Award for Distinguished Services to Minority Education on Wednesday evening in the K-State Student Union. McGowan is the program director and faculty member of the American Ethnic Studies program at K-State. KELLY GLASSCOCK/ COLLEGIAN

McGowan was presented with a plaque and $1,000.

"It is a very appropriate occasion that we provide this award during this week when we honor Dr. Martin Luther King," Ted Haggart, president of Commerce Bank, said. "This is a true honor."

McGowan said she hopes that people reaffirm their commitment to King's dream during this week of remembrance.

"As we celebrate Martin Luther King Jr. Week, in the nation and on this campus, I hope that each one of us have had an opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to equity and justice," McGowan said.

Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost of diversity and dual career development, said McGowan exemplified the meaning of the contribution and service award by not only talking the talk, but walking the walk.

"She walked the walk in terms of her everyday life," Taylor-Archer said.

She said McGowan responded to calls of action that really would make a change at K-State.

"I can't think of a more deserving person to receive this award at this particular time," Taylor-Archer said.

McGowan said her service and advocacy would not stop at this award.

"Until I take my last breath, I will be an advocate for diversity," McGowan said.

MCC to break ground for Heritage Court, monolith

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Christian College plans to break ground in less than two weeks on its new courtyard for what once was a controversial centerpiece at City Hall.

The courtyard, known as Heritage Court, will serve as the new home for the Ten Commandments monolith removed from City Hall last May.

Jolene Rupe, director of public relations for MCC, said the project's ground breaking is scheduled for 9:30 a.m. Feb. 4.

Rupe said the agreement was made with the monolith's owners, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, Aerie and Auxiliary No. 2468, last spring, shortly after the City Commission voted to remove it.

Elburn Parker, who now sits on the board of trustees, was president of the Eagles when the monolith was removed. Parker said the Eagles chose MCC's offer to take the monolith over the offers of several churches so more than one denomination could view it.

"At first, we were going to take it down to the lodge, but then it would be just for ourselves," he said. "We thought everybody could share it at Manhattan Christian College."

The agreement is for a permanent loan, Parker said. MCC does not own the monolith, but agreed to insure it against damage and is allowed to display it as long as it remains in Manhattan.

"I don't ever see the college leaving, but if it goes to Salina or something, we wanted to keep it in Manhattan," Parker said.

The layout of Heritage Court, revived from a MCC campus plan years ago, has the monolith surrounded by a brick walkway, benches, planters, four flagpoles and stone gates as a new entryway onto the campus, Rupe said. The courtyard will be between Jolliffe Hall and J. Donald Coffin Memorial Hall on the campus. The monolith will be one of the find parts added and will face Anderson Avenue, she said.

"It will be a place of meditation almost," Rupe said.

Of the nearly 600 walkway bricks reserved for donors' names, almost 200 have been spoken for, she said. Donations from almost 300 different groups and individuals already have met the estimated $50,000 budget and then some, Rupe said. The extra amount, somewhere between $6,000 and $10,000, probably will be put toward upcoming plans to renovate Jolliffe Hall, she said.

Charles Hall, project manager for Heritage Court, said he expects the entire construction to take about two months. He said the biggest concern would be freezing weather, given the large amount of stone work on the project.

"If you freeze concrete, it never sets as concrete," he said. "It would be crumbly."

Hall, who taught at K-State's College of Architecture from 1964 to 1978 and has worked as a freelance contractor since, said this job is different because of the large number of volunteers. Almost all of the materials and labor either have been donated for free or at minimum cost, he said.

"I think people really responded to make this project come alive," he said.

Rupe said she hopes conflicts over the monolith's removal last summer will be put to rest with the new location.

"We just hope all sides will support it," she said.

K-State develops new recruitment strategies to attract more minority students

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student recruitment and enrollment have been taking an interest in minorities.

Aaron Austin, admissions representative and coordinator of Multiracial Student Recruitment, said programs have been developed to attract minorities and students of ethnic backgrounds to K-State.

"We are always thinking of new ways to invite multiracial groups to campus and to attract minority groups," Austin said.

Austin said some of the ways recruiters are trying to attract minorities include taking aspects of the campus to students.

"One program that we are developing is called K-State To You," Austin said. "We take student ambassadors from K-State to Kansas City to try and answer questions and attract students of color."

An outreach recruiter also is working in Kansas City, Kan., in order to interest minority students in K-State, Austin said.

"With the outreach coordinator in Kansas City, we are able to have more programs to get the interest in K-State going," Austin said.

Enrollment statistics for fall 1999 showed that 2,574 students out of 21,543 were of ethnic background.

Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost of diversity and dual career development, said diversity is what makes a university great.

"Diversity is very important to a university," Taylor-Archer said. "Diversity is the key to excellence."

The minority groups that now attend K-State on the Manhattan and Salina campuses include black, Hispanic-American, Asian-American, American Indian, multiracial and international students.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said K-State always is looking for ways to continue to recruit students of all races to K-State.

"We have a tremendous interest in the recruitment of minorities, but we are concerned with the retention of students as well as the recruitment," Bosco said.

Dwain Archer, adviser to the Black Student Union, said one reason students of color might not be as numerous is because they do not feel a sense of community.

"First- and second-year students seem to have some trouble staying in school sometimes, and it may be because there are not enough people of color, students and faculty alike, to provide a sense of community," Archer said.

Austin said the reason the K-State campus is not as diverse as it could be is because many students of color and ethnic students are not familiar with K-State.

"K-State seems to be so far away from some of the bigger cities in Kansas, such as Kansas City and Wichita, whereas KU and community colleges such as Newman and Friends are closer to those big cities," Austin said. "We want minority students to realize what K-State has to offer them as well."

Taylor-Archer said diversity and the minority groups on campus are important because of the talents and enrichment they bring to a college campus.

"It would be an incredible shortcoming if students were not able to interact with students from other ethnic groups," Taylor-Archer said.

Clarification needed for school closing on Christian holiday

The Supreme Court of the United States needs to quit sending mixed messages.

In a decision handed down Tuesday, the court allowed Maryland to require public schools to close for Good Friday.

However, more than a dozen states now have Good Friday laws, and their futures remain very much in question.

The reason behind the Maryland law is to avoid anticipated high absenteeism among teachers and students on the days surrounding Easter, the holiest of Christian holidays. Good Friday — always two days before Easter — commemorates the crucifixion of Jesus Christ.

However, this sends a message to non-Christians that the state finds Good Friday — and thus Christianity — to be a religion worth honoring, while other religions are not of equal importance.

By allowing the Maryland law without comment, the court permits such feelings to develop. Instead, the court should have released its decision with comments and explained some of the logic behind its decision.

It seems the reasoning behind the law is legitimate — absenteeism greatly would be increased on a day of such importance to so many people. However, not everyone is Christian, and that should be recognized.

States should make clear the logic behind such laws. They also should make it permissible for individual school districts to make laws to reflect specific communities.

For example, if the majority of a community's population is Jewish, school should not be in session on significant Jewish holidays.

When this happens, allowing a Christian holiday off will not be viewed as a violation of the separation of church and state.

But until states begin to clarify, and the Supreme Court enforces equality in treatment of religion, Americans will continue to receive a mixed message that leaves many confused and upset.

Republican Racism

Tendencies toward bigotry by elite members of GOP leads to destruction of racial harmony

If one wants to see racism in America, one does not have to look any further than the Republican Party.

This is not to say everyone in the GOP has a proclivity towards bigotry, nor is the party as a whole inherently racist. Most Republicans are upstanding (if not misguided). Yet among the Republican elite are a few with strong racist tendencies or who pander strongly toward the racist elements within our society.

Any such a list must start with Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C. Helms got his start in the early 1950s, when he was hired by a North Carolina TV station manager and given the assignment to "answer David Brinkley's lies."

Brinkley was one of the first reporters to cover the civil rights movement. This particular TV station manager didn't much care for Brinkley's unbiased style of reporting. In response to the nightly news, Helms would explain to the audience that Brinkley was a "turncoat Southerner turned northern radical," and that he was "incapable or unwilling to tell the truth about racial problems in the South, most of the trouble caused by outside agitators like (Brinkley)."

More recently, in 1993 Helms became infuriated with Sen. Carol Moseley-Braun, D-Ill., the first black woman senator, when she successfully led an effort to reject a Helms proposal that would have renewed the design patent for the insignia of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, a design which features a wreath encasing the Confederate flag (which, by the way, is a racist symbol).

As reported by The Washington Post, Moseley-Braun later found herself in a Senate elevator with Helms and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, whereupon Helms started to sing "Dixie" and turned to Hatch and said, "I'm going to sing 'Dixie' to her until she cries."

This grudge that Helms held towards Moseley-Braun culminated this past October when Helms, as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, tried to hold up Moseley-Braun's nomination to the ambassadorship to New Zealand. Officially, the nomination was held up due to never-proven ethical questions about her personal and campaign finances and about a meeting she held with a Nigerian dictator.

However, when questioned about the nomination by a reporter from Roll Call, Helms' motivation became clear. "At the very minimum," Helms answered, "she has got to apologize for the display that she provoked over a little symbol for a wonderful group of little old ladies," and then suggested that Moseley-Braun "better look for another line of work."

Another prominent Republican who isn't helping the cause for racial harmony is Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss. As described in a column I wrote last year, Lott — along with Rep. Robert Barr, R-Ga. — both had a longtime association with a racist organization, the Council of Conservative Citizens. When this association hit the press late in 1998, Lott said he had no idea that the CCC was a racist organization in spite of the fact that he had been sent organizational newsletters which espoused anti-black and anti-Semitic ideas, and that his favorite uncle, former Mississippi state Senator Arnie Watson, was currently on the CCC's executive board.

Considering the prominence of the CCC in Mississippi, a spokesman for the CCC said it would be impossible for Lott not to know what the CCC was all about. This is true, especially considering all the CCC rallies Lott attended that involved the displaying of Confederate flags. Then again, Lott, as an admirer of the Confederacy, often runs around on his own flying the Confederate flag.

Lott did denounce racism, but never specifically denounced the CCC.

Soon after this incident, Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., and Rep. James Clyburn D-S.C., sponsored a resolution condemning "the racism and bigotry espoused by the Council of Conservative Citizens." This resolution was replaced by the Republicans with a more watered-down resolution that removed the CCC by name. The Democrats, along with a few Republicans, felt the replacement resolution stated the obvious: Of course Congress condemns racism in general. Needless to say, the replacement resolution was voted down.

Then there's Louisiana's Gov. Mike Foster who, The Washington Post reported, secretly paid unabashed racist David Duke $150,000 for his voter list of white supremacists. When asked to denounce Duke, he got angry and hedged. "I'm sick of all that," Foster said. "You renounce him if you want."

And then there's presidential candidate Gov. George W. Bush. Although I believe that Jesus has warmed his heart and thus made Bush anything but a racist, he sure does a lot of pandering toward the racist element within his party.

Bush has become almost legendary for his dodging of questions dealing with the flying of the Confederate flag over South Carolina's Statehouse. Although he says he'll never fly the Stars and Bars over the Texas Statehouse, he refuses to state an opinion about whether the flag should fly in South Carolina. Bush repetitively says it's a matter for South Carolinians to decide. At a debate in Columbia, S.C., on Jan. 7, Bush refused to answer whether the Confederate flag offends him.

When, on Jan. 8, South Carolina State Senator Arthur Ravenel (R) referred to the NAACP as "that organization known as the National Association for Retarded People," then later apologized for grouping them in with the NAACP, Bush did say these comments were "unfortunate." But when asked if Ravenel should apologize, Bush had no opinion. "That's going to be up to the senator," Bush said.

Bush does break character in having no opinion about matters outside that of running the federal government. On the NAACP's boycott of South Carolina so long as the Statehouse flies the Confederate flag, Bush said outsiders should "butt out."

Bush, with his lead in the polls nationally at 61 percent, has the luxury to take a stand on some of these issues of race.

If this presidential election is going to be based on character, then having a spine is an important characteristic to have.

The importance of Martin Luther King Jr. Day is not so much to remind us of the great accomplishments of this man, but to remind us that we must ever stand vigilant against racism and bigotry. To remain silent in the face of hatred is to show passive agreement, or worse, indifference.

On the positive side: On Jan. 12, Virginia's Gov. James Gilmore III (R) called to separate Martin Luther King Jr. Day from Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson Day, which are currently held all on the same day.

Students, faculty encouraged to support monument for WWII veterans

"O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells;
Rise up — for you the flag is flung —for you the bugle trills,
For you bouquets and ribboned wreaths — for you the shores accrowding,
For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning;
Here Captain! dear father!
This arm beneath your head!
It is some dream that on the deck
You've fallen cold and dead."
—Walt Whitman
excerpt from "O Captain! My Captain!"

This week our eyes have focused on a man who helped to bring tolerance and equality to America.

Before we lose sight of such noble deeds, I ask us to refocus, not to detract from the greatness of Martin Luther King Jr., but to illuminate others who are deserving of such glory and gratitude.

One man was named Wilford J. Huebner.

He grew up in Wisconsin, the son of a farmer. Like many students at K-State, he rose early and worked late to help his family survive on the farm.

For the most part, his youth was completely normal.

At 19, he enlisted in the Navy.

His motives were idealistic.

The first stemmed from the Dec. 7, 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor. The attack caught the U.S. fleet moored in the harbor completely by surprise. The attack also propelled the United States into World War II.

His second motive came from a desire to not lose touch with his best friend, who believed the war was a noble effort and joined right away.

Huebner was assigned to a minesweeper in the Pacific theater. His ship's orders were to cover treacherous waters ,searching for and dismantling unexploded mines.

He and thousands of other Americans performed their civic duty and fought for freedom against moral depravity in World War II, both home and abroad.

As veterans of World War II, Huebner and his peers are deserving of our honor, yet they are subject to disservice and injustice.

There is no World War II memorial honoring their valor and courage that transcended that tumultuous time.

Our nation is running out of time to exhibit our appreciation to those veterans still alive.

The effort to construct a memorial has been persistent, but there still is much to be done.

The legislation to authorize the building of a memorial was passed by Congress in 1993.

Responsibility for design and construction was then given to the American Battle Monument Commission.

The memorial will be located on the National Mall between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument.

The site was dedicated by President Clinton on Veterans Day, in 1995.

The monument's design was inspired by the spirit, sacrifice and commitment made by the American people during World War II.

It will stand as a monument to the unity that enveloped the United States during this time.

The memorial is estimated to cost $100 million dollars to design, build and maintain.

It mostly is funded by the private sector through individual donations.

At this stage, it is the lack of money that is preventing progress.

I encourage individual students, the Student Governing Association, the faculty and staff and the administration to consider donating funds to support such a worthy cause.

My grandfather, Wilford J. Huebner, and the rest of the nation who joined together to fight for freedom deserve our honor.

It is the least we can do.

More information about the World War II memorial can be found at www.wwiimemorial.com.

Deadline for scholarship drawing near

BY GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students no longer will be able to apply for scholarships for the fall and spring of next year after Feb. 1, said Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance.

"Students can apply anytime, but we won't look at any of the applications after Feb. 1 because we will have enough students to take care of all the openings," Moeder said.

Moeder estimates there are 4,000 scholarships among the different academic colleges. The scholarships have stipulations that vary by college and department.

"Each college carries certain eligibility requirements. The students that meet the academic requirements will be considered for the scholarship," Moeder said. "Students need to remember that some performing arts scholarships have a separate process because they require a portfolio or an audition."

ON THE WEB
To fill out an application, go to www.ksu.edu/sfa/.

Students interested in music or art scholarships need to talk with their instructors in order to find out more about the requirements, Paul Hunt, professor of music, said.

"Music scholarships require students to perform on tape or in person," Hunt said. "The scholarships are mostly talent-based, so decisions are made straight from the audition."

Hunt said even though the music department does not follow the Feb. 1 deadline, students need to make plans for an audition soon.

"Students need to think about auditions since they are coming up this spring," Hunt said. "The middle of March is when we like to have heard everyone so we can make a decision."

Students intending to apply for a journalism scholarship need to be aware of supporting materials that must accompany the application.

The supporting material is not actually required, but Doug Daniel, chair of the scholarship committee for journalism and mass communications, said it is recommended to students.

"There is more to scholarships than grade standing," Daniel said. "We want to encourage students to show us the breadth of what they have learned. The extras help to show what students have learned in class and in extracurricular activities that support studies."

Moeder said 99 percent of the scholarships available are based on merit, and students are encouraged to apply regardless of their financial background.

"Students can apply in the financial aid office, but the easiest way is to apply online," Moeder said. "They can go straight to the Web and fill out the application. It is the best way for returning students."

Supreme Court faces Colorado abortion issue

BY LAURIE ASSEO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Supreme Court justices appeared divided Wednesday on whether limits on sidewalk counseling by anti-abortion protesters violate their free-speech rights in the name of protecting patients' privacy.

Several justices expressed doubts that a Colorado law squelches protesters' speech by requiring them to stay 8 feet away from people entering health-care clinics unless the person consents.

"You certainly can convey anything you want to convey orally from a distance of 8 feet," Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said. "This isn't some unusual provision."

But some justices were troubled that the law could apply broadly to any such activity outside a building, even when a medical office is only one of many offices in a large building.

"You're curtailing a lot of other activity that may not be relevant to the health-care facility," Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist said.

Justice Antonin Scalia asked, "In the public forum outside in the street, can we have a law that enables people to turn off unwelcome speech?"

The justices are expected to rule by July on the Colorado law, which affects protests within 100 feet of clinic entrances. The law, upheld last year by the Colorado Supreme Court, bars people from approaching within 8 feet of anyone — without their consent — to protest, counsel or hand them a leaflet.

"There is a problem at health-care facilities, a problem of intimidation and violence," said Justice Department lawyer Barbara D. Underwood, arguing in Colorado's support.

Colorado's lawyer, Michael E. McLachlan, contended the law was written neutrally because it takes no side on the debate. He said there had been no prosecutions under the law thus far.

Attorney Jay A. Sekulow, representing three protesters who challenged the law, said it makes the peaceful distribution of a leaflet or the display of a sign a crime if prior consent is not obtained.

Such limits violate the Constitution's First Amendment free-speech guarantee, Sekulow said, arguing that protesters can be barred only from blocking or impeding access to abortion clinics.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer suggested the law may aid free speech because it "makes clear what you can do and what you can't do" instead of having to go to court to decide whether someone's actions counted as harassment.

Scalia and Rehnquist asked whether such a law could be applied to labor union picketing. Underwood said it could only if there were similar findings that people were being intimidated by picketers.

Outside the court building, Leila Jeanne Hill, one of those who challenged the law, held a postcard with a smiley face on it and said, "I think we're going to have our First Amendment rights back this summer."

Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo., who wrote the law as a Colorado state lawmaker, said protesters outside clinics are not as low-key as Hill was Wednesday.

"They do not hold up smiley faces," DeGette said. "We don't think it's too great a burden to ask the protesters not to stand in front of patients and try to physically or psychologically block them."

Eighteen states are backing Colorado. The demonstrators are being supported by, among others, the AFL-CIO and the American Civil Liberties Union, which expressed concern about limits on protest activity.

The Supreme Court reaffirmed the right to abortion in 1992, and the justices have addressed the abortion-protest issue twice before.

In 1994 they upheld a 36-foot demonstration-free zone around a Florida clinic. In 1997, the court upheld a 15-foot buffer zone around New York abortion clinic entrances but struck down a judge's order for a floating buffer zone requiring protesters to stay 15 feet away from people as they entered or left the clinics.

The 1993 Colorado law was enacted in response to what the state's lawyers called a history of obstructive demonstrations outside abortion clinics by protesters who grabbed, surrounded and yelled at patients.

Russia increases push to end rebellion in Chechnya, sets end-of-war date

BY YURI BAGROV
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GROZNY, Russia — The Russian military redoubled its drive to conquer Chechen rebels Wednesday, with troops fighting street by street in the capital Grozny while helicopter gunships and cannons relentlessly pounded the southern mountains.

Lt. Gen. Gennady Troshev, Russia's deputy chief commander in Chechnya, announced Wednesday that the war was expected to be over by Feb. 26, although nobody is giving the forces any firm deadlines for ending the operation, the Interfax news agency reported. He did not explain how he arrived at that date.

Federal forces pushed toward the center of Grozny from several directions, trying to squeeze rebel fighters into an ever-tightening circle, the military said.

It was impossible to verify the army's claims of progress. Reporters are constrained from moving freely about the capital because of the danger and the restrictions imposed by both the Russian and Chechen sides.

But an Associated Press reporter watched Wednesday as Russian forces in a northwestern neighborhood called Mikrorayon-3 seized several shell-punctured, five-story apartment buildings. They failed to take nearby nine-story buildings, from which Chechen snipers kept up a steady barrage of bullets.

Russian jets rained bombs on the city throughout the day, sending deafening roars echoing through empty streets.

Grozny has been a bastion of rebel resistance throughout the war, which has entered its fifth month, and its capture would give the Russian forces a boost after a series of surprise counterattacks by the rebels.

But control over Grozny could backfire, as it did during the 1994-96 bloodshed in Chechnya. During that war, Russians took the city and controlled it for more than a year, but lost it to the Chechens in a humiliating and bloody defeat.

After facing relatively little resistance in Chechnya's northern lowlands, Russian forces have been stalled at Grozny for months and only recently began pressing into rebel strongholds in the southern mountains.

On Wednesday, Russian helicopter gunships and artillery pounded the steep, wooded mountain slopes near the mouth of the strategic Argun Gorge, about 30 miles south of Grozny. An AP reporter took shelter behind some rocks on the edge of the village of Dachu-Borzoi as helicopters swooped down to strafe the woods.

Eleven civilians were killed Tuesday in an air raid against Dachu-Borzoi, including seven members of the family of local administrator Alu Khasayev.

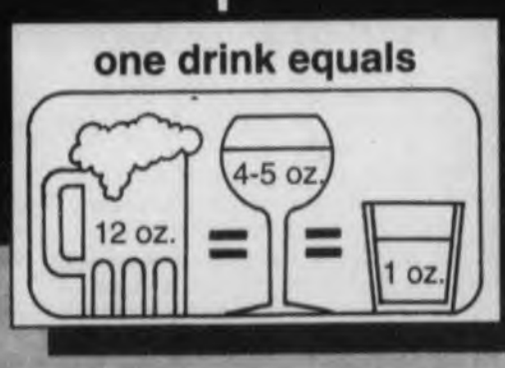
At the edge of the nearby village of Duba-Yurt, a knot of elders crowded around Russian officers on Wednesday, pleading for an end to shelling. Adam Akhyazov, chief administrator of the village, said three civilians had been killed in Duba-Yurt over the past two days.

"When people want to leave the village, the Russians prevent them, promising not to target the village," he said.

Meanwhile, a pro-Moscow Chechen leader claimed Wednesday to be mediating in talks between several Chechen warlords and federal authorities. Malik Saidullayev said the talks were proceeding with difficulty, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported. He refused to say which federal agencies were involved in the alleged negotiations or to name the Chechen commanders.

"(The federal authorities) need to carry out a political dialogue with these people, which is what I'm doing," Saidullayev told Echo of Moscow radio.

Government spokesman Andrei Korotkov confirmed that four Chechens had arrived in Moscow for talks on conditions for civilians in the breakaway republic, but said they did not constitute an official delegation.



"Negotiations are held continually," Korotkov told the AP. "As for these envoys, we don't know whom they represent."

Russian troops marched into Chechnya late September after rebels staged armed incursions into the neighboring Russian region of Dagestan and allegedly organized the bombing of several apartment buildings, which killed about 300 people.

True freshman steps in to play small forward

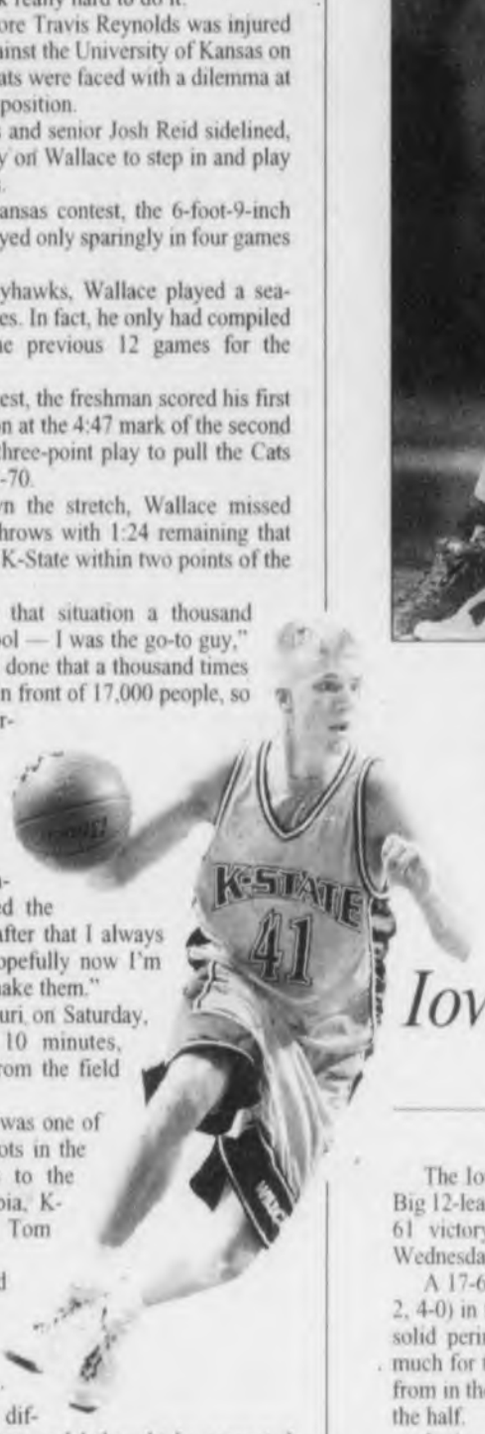
By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stepping in as a true freshman in the Big 12 Conference is no easy task. Just ask Donnie Wallace.

"Everybody's so much bigger and stronger than I am," Wallace said. "It was a big transition, and you've got to work really hard to do it."

When sophomore Travis Reynolds was injured in the first half against the University of Kansas on Jan. 12, the Wildcats were faced with a dilemma at the small forward position.

With Reynolds and senior Josh Reid sidelined, K-State had to rely on Wallace to step in and play consistent minutes.



Prior to the Kansas contest, the 6-foot-9-inch newcomer had played only sparingly in four games all season.

Against the Jayhawks, Wallace played a season-high 11 minutes. In fact, he only had compiled 11 minutes in the previous 12 games for the Wildcats.

In the KU contest, the freshman scored his first points of the season at the 4:47 mark of the second half, executing a three-point play to pull the Cats within seven at 77-70.

However, down the stretch, Wallace missed two critical free throws with 1:24 remaining that could have pulled K-State within two points of the lead.

"I've been in that situation a thousand times in high school — I was the go-to guy," Wallace said. "I'd done that a thousand times before, but never in front of 17,000 people, so I was a little bit nervous.

"In high school, the same exact thing happened to me when I was a freshman and I missed the free-throws. But after that I always made them, so hopefully now I'm always going to make them."

Against Missouri on Saturday, Wallace played 10 minutes, shooting 1-of-1 from the field for two points.

The freshman was one of the few bright spots in the Cats' 73-56 loss to the Tigers in Columbia, K-State head coach Tom Asbury said.

"Donnie played real well — I thought Donnie was very solid," Asbury said. "Donnie played a different kind of game, and I thought he competed hard. He's one guy that was probably on the positive side."

The freshman also played nine minutes in K-State's home loss to Iowa State last night.

Wallace was thrust into the Cat lineup following the two key injuries at small forward.

"I guess that is why I'm playing — because they're hurt," Wallace said. "It's an opportunity, but I like to think that I worked hard to get here, and if I wasn't good enough, they wouldn't put me on the court."

Reynolds, who already was battling a toe injury that was holding him out of practice, is expected to be out for three weeks after suffering a severe high ankle sprain at Allen Fieldhouse.

Another reason for Wallace's increased playing time is Reid's injury. Reid, who suffered a broken foot during a Dec. 20 Wildcat practice, underwent foot surgery Dec. 27 in Manhattan and is expected to be sidelined until late January or early February. Wallace said the team misses both players.

"Josh is our most experienced player, and Travis is probably, as a sophomore, one of the biggest leaders on the team," Wallace said. "Those two guys, along with Tony (Kitt), are the biggest influences. That's probably why we're not doing as well as we should right now, and that definitely hurts us."

Wallace said he doesn't feel any added pressure with his new role.

Dan Buchanan, Wallace's high school coach at Goddard, said it's been evident that strength is the key entity missing from Wallace's inside game.

He can play with them skill-wise, he just couldn't physically," Buchanan said.

Cyclones twist Wildcats

Iowa State scoring run late in 1st half seals fate for K-State

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Iowa State Cyclones increased their Big 12-leading win streak to 13 with their 72-61 victory over the K-State Wildcats on Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

A 17-6 scoring run by the Cyclones (16-2, 4-0) in the late stages of the first half and solid perimeter shooting proved to be too much for the Wildcats (8-7, 1-3) to rebound from in the second half after falling 38-30 at the half.

Junior point guard Galen Morrison said the Cyclones' run means the Cats have to defend their home court better. The Cats are now 7-2 at home this season.

"It was pretty big," Morrison said. "We had a couple of defensive laps there. We just have to adjust to that. We can't let teams go on runs like that, especially at home.

"We have to keep our home-court advantage."

The first half saw eight lead changes with just three points being the largest lead by either team.

That was, until the 6:36 mark, when Iowa State used and abused K-State from the field as six different Cyclones scored, including three treys — one from Kantrail Horton and two from Michael Nurse.

In fact, the Cyclones are the first team to make at least 50 percent from the field against K-State since Clemson on Nov. 25, 1998.

This comes after K-State struggled to defend the three against Missouri when the Tigers shot 33 percent from beyond the arc.

"It's kind of tough," Morrison said. "You're playing guys in this conference, and there are a lot of great shooters. You contest their shots, but sometimes guys are just feeling it.

"It seems like that's been happening to us like every game when somebody's been hot. We just have to do a better job and compete."

The hot players for Iowa State were junior point guard Jamaal Tinsley, who scored 13 points; Stevie Johnson, who was perfect from the field for 12 points; and Nurse, who was 50 percent on three-pointers for nine points.

Iowa State, which is arguably the hottest team in the conference, won in Bramlage for the first time since its 62-58 win on Feb. 15, 1997.

Junior forward Marcus Fizer, who led the Cyclones with 17 points and awaits Iowa State's matchup with Oklahoma on Saturday, said he knows staying undefeated in the Big 12 is a hard task.

"We know it's going to be hard," Fizer said. "We know that when we go down to Oklahoma it's not going to be easy. We know people are going to be looking forward to beating us.

"We just have to go into practice with the mentality that everyone's going to be gunning for us, and then we'll come out with a victory."

K-State was paced by senior guard Cortez Groves with 19 points and Morrison with 18. Tony Kitt added 13 rebounds for the Cats.

Hot from downtown

K-State shot 50 percent from behind the three-point arc against Iowa State in the first half, but only 37 percent from field-goal range. The Cats got the majority of their three-point production in the half from guards Galen Morrison and Cortez Groves.

Shooting for the record books

After the loss, the Wildcats are still one win away from recording their 54th consecutive winning season at home, which would be an NCAA record. K-State also entered Wednesday's game with an average attendance of 7,302 fans per game. Attendance at the game was announced at 7,715 fans.

Asbury finds place in Wildcat coaching history

K-State head coach Tom Asbury is fifth in school history in wins, with 84 victories. This season, the Cats are 8-7, with a 1-3 record in conference play.

An uneventful milestone

The 72-61 loss against Iowa State was K-State's 900th loss in its history. K-State's all-time basketball record is 1,285-900.

Injury report

K-State continues to play without two key front-court players. Forward Josh Reid is out until late January or early February with a fractured foot, and forward Travis Reynolds continues to miss time with a high-ankle sprain.

Next up

K-State's next game is scheduled for 3 p.m. Saturday, in Boulder, when it will take on the Colorado buffaloes.

Iowa State forward Marcus Fizer was all over the floor Wednesday.

In the Cyclones' victory over K-State, Fizer was a constant threat.

With 50.4 seconds remaining, Fizer dunked the ball on a feed pass and all but put the final nail in K-State's coffin. The loss dropped K-State to 1-3 in the Big 12 Conference and 8-7 overall.

Still, Fizer's performance was no surprise to the team.

K-State knew entering the game that it had a difficult task against the Cyclones. After all, it was going up against Fizer, the conference leading scorer.

"Marcus Fizer is a man among boys in the low post. It is going to be a battle with him," K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said in a previous Collegian article.

Entering the game, Fizer was averaging 21 points and 7.4 rebounds per game.

Despite the loss, the Cats held Fizer to 17 points and seven rebounds, both below his season average. K-State forward Quentin Buchanan said the team used a group effort to try and contain Fizer.

"We held him below his average," Buchanan said. "We all had to help out."

K-State head coach Tom Asbury said the team defended Fizer well.

"I thought we did a good job on Fizer," Asbury

Women held to different standards in sports than men, must work against stereotypes to gain same respect

VIEWPOINT

SARAH CRAIG

Major Indoor Soccer League, in the 1980s drew somewhat of a gathering in Wichita, where there was a player named Tatu who played for the Wichita Wings. Tatu was a crowd favorite because he knew the art of celebration in soccer better than any other player.

Every time Tatu scored a goal, he took off his jersey and threw it to the crowd. It was obvious, even to an 8-year-old, that the crowd went wild when he did this, not because of his ripped abs, but because he was celebrating.

The celebration of a goal, for which many athletes spend 90 minutes or more fighting, is part of soccer's worldwide tradition.

When the women's U.S. National team defender Brandi Chastain did the same thing to celebrate winning the World Cup for her team, the moment went down in history. But it didn't go down as it should have.

Photographs of Chastain without her shirt covered nearly every newspaper in the country, as though a topless moment could tell the story of years and years of strife toward a monumental moment in sports history. This was the largest crowd drawn for a women's sporting event, ever. This was the biggest moment for the sport of soccer in U.S. history.

This was not a moment to be remembered by such obnoxious headlines as CNN/SI Online's 1999 Year in Review "Brandi Bares All" headline that picked the moment as the most memorable moment in sports in 1999.

This was a moment that culminated a lifetime of dedication to a game that had virtually no crowd following when the women started playing.

This was a moment of mind over matter, requiring the utmost of concentration. Chastain proved her composure and overall brilliance as a soccer player when she knocked in the final shot of the World Cup-winning shootout.

This was not a moment when Chastain was thinking about showing off her body. No, she was thinking about how she just had won the World Cup.

It's a shame that widely respected news sources didn't see it that way.

In Sports Illustrated's Women of the Century 1999 issue, writer Michael Bamberger described the moment as Chastain showing the world that, like her left foot, her body is golden as well. This description came paragraphs after the opening paragraph in which Bamberger wrote, "In the final summer of the 20th century, the era of the woman in sports finally arrived."

If the era of the woman in sports has arrived, why then is it necessary to describe the athlete by her body rather than her skills?

Isn't it enough to know that Chastain, as a defender, is such a well-rounded and focused individual that she can be the fifth shooter in the game of her life?

CNN/SI Online seems to doubt so. In another section of their Year in Review, one writer wonders why fans even watched the game. "Whether we and our TV sets were turned on by the lure of attractive, unabashed, sports-bra-bearing women or the simply wonderful soccer they played remains to be seen."

This comment is so sadly dripping with sexism that it's hard to know where to start. There's the obvious reply that the crowd watching that game, contrary to what that writer suggests, was made up not of men looking for attractive women, but soccer fans. Yes, that's right, a women's team has fans. Lots of them. Not because its members are good-looking.

People watch them because they're good. They're fun to watch because they know the game and they know each other, both of which are keys to success in soccer.

And they carry the greatest scorer in the world history of soccer in Mia Hamm. That in itself seems ample reason to watch the team; no one ever wondered whether people watched Michael Jordan play because he had a nice body. The same respect should be given to these athletes.

The women's national team provides role models to people everywhere, and it plays with heart and soul.

It plays with the weight of a soccer tradition that, like most sports, has not accepted women in the game. It does it so well, in fact, that it's attracted Americans to soccer like no men's soccer team ever did.

All that "remains to be seen" is when such mainstream sports media as CNN/SI Online and Sports Illustrated will supply the world with unbiased, non-sexist reporting. Women are athletes, not objects.

said. "I was expecting a breakout game of 30 points or more. But don't get me wrong, he had a solid game."

Despite being held below his season average, Iowa State head coach Larry Eustachy said Fizer played a key role in the Cyclones' field-goal percentage of more than 50 percent.

It was the first time a team has done that against K-State this season.

"We lead the country in field-goal percentage, so it's not their fault," Eustachy said.

"When you have a guy like Marcus Fizer down low who can make a lot of his shots, you are going to shoot well."

Fizer said he is maturing more as a player, and his goal entering a game isn't necessarily to lead the team in scoring, but to help the team win.

"He told me he wanted me to score more points and take less shots," Fizer said.

"Last year, I had no idea what he was talking about, but it is beginning to be more and more clear to me this year, and the results are we are winning more games."

Fizer was also a threat on the defensive end. Late in the game, K-State forward Kelvin Howell chose to pull up on a fast-break opportunity rather than drive into the lane where Fizer prowled.

Buchanan said after the game that Fizer was a factor in the team's offense.

"He is so big. You have to have some patience and work the glass," Buchanan said.

WALLACE

"He's got a lot of extra skills that not a lot of 6-9 players have. His future is good — his best basketball is ahead of him."

Wallace has been in the weight room daily, working with the strength trainer, and said he has bulked up 20 pounds.

As a high school senior, Wallace was a highly rated player. He accumulated a variety of national honors and led Goddard to its first state tournament berth in more than 20 years.

"I always used to tell Donnie that five or 10 years from now, no one's going to know what individual stats you had, or what All-State team you were on — they're not going to remember that," Buchanan said. "But they will remember that you were the senior on the team that made it to the state tournament."

Head coach Tom Asbury said K-State's problems stem from simple mental mistakes and that it doesn't matter where it plays — the problems are all correctable.

K-State is 1-5 on the road this season, including 0-2 in conference play, and K-State wrapped up last season's conference road schedule with a 1-7 record.

"It's not too late to pull out of this by any means," Asbury said.

"Some of the things that we need to correct, it doesn't matter if we're playing at home, away, or Mars. We have to correct some of these mistakes."

K-State's next action is 3 p.m. Saturday, when the team travels to Boulder to take on the Colorado Buffaloes.

Owners approve overhaul; power placed in new hands

By RONALD BLUM
The Associated Press

PHOENIX — Owners overhauled baseball's management structure Wednesday, eliminating the American and National league offices and placing all power in the hands of the commissioner.

Also, the owners approved the $320 million sale of the Cleveland Indians by Richard Jacobs to Larry Dolan.

The changes in the league offices will not affect the way the game is played on the field.

The move was expected — AL president Gene Budig and NL president Len Coleman, whose jobs are being eliminated, already had resigned.

The National League organized at a meeting in New York on Feb. 2, 1876, and the American League formed when the Western League, then a minor circuit, changed its name to the AL on Oct. 11, 1899.

It took a full season for the junior circuit to gain national recognition, and it finally reorganized as a major league on Jan. 28, 1901.

For two years, it fought with the NL over players, but the leagues met on Jan. 9, 1903, at Cincinnati and agreed to a peace treaty, which led after the season to the first World Series.

While the leagues recognized each other's contracts, they had separate presidents, umpires, officials, statisticians and balls, with most of the traditions continuing into the 1970s and beyond.

On the field, they met annually in the All-Star game and the World Series.

The distinctions started to blur when the AL moved from Boston to New York in 1974 and the NL followed from San Francisco three years later.

Commissioner Peter Ueberroth ordered them to move into the same building as the commissioner's office in 1985, and the staff of the commissioner has increased from dozens to hundreds, dwarfing the league staffs, which remained fewer than 10.

Under the changes expected to be approved during the owners' two-day session, commissioner Bud Selig's ability to fine teams will be increased from $250,000 to $2 million, which should give him more leverage in dealing with balky owners, some of whom have refused to follow his guidelines to consider minorities for all GM and manager openings.

Selig also is proposing a clause that could give him broad power to order more revenue sharing, saying he would, without limitation, have the right to ensure there is an appropriate level of long-term competitive balance among the clubs.

The Indians' sale moved through baseball's approval process at record speed. Dolan agreed to the deal Nov. 4.

Some sales have taken six to 18 months to bring to a vote, but the Indians' deal is simpler because the team is being bought by one person, not a group with cumbersome partnership agreements.

Shareholders of the Indians' holding company meet Feb. 7 to approve the sale, which is expected to close before opening day.

The price is a record for a baseball team, topping the $311 million paid by the Fox division of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. for the Los Angeles Dodgers in 1998.

Jordan becomes part-owner of Wizards, intimidates players

By JOSEPH WHITE
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The struggling Washington Wizards aren't just getting a part-owner in Michael Jordan. He'll slip on a practice jersey and show them the moves that helped him win six NBA championships.

Jordan, who became part-owner and president of basketball operations of the Wizards on Wednesday, won't be able to play for Washington.

NBA rules prohibit owners from playing and players from becoming owners, but that won't stop him from embarrassing a slouching rookie with management's best jump shot.

"The best way to evaluate a player is to look in his eyes and see how scared he is, and I've seen that," Jordan said.

He'll have a lot of work to do. After leaving his packed news conference, matched in size and scale only by his own retirement announcements in 1993 and last year, Jordan went to the owner's box at the two-thirds empty MCI Center — and he promptly was joined by President Clinton.

Jordan heard fans boo his new investment as the Wizards fell behind early to the Dallas Mavericks.

But he is determined to turned things around, using the same audacious confidence that led the Chicago Bulls to glory.

"I have an attitude about the way I play," Jordan said. "I have an attitude about the way I win. ... It's going to take some time for me to come in and evaluate what's here, what's going to stay here and what's going to leave."

Jordan becomes only the third minority black owner in the NBA, with Magic Johnson of the Los Angeles Lakers and Edward and Bettiann Gardner of the Bulls.

"It's going to show our children what it means to be an executive, a role model," Mayor Anthony Williams said. "It really is simply going to electrify our city."

Jordan tried to become the league's first black majority owner last year when he negotiated with the Charlotte Hornets, but the deal fell through. Jordan spoke to other teams, but he never heard from the obvious one — the Bulls.

"They're going in a different direction," Jordan said.

Jordan said the Wizards deal requires an out-of-pocket investment, but would not elaborate on what percentage he will own. One of his new partners, Wizards minority owner Ted Leonsis said, "It's obviously sizable enough that he's here."

Jordan also will have an ownership stake in the NHL's Washington Capitals, which are owned by Leonsis' Lincoln Holdings group.

Jordan was wearing a black suit, but he was feted as if he were wearing a cape and had an "S" on his chest. The Wizards, a moribund franchise suffering on the court and at the gate, are in desperate need of a Superman.

"I don't get to play. I don't get to wear a Wizards uniform," Jordan said. "But I will have influence with the players who wear the uniform. ... I'm going to try to have my imprint and footprints all over this place."

For now, Jordan said he will retain general manager Wes Unseld and coach Gar Heard, but he gave no guarantees.

"Until we get everyone on track, everybody's disposable to some degree," Jordan said.

That same competitiveness was evident to Leonsis, who initiated the negotiations to bring Jordan to the nation's capital.

"I'd like to see a player disregard Michael Jordan," Leonsis said. "Every part of your DNA, when you're with this man, says this guy knows what it takes to win."

Wizards players immediately welcomed Jordan's arrival. Point guard Rod Strickland, who earlier this season said he wanted out of Washington, said he now wants to stay.

"That's very, very fair to say," Strickland said. "This changes everything."

Jordan said he will continue to live in Chicago, where he won 10 scoring titles and five MVP awards during his 13-year career. His family lives there, and he said he will commute to Washington.

"I will be here for as much time as it takes to turn this team around," Jordan said.

Entering Wednesday night's game with Dallas, the Wizards were 12-27, with the second-worst record in the Eastern Conference. The franchise hasn't won a playoff game in 12 years and has several high-priced, underachieving players — Strickland, Mitch Richmond and Juwan Howard — who would be difficult to unload because of the league's salary cap rules.

One area where Jordan could help right away is attendance. The Wizards have not sold out a game this year at the 2-year-old MCI Center.

Wizards President Susan O'Malley did not miss the opportunity to peddle tickets and shouted out the toll-free ticket number during the televised news conference.

Several complex issues in three-way negotiations had to be resolved before Jordan could join the Wizards. Leonsis, who started the ball rolling, and his partners bought the Capitals from Abe Pollin last year and own 44 percent of the Wizards and the MCI Center. Leonsis' group also has right of first refusal to buy them both when Pollin retires.

After Leonsis and Jordan clicked, Pollin had to be convinced. Pollin and Jordan had a shouting match during last year's owners lockout of NBA players, for whom Jordan was a key negotiator. Both, however, said that confrontation is behind them.

"He is one of the greatest athletes that ever put on a suit," Pollin said. "He is a straight, honest, decent, wonderful human being."

Another potentially difficult issue involves Jordan's agent, David Falk. Pollin and Falk have feuded in recent years over contract negotiations involving Howard, Strickland and Rex Chapman, so Pollin and Falk weren't brought together when it came time for the Jordan negotiations.

Falk will not be allowed to represent Jordan the owner because of the potential for conflict of interest, but Falk still can handle Jordan's endorsements.

"He certainly can be a pain. The good thing about it is he's a great pain to have on your side," Jordan said.

"I look forward to utilizing his advice. ... I will confer with the league, with the union, see what's allowed, what's not allowed."

Virtual fair helps students find internships

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hang your suit back up, put the shoe polish down, turn the shower off and leave your pajamas on.

Mary Marston, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said K-State will have its first Virtual Career Fair from Jan. 31 to Feb. 4 to give students the opportunity to gain internships or co-ops for the summer.

Marston said more than 100 companies have registered for the career fair and that she hopes students will take advantage of this new and convenient opportunity.

"For our first time, we are very pleased with the turnout from the various companies," Marston said. "We expected this many employers, but we also have a wide range from all different areas. We are excited that there is something for everyone through our career fair."

Marston said the Virtual Career Fair will allow students to go online 24 hours a day and search for summer opportunities, subtracting the usual struggles associated with the all-campus Career Fair during the fall. She said students and employers have been asking for a fair during the spring semester for a long time, but the finances and physical support have not been available.

Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said Roosevelt University in Chicago created the idea of an online career fair, and other universities in the area, such as the University of Missouri-Kansas City and the University of Texas, also have started implementing the idea.

"We anticipate that students will be very excited once the word gets out about the fair," Schuley said. "This is a wonderful and easy way to apply for an internship."

Marston said in order to participate in the fair, students must be registered with Career and Employment Services and have their résumé posted online. Students can register by filling out an application in Holtz Hall and paying a registration fee of $20. This will allow them to be registered with Career and Employment Services until August.

Students then can log on to the Web site, read about each job description the company has available and send their résumés to potential employers that interest them. After this step, Marston said companies can contact individual students for phone or face-to-face interviews at their discretion.

"This is a convenient way to do a search for summer internships," Marston said. "They don't have to go anywhere and do interviews and will not have to send numerous résumés and cover letters in the mail."

Brooke Cheley, program director for Cheley Colorado Camps, said she is participating in the virtual fair more for the advertising opportunity than for recruiting. She said although the trend for virtual fairs likely will increase in the future, she still prefers the face-to-face interaction with students.

"I think this is a great idea and that it could be a great success, but it needs some work right now," Cheley said. "I like getting out there and meeting people, because in this business, your work performance is more based on your personality skills rather than your knowledge."

Cheley said she would continue to participate in virtual fairs because the Internet is an important source for students to utilize when looking for internship opportunities.

"We travel through the Midwest for three weeks on recruiting trips and enjoy meeting with people," Cheley said. "However, by advertising in fairs like this, it gets our name out there to students who might be interested in working with us, giving them their initial start in contacting us."

Marston said students also will benefit from the online career fair because it skips the initial step of dressing professionally and spending an entire day meeting with many companies at once. She said the Virtual Career Fair will allow students to not miss the internship opportunities because of class and work conflicts and will add an element of convenience for both the students and the businesses.

Students wishing to participate must register with Career and Employment Services and have their résumé posted online. To register, fill out the application at Holtz 100 and pay a $20 fee.

"This saves everyone the first step," Marston said. "Companies will not have to take three days from their duties to come to Manhattan, while students can view many different opportunities 24 hours a day without leaving their home."

Schuley said there also has been interest expressed in having a Virtual Career Fair next year that would include permanent positions as well as internships. She said every student should take advantage of the convenience of the virtual fair.

"We are excited to be able to offer the opportunity to do something like this online," Schuley said. "I cannot imagine why somebody wouldn't want to participate in this. It is a wonderful new concept."

For more information about the Virtual Career Fair or registering with Career and Employment Services, contact 532-6506.

Steps to the online search

Step 1: Register at Holtz Hall with Career and Employment Services to get a résumé online.

Step 2: Review the list of exhibitors to learn which employers are listing positions. Each employer has a "booth" with their profile, logo and link to their home page. This section also displays positions of interest. Visit the employer's home page to research their product or service.

Step 3: Go to Login: Student/Alumni
- Enter the ID and PIN number you selected when you registered.
- Click on the Virtual Career Fair logo.
- If you wish to submit your résumé, scroll down to "Referral Section" and go to "click here." Your résumé will be forwarded.

Step 3. Employers will view résumés after the fair closes Feb. 4 and are encouraged to follow up with students by e-mail, phone or letter.

Step 4: Your "Referral History" section will list employers to whom you submitted your résumé. Print your list.

Tips for Success
- Have a professional message on your answering machine.
- Know your job interests and qualifications. If employers call you, be able to express your strengths, academic preparation and related experience.
- Have a well-written résumé. Attend résumé-writing workshops or make an individual appointment to fine-tune it.
- Follow up with a cover letter and print résumé.

If you have any questions, contact Career and Employment Services at 532-6506.

Companies look for experience, flair

BY BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since most résumés are the same, Timothy Moore, owner of Lost Lake Lodge, said he looks for originality.

"It's always good to have something that stands out," Moore said.

Moore's business, located in Lake Shore, Minn., is just one of the more than 100 businesses that will be accepting résumés during the Virtual Career Fair, Jan. 31 through Feb. 4.

He said hospitality management and environmental education internships are two of the positions his business is offering.

"If we were to get six applicants for each position, I'd be a happy camper," Moore said. "The job market is very tight right now. We've had to bring in a lot of people from overseas."

Moore said his business has tried virtual career fairs in the past but received no response. He said he would give it another shot at K-State.

"Bringing in students with expressed interest is a benefit to us," Moore said. "It doesn't save us any money, but gives us a much broader reach."

Businesses participating in the career fair have been given the opportunity to place as many positions on their site as they want.

Mary Marston, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said this service will help place business names, logos and Web sites in front of students.

"Students can send résumés electronically and businesses can pick the students they would like to interview," Marston said. "It's another way to advertise."

The registration fee for a business to enter the fair is $100.

Marston said some universities have charged $20 in the past, and some have charged as much as $125.

"The Virtual Career Fair is a new concept," Marston said. "A lot of companies use it as one more method of job recruitment."

Ari Fleitman, president of Advanced Technologies in Houston employees, said the company will be looking for three or four interns, and one or two full-time. The company is looking for science and architectural engineers.

"We're one of the many companies that has substantial growth plans," Fleitman said. "For this, we need many good people. The best candidates are students."

"The Virtual Career Fair is a new concept. A lot of companies use it as one more method of job recruitment."

— Mary Marston assistant director of Career and Employment Services

Students who have had experience in their field and can work in a team atmosphere will be considered for a position, Fleitman said. After a résumé has been accepted, Fleitman said interviews will be scheduled.

"I don't think it does away with the face-to-face interview," Fleitman said. "When it comes to the interview, we will have more people to choose from."

Fleitman said a lot of his employees are K-State alumni.

"We've enjoyed coming to K-State," he said. "K-State is ranked as the highest of our university recruitment."

Virtual career fairs catching on at many colleges nationwide

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Virtual career fairs are a recent technological innovation that but should be catching on with other universities soon, said Mary Marston, assistant director of Career and Employment Services.

Marston said she received the idea for a virtual career fair at a conference she attended at Roosevelt University in Chicago.

"In 1997, the Roosevelt Career Center developed the idea for a virtual career fair, and since then, the University of Missouri at Kansas City has held one, as well as Roosevelt University," Marston said.

Along with UMKC and Roosevelt University, K-State is one of the first colleges in the nation to have a virtual career fair.

"In the last two years, everything has been going online, so the idea for the virtual career fair came about," Marston said.

Sheree Shepard, career coordinator for UMKC, said virtual career fairs are something that is becoming a trend because of the easy link that students have to employers.

"The Internet is a wonderful thing," Shepard said. "It is an easy way to create a link to employers for students, and I feel that is our duty as a university."

Virtual career fairs have advantages over all-university career fairs because of the convenience for the students and the employers, Marston said.

"I believe that it will catch on with other universities because of the element of convenience," Marston said.

Marisa Ring, career specialist at the University of Missouri in Columbia said it would be surprising to her if virtual career fairs did not catch on quickly.

"It really does save everyone time, especially students," Ring said.

Shepard said although virtual career fairs have proven to be successful, she does not think they will replace all-university career fairs.

"There is a market for people that come to regular career fairs as well as employers that set up booths at the virtual career fairs," Shepard said. "The virtual fairs are just gaining a share in that market."

Marston said the planning for the K-State Virtual Career Fair has gone well and such fairs should become a common trend among universities.

"It has gone very well for us and hopefully students and other universities will

Consulting firms advise companies to do things by 'The Book'

BY R. UNRUH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT COLLINS, Colo. — Consultants help companies market products, boost the bottom line, decide whom to hire and how much to pay. Now, a business consulting firm goes a step further — advising companies how to do those things by The Book.

Teaching business people to make biblically-based decisions is the goal of Kingdom Companies, a division of Ultimate Support Systems of Fort Collins, a privately owned, 20-year-old company that makes speaker, lighting, keyboard and microphone stands for the music and entertainment industries.

The company's mission statement proclaims its first goal is to make known the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and to minister his life and love to others.

It does this through the profitable design, manufacture and distribution of a broad range of high-quality support systems.

Darrell Schoenig and James Dismore, founder and president, respectively, said their program is the result of a concern that their Christian lives were being checked out on Sunday morning and checked back in Sunday night.

"We go out and work with other companies and ... give them ideas," Dismore said.

"We try to help other companies come to understand what is their mission, and what is their purpose."

Ultimate Support generates five-year plans for business and ministry, then combines them to create a corporate plan.

Decisions based on biblical concepts can cost money. For example, a recent $48,000 health insurance premium hike came out of company coffers; officials decided the corporation could sustain the additional expense better than employees, who would have had to pay an additional $100 a month apiece.

Ultimate's corporate mission statement has stayed in company catalogs, even though some non-Christian customers have canceled thousands of dollars worth of purchase orders. Officials declined to give details.

"We try to help other companies come to understand what is their mission, and what is their purpose."

— James Dismore, president of Kingdom Companies

Schoenig became a Christian while living in his van on the beaches of Hawaii in the 1970s. He returned to Colorado with a band. At a concert he discovered the need for lightweight, strong speaker stands. Band members had to use chairs to support their speakers.

A hang glider pilot, he fabricated some stands from metal tubing used for hang gliders, then started making them in his parents' garage when others wanted them. The band soon broke up, and he was left with a burgeoning demand for his products.

Meanwhile, he had developed a philosophy, which he summarized this way: "God, if this is what you want me to do, I don't want this to just be a business. I want to impact lives for you."

Dismore, raised by Christian grandparents, started working with Sam Walton when the Wal-Mart chain had three stores. Dismore was a senior level manager when he left 12 years later.

On his arrival at Ultimate in the 1990s, he decided to pursue a marriage of business and ministry plans that Schoenig already had begun to formulate.

"Is the making of money for your own self-interest, or is it for others?" Dismore said.

"There's nothing in Scriptures that says there's anything wrong with profit. Scripture does say it's the purpose, and how you go about making that profit, and what you do with the profit, that makes the difference."

Kingdom Companies is funded by Ultimate's profits and has provided advice to retailers, manufacturers, Internet companies and software operations.

Franklin DeRemer, CEO for the California-based MetaWare software company, credited Kingdom Companies with offering godly counselors and advisors with years of business experience to help develop guidelines for his own operation.

Mark Haynam, who runs Leaf Kitchens, Ltd., a high-end Colorado cabinetmaker, expressed gratitude that someone was there when a hurting, lonely cabinetmaker needed help.

"We will not tell you that you must do A, B and C to meet our (or, more importantly, God's) standards. What we will do is share our experiences, our time and our suggestions. Our goal is to establish a mentoring relationship that will positively impact your business and its people," says an outline for Kingdom Companies.

Bonnie Griffin Kaake of Innovative Consulting Group Inc., in the Denver area, said the concept is unique and it could be valuable if managers avoid problems with employees perceiving religious dictates in the workplace.

"I really strongly believe that there is a lot of room today for more ethics in business," said Kaake, a member of the International Guild of Professional Consultants.

"I have been appalled at some of the things I have seen."

"It's not exactly about the things we do," Dismore said. "It's about why we do it. We try to walk our talk."

Kennedy nephew charged with slaying; case to be handled as a juvenile offense

BY DENISE LAVOIE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. — A nephew of Robert F. Kennedy was charged Wednesday with bludgeoning a girl to death with a golf club in 1975 when he was 15. This provided the long-awaited break in a case that frustrated police in wealthy Greenwich and raised suspicions of a Kennedy cover-up.

Michael Skakel flew to Connecticut from his home in Florida and surrendered at Greenwich police headquarters after a warrant was issued for his arrest in the slaying of Martha Moxley. Because of Skakel's age at the time of the crime, the case will be handled in juvenile court.

"Michael has stated all along he did not do this," his lawyer, Michael Sherman, said. "He had no knowledge of it. He had no part in it. He is not guilty."

Moxley was beaten with a 6-iron and stabbed in the throat with a piece of the club's shattered shaft. The club was quickly matched to a set owned by the Skakel family, who lived across the street.

But the investigation kept hitting dead ends, and police were accused of apathy and ineptitude. A special prosecutor quit partly in frustration over unproven claims there had been payoffs aimed at thwarting the probe. Skakel's father, Rushton, is the brother of Robert F. Kennedy's widow, Ethel.

As the years went by and no arrests were made, rumors of a Kennedy cover-up circulated in Greenwich.

Moxley was killed Oct. 30, 1975. She had visited the Skakel home along with several other teenagers after a night of pre-Halloween pranks. She left, apparently bound for home, but never made it.

Investigators got their big break during the past year, when a one-man grand jury heard testimony from former patients at the Elan school, a substance abuse treatment center in Maine that Skakel attended from 1978 to 1980. Prosecutors filed court documents that said Skakel admitted killing Moxley to fellow students at Elan.

Prosecutor Jonathan Benedict said juvenile law prevented him from identifying the suspect, but Sherman confirmed it was his client.

The case could get stalled in juvenile court for a year or more if Skakel's lawyer fights prosecutors' bid to transfer the case to adult court.

Moxley was killed Oct. 30, 1975. She had visited the Skakel home along with several other teen-agers after a night of pre-Halloween pranks. She left, apparently bound for home, but never made it. Her body was found the next afternoon under low-hanging fir trees on her family's property.

Both Michael Skakel and his older brother, Thomas, then 17, were considered possible suspects, along with others. The Skakel family stopped cooperating with police in 1976.

For a long time, authorities focused on Thomas. It was not until years later that they took a second look at Michael, after he changed his story about his movements the night of the killing. In a 1995 interview with private investigators hired by his family, Skakel placed himself near the murder scene at about the time of the murder.

In 1998, Los Angeles Detective Mark Fuhrman wrote a book that suggested Michael Skakel murdered Moxley in a fit of jealousy after seeing Thomas kissing her. Investigators have dismissed any suggestion that Fuhrman's book helped them solve the case.

A month after Fuhrman's book was published, Superior Court Judge George Thim was appointed to serve as a one-man grand jury. He interviewed more than 40 witnesses, including Skakel's former schoolmates in Maine.

In his report, released Wednesday, the judge said he found grounds to bring murder charges.

"This is a wonderful day," Moxley's mother, Dorthy Moxley, told the Daily Record of Morris County, N.J., while sitting at a dining room table beneath a large painting of her daughter. "I just hope that they find him guilty."

Sit-in concludes with agreement to delay affirmative-action order

BY DAVID MARK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Two black lawmakers ended their sit-in at the lieutenant governor's office Wednesday after Gov. Jeb Bush agreed to delay his executive order ending affirmative action so public hearings on the issue could take place.

Sen. Kendrick Meek of Miami and Rep. Tony Hill of Jacksonville, both Democrats, spent the night in Lt. Gov. Frank Brogan's office after failing to persuade Bush and Brogan to rescind the order Tuesday. They left about 24 hours after the sit-in began.

The two lawmakers and Bush signed a statement outlining an agreement reached after they discussed the governor's plan to replace affirmative action in hiring and university admissions with what the governor calls his One Florida program.

Bush contends his plan will increase minority enrollment in state universities. It guarantees admission to some state universities to the top 20 percent of the state's high school seniors, adds $20 million to the state's financial aid budget and makes it easier for minority businesses to be certified to work across the state.

"In light of the governor's willingness to take these affirmative steps, we've agreed to rescind our demand that the governor immediately suspend the One Florida executive order," the lawmakers said in the statement.

Bush agreed to a formal meeting with the Black Caucus and other interested lawmakers and to delay a Board of Regents vote on the program until Feb. 17. The Regents, who oversee the state university system, had been scheduled to act on the proposal Friday.

"This is going to require more dialogue, which I am prepared to do," Bush said.

The agreement also calls for three public hearings. In addition, Bush agreed to a good-faith review of the lawmakers' written comments and recommendations for improving One Florida.

"We informed the governor of our strong support for affirmative action and the potential harm to our communities if the One Florida initiative rolls back or repeals the gains made possible by our existing affirmative action law," the legislators said in their statement.

They also apologized "for any inconvenience our actions have caused."

The protest escalated Wednesday as 20 more lawmakers and about 100 protesters, including many students from predominantly black Florida A&M University, crowded the Capitol hallways outside the governor's office.

Hundreds of miles away in Miami, about 100 students, teachers and employees at Florida International University protested outside Bush's South Florida office.

They carried signs that read, "Stop racism," and chanted, "Shame on Bush."

Bush apologized Wednesday for a widely televised remark the night before in which he told an aide to "kick their asses out," in reference to reporters covering the sit-in. Shortly after noon Wednesday, agents from the Florida Department of Law Enforcement removed nine reporters, including one from The Associated Press, who has stayed with the lawmakers in Brogan's office through the night.

"I made a statement that I'm not going to repeat because my mother wouldn't like me to say the 'A word,'" Bush said. "I apologize for that."

Relative files suit, goes to federal court in attempt to keep Elian in U.S.

BY ALEX VEIGA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Elian Gonzalez's relatives in Miami went to federal court Wednesday to challenge the Immigration and Naturalization Service's ruling that the 6-year-old boy must be returned to his father in Cuba.

Lazaro Gonzalez, Elian's great-uncle, filed the federal lawsuit after Attorney General Janet Reno declared last week that the boy's status was an immigration matter solely in the jurisdiction of federal law.

"It is about protecting Elian's civil and constitutional rights, the same as if he was any other child," said Spencer Eig, a lawyer for the great-uncle. Elian has been living with his Miami relatives since he was found floating on an inner tube off the Florida coast Thanksgiving Day.

The lawsuit names as defendants Reno, INS Commissioner Doris Meissner, INS District Director Rober Wallis, the Department of Justice and the INS.

It accuses the government of violating Elian's rights to due process of law and asks the judge to prevent the INS from returning the boy to Cuba before the agency gives him an asylum hearing.

No hearing date was immediately set. The Justice Department and the INS said in a statement they were prepared to respond quickly and would ask the court to address this matter expeditiously.

"It is important for the well-being of Elian Gonzalez that the status of this 6-year-old boy be resolved as quickly as possible," the statement said.

Reno had brushed aside a ruling from a Miami family court judge delaying the boy's return. But she postponed an INS deadline to return the boy to his father in order to give Elian's U.S. relatives time to challenge the INS decision in federal court.

Elian's mother and stepfather were among 11 people who drowned trying to reach the United States, and the boy was rescued at sea by the Coast Guard after he was found clinging to an inner tube in the Atlantic.

The INS's top official initially ruled Elian should return to his father, and the agency rejected a second asylum petition filed last week on behalf of Elian by Lazaro Gonzalez. The INS ruled that only the boy's father can represent his son.

Eig said Lazaro Gonzalez was not asking the court to decide the issues in the case, to take custody away from Elian's father or to decide whether or not Elian should go back to Cuba, but simply to compel the U.S. government to give Elian a fair hearing and his day in court.

Many legal experts have insisted since the fervor over the case began that Elian's U.S. relatives have no standing.

"All along, the legal issue has been who speaks for a 6-year-old boy, and the answer is the closest surviving relative. That is the father," said David Abraham, an immigration law professor at the University of Miami.

The president of Cuba's National Assembly, Ricardo Alarcon, called Elian's Miami relatives a bunch of kidnappers Wednesday and said their attempts to keep the boy in the United States ignores the American government, showing disrespect for its institutions.

Leaders of several U.S. groups that want Elian returned to his father have warned they will call for protests and acts of civil disobedience if the child is not sent back soon. The groups denounced Congress for considering legislation that would grant U.S. citizenship to the boy over his father's objections.

Sen. Connie Mack, R-Fla., who is sponsoring a resolution to grant citizenship to the boy, said Wednesday: "This is an issue about what his mother wanted for the boy. ... To ignore her interests and her concern is unthinkable."

Mack, interviewed on CBS's "The Early Show," was reminded that Congress rarely has granted citizenship; among the few recipients were Winston Churchill and Mother Teresa.

"Winston Churchill and this little boy have a lot in common. They both stood for freedom," Mack said.

Fidel Castro's sister Juanita Castro, who left Cuba in 1964 and now lives in the Miami area, said she hopes the matter can be decided justly in court. She would not say whether she thinks the boy should stay or be returned to Cuba.

"I hope what happens is the best for him, for his destiny, for his future," she said. "This case, everything that has happened, makes me very sad."

Early Wednesday afternoon, Chris Ward, junior in English, and Sarah Martin, freshman in family studies and human services, take time for lunch in the Arch Café. Ward said he liked the location of the café, and since Martin had never been there, he decided it would be a nice place for lunch.

Top of the Arch

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK

Art museum's café remains quiet retreat for lunchtime dining, conversation

Students who want to go to the top of the arch don't have to travel to St. Louis.

In fact, they don't even need to leave campus.

The Arch Café, located in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, offers a selection of sandwiches and salads along with a quiet, relaxed atmosphere and a view of campus, said Kathrine Schlageck, education and public services supervisor for the museum.

"The café is right above the arch, and there are windows on either side," Schlageck said. "It gives people a beautiful view while they eat. It's almost like being in a tree house."

Paul Stolle, director of dining services at the K-State Student Union, said the Arch Café offers another alternative for dining. The café is open for lunch from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Tuesdays through Fridays.

The menu, which changes daily, consists of specialty sandwiches, salads and prepackaged sandwiches and side salads, Stolle said. Chips, desserts and drinks also are available.

The Arch Café is open to the public from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday. The cafe serves a variety of sandwiches, salads and deserts.

He said people are able to get a complete meal for $5 or less.

"One of the things that makes the Arch Café different is that everything is put on china," Stolle said. "We use china, glassware and silverware."

Another thing people enjoy is the atmosphere at the café, he said.

"It's great for people who don't want the hustle-bustle atmosphere," Stolle said. "It's a nice, quaint atmosphere good for conversation."

Whether it's the atmosphere, the food or the art museum, the café attracts a variety of people, Schlageck said. Students and faculty as well as Manhattan residents and out-of-town visitors eat at the café.

"We have regulars or groups that will eat at the café at least once a week," she said. "People will also make a point to visit the art museum around lunchtime so they can eat before or after."

She said students also stay for lunch after listening to a visiting artist.

"Some students will even stay and study in the café after it closes because it's quiet," Schlageck said.

Curtis Knecht, graduate student in music, said he eats at the café because of the atmosphere and the good, inexpensive food.

"I eat here once or twice a week," Knecht said. "It's usually pretty quiet. The staff's really friendly, too."

Schlageck said the art museum seemed to be a good place to have a café.

"Most museums have something similar," she said. "For groups that come from a long distance for the museum, it's nice to have a place for them to eat."

She said the café can act as an attraction for the art museum and bring more visitors in who otherwise wouldn't go.

The café offers variety for anyone wanting to escape everyday stresses for an hour or so, Schlageck said.

"The Arch Café is a good place to eat, enjoy a beautiful view and relax for a while," she said.

Trendy bracelets have Tibetan roots, color meanings

BY CASSIDY HILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What started as a Buddhist trend has become a global fashion as Powerbead bracelets have grossed more than $250 million in sales.

Seven years ago in Tibet, beaded bracelets, which then were called rosary beads, were worn by Buddhists for fashion, strength and energy.

The trend of wearing the beads came from several celebrities, such as Richard Gere and Ricky Martin, said Jayesh Desai, owner of Handcrafters From Around the World in Topeka. After people started noticing the beads, the demand for them increased, and they now are worn as fashion accessories.

Quinci Shaver, freshman in elementary education, said the beads are a fun way to add color and fashion to almost any outfit.

"I enjoy the Powerbeads because I think they are cool looking," Shaver said. "These Powerbeads are comfortable and reasonably priced."

Powerbeads come in several colors that represent different meanings, ranging from love to health to vitality. The beads are made from materials including glass, wood, crystal and genuine stones, all of which have their own colors and meanings. Wooden bracelets are decorated with Chinese writing and symbols. The other bracelets are made of plain beads.

Desai said he believes in the power of the beaded bracelets.

"I wear the Powerbeads because they look nice," Desai said. "I absolutely believe in all of the meanings that these beads have. They have a power."

Bracelets range in price from $1 to $7.95 per bracelet, depending on the style.

Since the Powerbeads have become a global fashion, they also have become available in rings and anklets. The bracelets and anklets sell for about $4.95 for one or $10 for three. The rings are priced around $1 per ring.

Jaime Kelly, junior in psychology, said she does not care much about what the bracelets mean, but she likes the fashion statement they make.

"I really just wear the Powerbeads for fashion. I usually don't think about the meanings of each one," Kelly said. "I think that it's really neat to think that if you wear a certain color, that meaning or power may come true."

Patti Bishop, employee of Handcrafters From Around the World, said people of all ages are obsessed with the beads.

"The Powerbeads have become increasingly popular with college students as well as high school and even younger students," Bishop said. "I think that the students enjoy these beads because they are like a lucky charm that has its own meaning and energy."

Sarah Stevens, manager of a Manhattan accessory store, said Powerbeads are sold most commonly to high school and college female students.

"The amount of Powerbeads sold between college and high school girls are equal," Stevens said. "I believe that the genuine stone and the semi-precious bracelets are more popular than the polyresin Powerbeads."

'King and I' comes to Salina

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The story of love will be told through the songs of an off-Broadway cast at a one-time performance of "The King and I."

At 8 p.m. Feb. 1 at the Salina Bicentennial Center, the Tony-Award winning musical will be performed as part of the troupe's national tour.

Stephanie Roberts, vice president of the Roberts Group, said the performance is available one night only, due to the size of Salina.

"It depends on the size of the city," Roberts said. "The large cities or large markets like Chicago usually run seven nights."

Karen Fallis, Bicentennial Center assistant manager, said of 2,500 tickets originally available, 1,800 tickets have been sold. The majority of the seats are $34.50, but there are a few on the sidelines of the stage for $29.50.

Roberts said the audience will be impressed.

"There'll be stunning scenery, dazzling costumes and memorable songs," Roberts said.

Fallis said the Bicentennial Center is looking forward to the production.

"We are very excited about 'The King and I,'" Fallis said. "It will be a production the likes of which Salina has never seen."

Playing the king is Lego Louis, and Anna is portrayed by Jill Van Velzer.

The musical takes place in the early 1860s, and the setting is in the royal capital city of Bangkok in the kingdom of Siam. Anna is sent by the king of Siam to teach English and Western ideas and philosophies to members of the royal family. These members include the king, as well as his many wives and 67 children.

Anna and the king almost immediately clash due to their differing viewpoints. The only reason she decides to stay is her affection for the children.

She does more than teach the royal family Western values, and in the end, it is apparent that Anna and the king have fallen in love.

There also is news of the escape of one of the king's slaves, Tuptim, and the death of the king's secret police.

On his deathbed, the king is surrounded by Anna and his family. He has learned many lessons from Anna he would not have learned otherwise, and it shows in his final wishes.

"The King and I" originally opened March 29, 1951, and received five Tony Awards the following year.

The revival of the Rodgers and Hammerstein musical received four additional Tony Awards in 1996.

FIRE

"We are taking statements from individuals who may have witnessed the fire or the moments leading up to it."

The 48-year-old building was equipped with smoke alarms and extinguishers but did not have a sprinkler system because it was built before they were required, Campolo said.

Fire hoses inside the building had been disconnected because the equipment was obsolete, Seton Hall spokeswoman Lisa Grider said.

The smoke alarms and extinguishers recently had passed inspection and at least one extinguisher was used, during the blaze, Campolo said.

After the fire, soot-faced students lined up in the student center to comfort each other and call their parents.

Three roommates on the ground floor slept through the fire and were not hurt. They woke up more than two hours later.

One of them, Erica McGlone, 18, said she peeked out her window and startled a firefighter outside. "We said, 'Like, excuse me, sir, what's going on?' And he said, 'Get out.' They came in and dragged us out of there," she said.

FUNDS

"We ask a minimum commitment from them," Mammola said. "If we were to not score a touchdown in a given year, we still would ask them for a commitment, which they certainly do.

"Their contributions well exceed that minimum based on our team's success."

The minimum donation now is $2,000, Mammola said.

Donations to the fund are appealing because all gifts are tax-deductible by the donor. In addition, sponsors often are eligible for basketball and football ticket privileges in accordance with the Priority Points System, which is based on the size of the donation given.

Donors come from a variety of factions, including individuals, corporations, alumni, friends of the university, or anyone who has an interest in K-State athletics, O'Brien said.

Many donors belong to one of Kansas' 32 Catbacker clubs, an organization that originated 25 years ago. Floyd directs and coordinates the efforts of the individual programs.

"I'm kind of the liaison between the university and the Catbacker clubs themselves," he said.

Monies donated from the Catbackers across the state typically exceed $150,000 a year, Floyd said.

The Ahearn Scholarship Fund was founded in 1964 to honor Mike Ahearn, who served as K-State's head football coach from 1905 to 1910 and as athletics director from 1920 to 1946.

SHELTER

Stoddard said.

In addition to these changes, the city came up with an idea after discussing ways more animals could get adopted from the facility.

"The city is working on a Web site so that individuals can pull up animals that are in the shelter, and that should help owners reclaim animals and increase the adoption rate," Murphy said.

The new shelter will create more room for animals and staff, in addition to creating a better opportunity to show animals to the community.

"There are several priorities," Murphy said. "One was to make it user-friendly but also adoption-friendly. We are also trying to cut the noise level down to improve the efficiency of the shelter and reduce the disease spread of animals."

Murphy also said the new shelter will have drop-off cages at night so animals no longer will be tied up to the fence and be cold at night.

POWERCAT

If the schools had material such as T-shirts printed for fund-raisers, the company that produced the shirts would have to pay an 8-percent licensing fee based on the wholesale price.

K-State brings in about $500,000 a year from licensing, with only about $100 of that coming from the high schools.

"This is the first school that hasn't thought that was a great deal," Fairman said.

Reuther said he didn't want to commit the school to paying a commission.

"I was not going to saddle them with that, particularly when I don't agree with the judgment," he said.

The school opened in August. A company sent the school some possible logos, and the Powercat outline was among them, Reuther said. The school added spots and whiskers.

"I think there is a great deal of difference in our jaguar and your wildcat," he said.

The school now is looking for another mascot.

"We're disappointed, but I guess that is a part of life," Reuther said.

Oil prices soar to highest prices since Gulf War

By BRUCE STANLEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — Petroleum prices surged Wednesday to the highest levels seen since the Persian Gulf War, raising concerns about worsening inflation and a possible threat to the economies of poor, oil-importing nations.

Prices turned lower later in the day for North Sea Brent oil but continued a rally for the U.S. benchmark West Texas Intermediate crude.

The rebound in oil reflects signs that OPEC is planning to extend production limits as well as a cold snap in the northeastern United States that stoked demand for heating oil and natural gas. Industry analysts said that even though crude oil prices have more than doubled in the past year, countries dependent on imported oil should be able to avoid severe economic pain, barring another big and sustained spike in prices.

Before the late retreat, crude contracts in London reached their highest price since Jan. 16, 1991, on the eve of the air and missile offensive launched against Iraq by U.S.-led forces in the Gulf.

Much of the speculative buying is a result of expectations that ministers of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries will agree in March to extend the production limits adopted last year.

Evidence of tight supplies came in an industry report Wednesday of the steepest annual decline in U.S. crude oil inventories in at least a half century.

The American Petroleum Institute said U.S. oil inventories declined by more than 136 million barrels in 1999, a 12.7 percent plunge from the previous year and the biggest drop for a full calendar year in API records going back to 1950.

Contracts for Brent Oil for March delivery jumped 25 cents per barrel to peak at $26.30 in early trading on the London International Petroleum Exchange, before slipping to close down 21 cents from Tuesday at $25.84.

West Texas Intermediate crude for February delivery shot up to a new nine-year high, rising as high as $29.68 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, before giving up some ground. It closed up 69 cents at $29.54 a barrel, a level last surpassed at the onset of the Gulf War.

"These higher oil prices put inflation back on the corner of the radar screen," said Peter Gignoux, managing director of the petroleum desk at Salomon Smith Barney Citibank in London.

Gignoux dismissed the run-up in prices as a blip on the weekly chart, saying, "I think you need to see prices at this level for six months before you start to get concerned."

Last week, the oil market snapped a six-day losing streak when oil ministers from Saudi Arabia and Venezuela began talking about extending OPEC's production cuts of 4.3 million barrels a day beyond an expected March expiration date.

Gareth Lewis-Davies, an oil analyst at Lehman Brothers, said OPEC would have to boost output to protect its own interests. By pumping more oil, OPEC could trim prices and thereby discourage non-OPEC members from flooding the market with their own crude and causing prices to crash.

"It's a question of timing as to when OPEC will increase output. I foresee it happening sooner rather than later," Lewis-Davies said.

He suggested that oil prices could fall as soon as this spring, when warmer weather typically causes the seasonal demand for heating oil to wane.

If prices defy such forecasts and stay firm, oil-importing countries in Latin America and Asia would have the most to lose, analysts said.

Thailand and India already have expressed concern about crude prices and are discussing ways to limit any damages.

Thai politicians are weighing whether to cut taxes on gasoline to help maintain the country's delicate recovery from the Asian financial crisis of 1997.

The Indian government is considering raising tariffs on imported oil in an effort to discourage its use, Lewis-Davies said.

Israel, Palestinians advised to quicken decision-making

By BARRY SCHWEID

Also Wednesday, President Clinton said he was taking on the burden of nudging Syria and Israel along their path to peace, and that neither country is giving up despite the suspension in talks this week.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration acknowledged Wednesday that Israel and the Palestinians might miss a mid-February deadline for concluding the outline of a final settlement of their long dispute.

With Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat due to call at the White House today, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said if Israel and the Palestinians delayed there would be no framework agreement by Feb. 13 or a formal settlement by the fall, as planned.

"It's our view that the parties have some tough decisions to make," he said.

These include whether the Palestinians are to have a state, whether Jerusalem is to be shared by Israel with Arafat and how much more land Israel will turn over to his authority.

Also Wednesday, President Clinton said he was taking on the burden of nudging Syria and Israel along their path to peace, and that neither country is giving up despite the suspension in talks this week.

"Neither side has decided to back away from the peace talks, call an end, call a freeze to them. That's not what's going on," Clinton said.

"They are having a genuine dispute," about which issues to tackle first, "that I'm trying to work through for both of them," Clinton said after a White House speech promoting a health care proposal.

"We're in a little patch here where I've just got a little extra work to do, and I'm going to work at it," he said.

The peace process was on the agenda for a brief Oval Office meeting between Clinton and the crown prince of Bahrain on Wednesday evening, National Security Council spokesman David Leavy said.

Leavy did not provide specifics about the 15-minute session with Sheikh Sulman Bin Hamad Al-Khalifa, except to say the discussion touched on Iran and Iraq.

Bahrain is a key U.S. ally and is the regional base for the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet. It is a an important regional financial center for a number of international banks, oil companies and service companies.

Campaigning in New Hampshire, meanwhile, Republican presidential hopeful George W. Bush said the United States should not impose a Mideast settlement.

"There can be no lasting peace if the Israelis, for whatever reason, feel like they must accept an agreement because it makes us happy," the Texas governor said.

So far, Gaza and 40 percent of the West Bank have been assigned to the Palestinians.

Arafat is claiming the rest of the West Bank and part of Israel's capital as well.

"We believe it's very important to talk to Chairman Arafat about his concerns and his assessment of the Israeli-Palestinian track and the importance of making progress on that track," Rubin said.

The Palestinian leader will have lunch with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright at her home in the Georgetown section of the capital before seeing Clinton at the White House in mid-afternoon.

"Mid-February is rapidly approaching, and it is going to be a formidable challenge to try to solve the problems that need to be solved," Rubin said.

But, he said, "we have not given up hope."

With peacemaking between Israel and Syria indefinitely suspended, the Clinton administration appears to be under added pressure to help produce an accord between Israel and the Palestinians.

Rubin said Albright might go to the Middle East next month, either after winding up talks in Moscow on Feb. 1 or on a separate trip. He also left open the possibility of her going to Damascus for talks with Syrian officials.

In the meantime, Israel and Syria are due to send experts here later in the month to work on a U.S.-drafted document that could be the basis for a treaty.

But the main issues remain unresolved after talks in Washington last month and in Shepherdstown, W.Va., earlier this month.

The issues are how much land Israel will relinquish, terms of peace, new security arrangements along the border with Syria and water resources.

Fort Riley soldiers return from Kosovo after nearly 6 months

story by christie vanover

Around 130 Fort Riley soldiers were welcomed home late Thursday night by Fort Riley's commanding general, fellow soldiers and anxious family members upon returning from Operation Joint Guard in Kosovo.

Members of 568th Engineer Company, 541st Maintenance Battalion, were deployed to Kosovo at the end of July to perform several construction missions.

"We provided all of the horizontal construction support for the task force," Capt. Kevin Damon, commander of the troops, said. "We built a sewage lagoon site for the base camp and an ammunition holding area, which was used to protect the rest of the soldiers just in case of an incident."

One of the unit's toughest challenges was dealing with the environment.

"During the initial push, everything was very dusty," Damon said. "Visibility while working on the vehicles was minimal. When winter came in, rain and snow made earthwork more difficult, but we pushed through it."

Maj. Gen. Freddy McFarren, the commanding general of Fort Riley, greeted the soldiers at the return ceremony.

"The most important thing for each of you soldiers to understand is that you served your country when you were asked to, and you did it extremely well," McFarren said. "That's something that we'll always be proud of."

Another obstacle deployed soldiers faced was separation from their families. Soldiers didn't get to celebrate traditional holidays such as Thanksgiving, Christmas or New Year's Eve with their family members, and Laurel Thomas almost missed her honeymoon.

"We got married on June 18th, and I didn't find out until the day of the wedding whether or not we could go on our honeymoon," she said. "Fortunately, the deployment got bumped back a little later, so we got to spend a little more time together, which was good."

After a leave of absence, soldiers will return to work and conduct local construction improvements.

"I want to thank you, as a unit, for standing up and doing what's right and doing a very important mission," McFarren said. "God bless America."

College education could be less costly

By KEVIN GALVIN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton proposed a $31 billion plan Thursday to make college education more affordable and upbraided Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott for suggesting that no significant legislation would be enacted this election year.

The centerpiece of the proposal was a $10,000 tax deduction to help millions of Americans pay for tuition, books and university fees.

"When we make college more affordable, we make the American dream more achievable," Clinton said.

Joining Clinton for the White House announcement, on the first day of the last year of his presidency, were Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is running for the Senate from New York, and a fellow New York Democrat, Sen. Charles Schumer.

"Some in Congress, I note, are saying that because this is an election year we really shouldn't try to do anything for the American people," President Clinton said. "Nothing, not a national election or a Washington snowstorm, should get in the way of making a college education more affordable for all Americans."

The president was referring to a comment Lott, R-Miss., made to reporters a day earlier. Lott said "everyone needs to acknowledge ... there won't be a lot of time for big, new initiatives" on a shortened congressional calendar this year.

Skeptics question whether the policy proposals Clinton has made before his State of the Union address Jan. 27 can pass the Republican-controlled Congress. But White House officials, seeking to address those 1st big winter wallop for many parts of East

By BOB MILLER
The Associated Press

Winter delivered its first major wallop to parts of the East on Thursday, tangling air and ground traffic, closing scores of schools and dropping blankets of snow on roads that until now had not seen a dusting.

The powerful, blustery storm blew through the eastern half of the nation like a freezing pendulum, swinging down from the upper Midwest, crossing the Appalachians and then scooting up the coast.

The thick, white coating it left behind — ranging from 9 inches that fell in Minnesota on Wednesday to 5 inches in Baltimore by Thursday afternoon — closed schools and caused countless fender-benders.

"The only complaint I have is that people don't know how to drive in it," said Lisa DeCicco of Philadelphia. "It took me two hours to get to work today, and that's really aggravating when there's almost nothing on the ground."

Philadelphia expected up to 4 inches by day's end, but coastal communities to the north braced for near nor'easter conditions, with potential gale-force winds swirling the snow and blurring visibility.

"There'll be some coastal flooding and that sort of thing, but it's not expected to last long enough to become a real nor'easter," Kipp Hogan, National Weather Service meteorologist, said.

Airline passengers throughout the region had to cope with delays and cancellations. At Logan International Airport in Boston, U.S. Airways canceled half its remaining flights after 3 p.m. The airline also warned that some of today's flights could be affected.

The New York City area's three main airports — LaGuardia, Kennedy and Newark — reported up to one-hour delays and some cancellations. Port Authority spokesman Bill Cahill said most were due to bad weather elsewhere.

All of the city's public schools were closed, and the federal government announced that non-essential employees could take a day off instead of trying to make it to the office.

Elsewhere in the mid-Atlantic region, Delaware Gov. Thomas Carper canceled his State of the State address, and schools were closed across Virginia, North Carolina and Maryland.

"It just seems like it's unusual because it's been so warm, so far, for the first part of the winter," meteorologist Andy Pace said of conditions in Maryland. "It's not unusual to have a couple of storms of this magnitude during this part of the winter."

A mass of bitter, arctic air followed the storm from Canada all the way to North Carolina, where the overnight wind chill in Raleigh was expected to drop to 10 degrees below zero.

The storm first brought treacherous driving to the Midwest, where the weather was blamed for three traffic deaths in Iowa and one in Michigan on Wednesday.

It continued to cause problems in the region Thursday. At least two dozen vehicles were involved in a series of accidents on U.S. 41 in Menomonee Falls, Wis., police Sgt. Jim Bramm said. There were no serious injuries, he said.

The relatively mild winter until now has been attributed to a number of factors, including the La Niña phenomenon in which cool water sloshes across the Pacific to replace the warm water that produced El Niño.

Kansas scores low overall academically

By DANICA COTO

A "D."

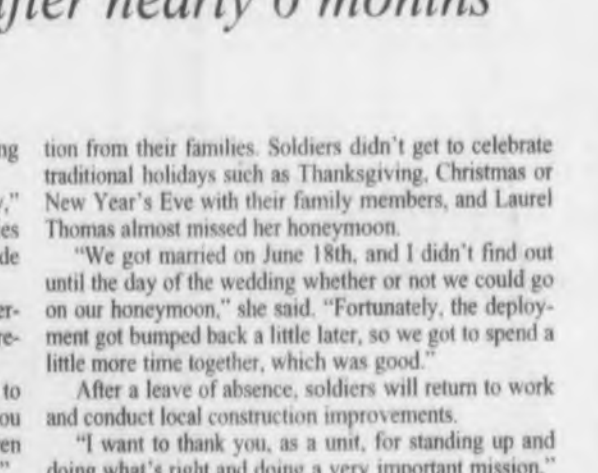
That's the letter grade the state of Kansas received for improving teacher quality in an annual report printed last week in Education Week magazine.

According to the article, the state's grades in that area declined because of changes to grading criteria. The people who prepared this report changed the indicators they use to measure teacher quality, so the grade is not comparative to last year, said Kathy Toelkes, Department of Education public information coordinator.

Some of the indicators used to evaluate teachers were whether teachers went through a clinical experience during their teacher training, how many of them were nationally certified, how many secondary teachers have a degree in the subject they teach and how many taught outside their field of experience.

Kansas' requirements for teachers are in the process of changing because of a seven-year effort to redesign how teachers in the state of Kansas are licensed. Teachers now need to pass basic skills and professional knowledge tests, in addition to completing three years of teaching. If the Kansas school board adopts the plan this spring, then teachers would be required to attend a special program, pass various tests, be assigned a mentor, be observed and create portfolios.

Some said a "D" does not reflect schools in Manhattan accurately.



"The partnership between Kansas State University and the Manhattan school districts is so strong that we produce increased quality teachers," said Principal James Kenworthy of Eisenhower Middle School. "In Manhattan, when you have Kansas State University, my guess is you wouldn't see a grade of 'D' in that area."

Kenworthy said his school has had about 75 to 80 K-State student teachers. This possible is due to an agreement that K-State has with Manhattan's public schools.

Students are required to student-teach for four semesters, and prior to that, become teacher aides or tutors for three semesters. Michael Perl, director of student and professional services for the College of Education, oversees the program.

"K-State is pretty much a leader in professional-development schools," Perl said. "We employ a teacher in a school half-time to work with us to prepare future teachers."

Perl said two things are being done in the state of Kansas to increase the quality of licensed teachers. The first is the redesigning of standards for teachers' licenses, which will be voted on in May. The second effort is giving the Kansas Board of Education a report in April that outlines five outcomes out of 24 recommendations.

These surveys, however, do not affect the curriculum of K-State's College of Education.

"It doesn't evaluate our program. We believe we have a B+ program, if not an A one," Perl said. "We've always gone beyond what's required of the State Board of Education."

The magazine article stated that Kansas teachers still are required to keep their skills up to date either by collaborating with local universities or professional development.

"We're in the process now of adopting new teacher licenses," Toelkes said. "The report looks favorably upon these. The issues are being addressed."

TAKE note

Wal-Mart. K-State announced Thursday it received a $7 million equipment grant from a Wal-Mart/NCR program .

The grant includes an NCR 5100 massively parallel processor with 11.7 terabytes of disk storage. One terabyte is equal to about 250 million pages of text. The system, which is to be located in Nichols Hall, is larger than most similar ones used by several large corporations and worldwide.

Randall Mott, chief information officer of Wal-Mart Stores Inc., said in a press release the equipment grant was established to help create more qualified entrants to the information technology job market.

He also said the grant follows the idea that technological problems of the future can be solved by universities and corporations working together.

Part of the reason K-State was selected for the grant was its extensive course offerings in database and related areas, said Tony Fano, senior vice president of the Retail Solutions at NCR, in a press release. — Brandi Hertig

Man charged with shooting of 31-year-old KC woman

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A man has been charged with first-degree murder in the shooting death of a woman, and a police secretary also was charged for allegedly lying about the man's whereabouts.

Marcus B. Washington, 21, was being held on $200,000 bond after he was charged Wednesday in the death of Stacy Quinn, 31.

Police found 19 spent .40 caliber shells near her body when it was discovered early Sunday.

The woman was shot after an apparent argument with a man in a car. She got out of the car and was shot by the man, who fled on foot.

Investigators determined the car belonged to Nina Betts, 22, a secretary in the Police Department Detective Bureau.

Betts allegedly lied when investigators asked her if she knew where Washington was. Washington later was found in Betts' apartment.

Students to visit ski slopes in Missouri through UPC trip

On Saturday, students will be testing the slopes of Snow Creek Ski and Snowboard Area in Weston, Mo., said Aaron Sefton, Outdoor Adventure committee chair for the Union Program Council.

"It is not Colorado, but it is a good place to learn," Sefton said. "You don't have to drive the 10 or 12 hours it takes to get to Colorado."

Sefton said the trip will cost students $50.

"We take all the costs into consideration like accommodations, lift tickets and rentals, then we subsidize the amount and divide it by however many people are going on the trip," Sefton said.

The group will be camping at a site close to the mountain for the night, Sefton said.

"It was an obstacle when attracting people to the trip, but I think it will be an exciting experience to learn how to camp in the cold," Sefton said.

The group will return Sunday.

"I think the skiing will be pretty good because a cold front is moving in, and we may get real snow," Sefton said.

Girl Scout cookies for sale; money to benefit local troop

Girl Scout cookies are on sale.

Cookies sell for $3 a box, and for every box sold, troops receive $2. Packages of Thin Mints, Caramel deLites and Peanut Butter Sandwiches raise money for girls' future funding in scouts.

The money received from sales goes toward camping trips, group activities, service projects and other programs.

Residence halls do not allow door-to-door solicitation. Cookies can be purchased by calling any troop leader or the council office. — Lynne Hermansen

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There were two errors in Thursday's Collegian. The T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter photos were taken by Ivan Kozar. There also was an error in the men's basketball box score. The score was K-State 61, Iowa State 72.

There were two errors in Wednesday's Collegian. The K-State football team has 11 non-binding oral player commitments for the 2000 season. DeMarcus Faggins goes to Navarro College in Texas.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

LUCK OF THE DRAW

Poker chips determine students' place in society

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Angie Benson called for all triangles to revolt last night while participating in the interactive game "Keep Your Eyes on the Prize."

The game in Derby Dining Center was part of the weeklong tribute to Martin Luther King Jr. Benson, junior in management, was placed into the group of lower-class triangles by luck of the draw.

Benson, like all other participants, blindly picked five different poker chips out of a bag. Each colored chip represented a different amount of points.

Players then were allowed a short time to trade their chips with other participants, who were not able to see what chips they held in their hands.

After the trading came to a halt, the players were placed in different groups based on their amount of points. The people with the most points were placed in to the square group, the people with a mid range of points were placed in the circle group and people with the fewest points were designated to the triangle group.

"Each group represents a different social economic status," said Georgett Johnson, sophomore in family life and community service. "The squares are the rich and upper class, the circles are the middle class and the triangles are the lower class."

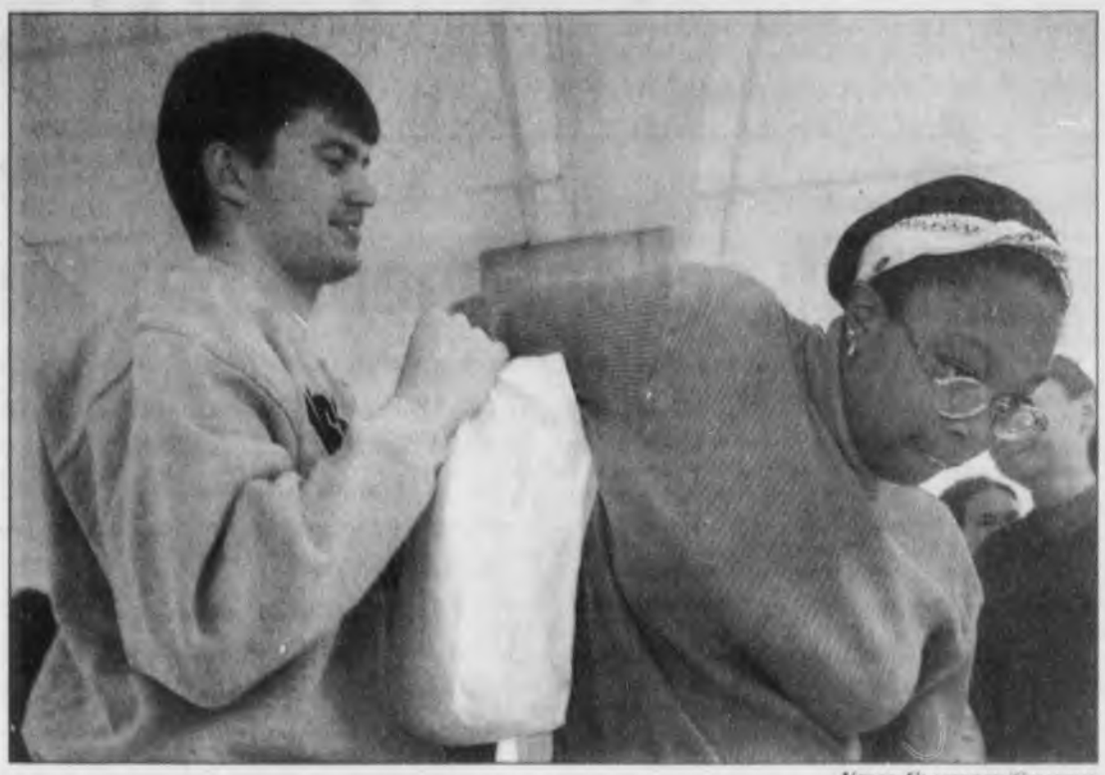
While some were lucky enough to land themselves a position amongst the wealthy upper class, most were not.

Benson was one of these.

The participants were placed in their various groups and treated accordingly. The rich received refreshments such as chips, soda and candy while sitting in plush cushioned chairs. The poor, on the other hand, received only soda, while sitting on the floor.



"It's meant to make people understand economical status," said Erica Pearson, multicultural assistant of Moore Hall. "Everyone may seem like they have the same advantage in the beginning, but at the end they don't because the chips start to stack up against each other."

She said many people end up in a certain economic statuses they find hard to get out of.

Just as in life, some people were given the chance to move up to a higher class. They had two more trading sessions, and in between each one, the groups were given several chips to distribute.

They could give them to certain players so they could advance to a higher group, or give them to the poorest, who would not advance.

"After you've been in one place for so long, you just become content," Johnson said. "Sometimes you want to move a person up so they can look back and try to pull you up. It's sort of a network of connections."

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

Arequay Graves, freshman in accounting, picks coins out of a bag for "Keep Your Eyes on the Prize" in Derby Dining Center on Thursday evening as part of Martin Luther King Jr. Week. Students took part in a demonstration of moving up the socioeconomic ladder.

Between trading sessions, the groups watched clips from the documentary film "Keep Your Eyes on the Prize," which profiled a young boy who was battered and murdered because of his race.

Johnson said she thought the game helped people think about different socioeconomic statuses.

"People don't really think about socioeconomic statuses unless they are put into them," Johnson said. "The just of the game is realizing how you can move into and out of different statuses."

Pearson said the game was to demonstrate how different factors, such as economic and racial status, can determine whether one is a square or a triangle.

"There are a lot of things in your life that can contribute to where you'll end up," Pearson said. "That's what we're trying to demonstrate."

Help available for transfer students

BY COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who transfer to K-State from community colleges or other four-year universities have resources available that could make the transition easier.

"There are transfer visit days that take place in the fall and spring semesters," Lawrence Moeder, director of admissions, said.

Moeder said there is a day in the spring set aside for transfer students to enroll.

"There is an opportunity for students to enroll on transfer-student day, and there is a special day for them in May," Moeder said.

The needs of transfer students are different than those of incoming freshman because they have already been in college a year, Moeder said. An orientation day set aside just for transfer students is designed to meet those needs.

"By having a special day set aside for them, it makes it easier," Moeder said.

The admissions process for transfer students is different than that of first-year freshmen, Moeder said.

"Currently, a transfer student must have a 2.0 GPA to be admissible to the university," Moeder said.

He said that just because a student is from Kansas no longer guarantees them admission when they transfer to K-State.

He also said transfer students do not need an ACT score to be admitted, but it is recommended.

"We would love to have it because it is used in advising, but is not needed for transfer students," Moeder said.

Students transferring from a four-year university sometimes find the transition easier than students transferring from a community college.

Lisa Luhman, junior in secondary education, said she found the transition easier because she came from a four-year university that demanded students be more independent.

"It probably helped I had transferred from a four-year school," Luhman said.

She said she did not participate in the orientation and enrollment days because she was independent enough to be able to get around campus on her own.

An alumni group of Phi Theta Kappa, which is an honor society at community colleges, gave a presentation in the fall to new transfer students, Moeder said.

Michelle Haupt, assistant director of admissions and Phi Theta Kappa adviser, participated in the seminar.

"Phi Theta Kappa is an honor society at the two-year colleges, and the group at K-State is an alumni chapter," Haupt said.

Haupt said they had a panel discussion, distributed hand-outs and answered any question transfer student had about K-State.

Transportation program proposed in Senate

■ Student body president presents 3-bus alternative to help parking situation.

BY JENNIFER GIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body President Jason Heinrich opened Senate's first meeting of the year with the Senate's plans for the upcoming semester.

Heinrich and others brought forth a transportation proposal to be approved by the Senate. The proposal was not the first to be brought up in council.

Heinrich said nine alternatives had been examined.

"All of those proposals are very extensive, and we chose this one because we can begin with small steps," Heinrich said.

The proposal would start with three buses, each costing $90,000. The buses would pick up students from different areas in Manhattan. Students who want to ride a bus would have to purchase a $120 permit. The areas in which the buses would picked students would be on a trial basis at first.

"If we don't like the route, then we'll do another route," Heinrich said.

Senate will vote on the proposal at the next Senate meeting. If the transportation bill passes, it will be sent to the city-university program committee.

In other business, the Black Student Union requested money from Student Senate to schedule events for Black History Month in February. Members of BSU told senators that plans for February would include guest speaker Sister Soldier, a game show, and soul food and poetry nights.

Dustin Petrick, Senate operations chair, said he was concerned with the $6,000 BSU would use for the guest speaker.

"Usually we keep guest speakers at $2,500," Business Sen. Erica Guries said.

The BSU allocation bill was sent back to committee.

Senate also sent to committee a bill that would extend the reimbursement schedule for dropping classes. Students now have one week to drop their classes and receive full refund. Students then have a week of 90-percent refunds and an additional week of 50-percent refunds.

High school should pay for Powercat logo use

A king-sized candy bar.

Almost anything from Taco Bell.

Ten minutes of long distance, at a dime a minute.

One hundred and twenty of anything, at a dime a dozen.

Rights to use the K-State Powercat logo.

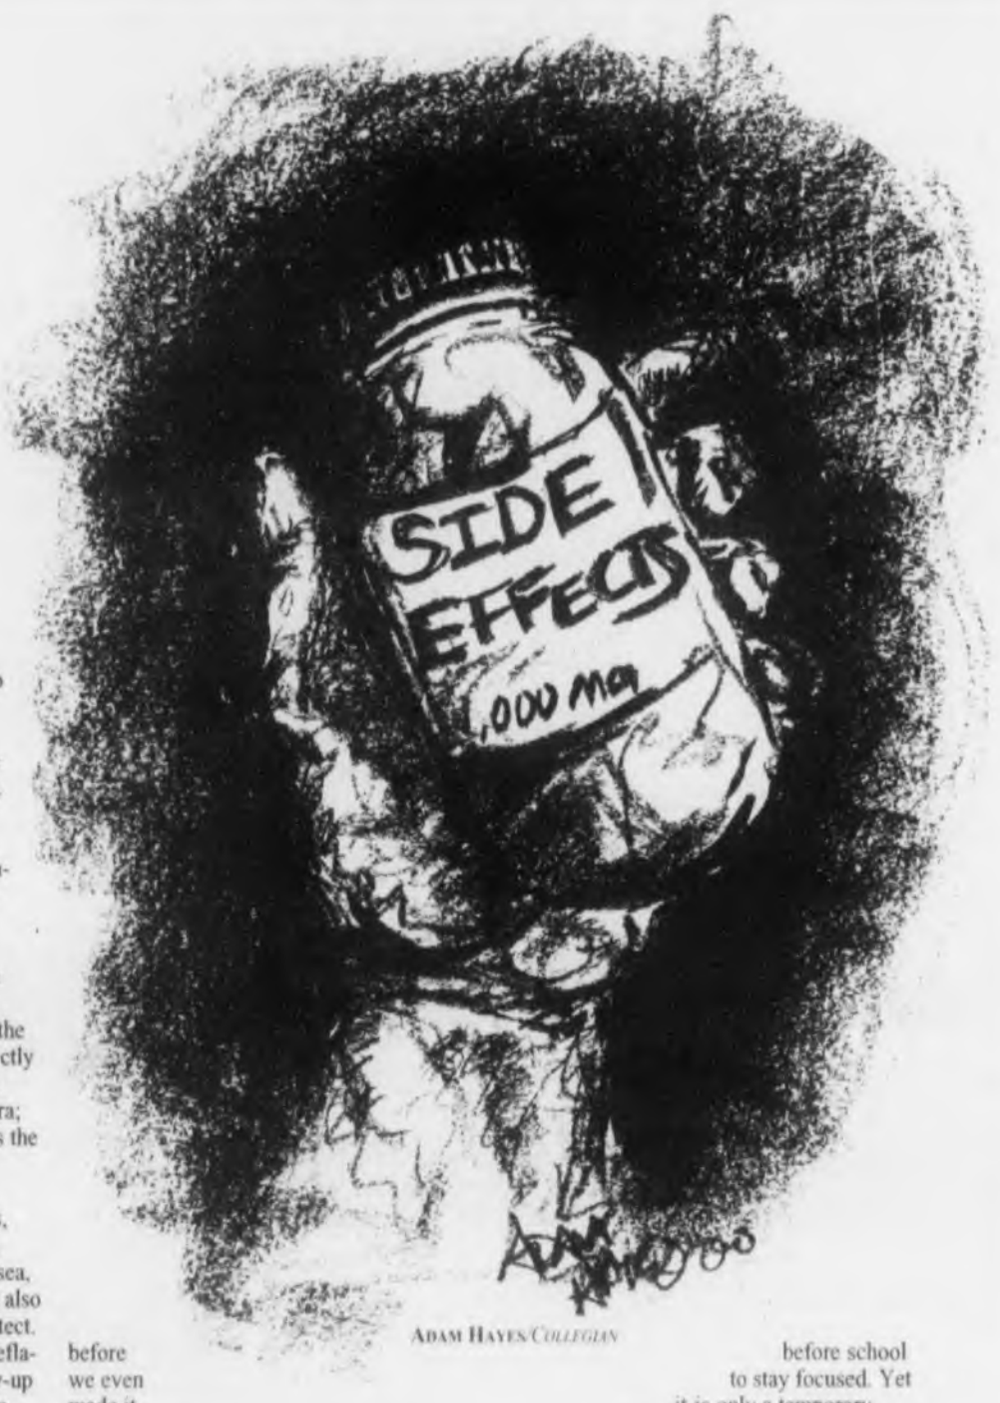
All of these things can be purchased for only $1.

Although the cost to use the Powercat logo is minimal, Flower Mound High School in Flower Mound, Texas, chose to alter its amazingly Powercat-like Jaguar logo rather than fork over the cash. The school's logic seems to be more than a little bit skewed.

The school has decided it would be a better deal for it to change logos than pay the "astronomical" cost demanded by K-State. The school's principal has said its logo looks much different from the Powercat and, therefore, should not warrant the licensing fee.

Flower Mound is completely missing the boat. Using a logo similar to — or simply conjuring up distant images of — the Powercat is a privilege the school should be happy to have.

It should cowboy up and pay the dollar.



Instead, the school will search for a logo completely different from the Powercat-esque Jaguar. While it is true that high schools do not have access to the same funding colleges do, surely finding material sporting their new logo will be a more costly endeavor than paying the licensing fee.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

If Flower Mound is still reluctant to pay the fee, the Collegian Editorial Board makes this pledge: We will all make a sacrifice. We will pool our funds to cover the whopping cost ourselves.

Popular miracle drugs are temporary fixes, often come with unwelcome side effects

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

Do you want to lose weight and control of your bodily functions? Then Xenical is the drug for you.

Perhaps you have seen the commercials for this amazing fat-blocking pill. According to their advertisements, Xenical is "an oral prescription weight-loss medication used to help obese people lose weight and keep it off."

Even though the advertisement states that the pill needs to be taken with a reduced-calorie diet — with no mention of exercise — most want the magic to come from just taking the medicine.

Not only would people who take Xenical lose weight, they also would run the risk of losing control of themselves.

The most common side effects are oily spotting, gas with discharge, urgent need to go to the bathroom, oily or fatty stools, an oily discharge, increased number of bowel movements, and drum roll please, an inability to control bowel movements.

I guess that rules out the white thong or pastel speedo on your new, trim body.

Is being thin — not necessarily healthy — that important that people literally would be willing to mess their pants at any given moment?

"Geez, Susie, you're looking great. You've lost a lot of weight. And the way you crapped your pants last night ... well, let's just say that I haven't been able to get you off my mind since then."

Or what if you have anxiety? Do you experience excessive worrying? Have no fear, BuSpar is here.

BuSpar can get a handle on you if you're experiencing restlessness, muscle tension, sleeping problems or irritability.

You wouldn't have to worry about anything, except possible side effects. These include excitement, dizziness, nausea, headache, lightheadedness and nervousness.

I guess if you pass out, vomit or get headaches, at least you will feel carefree about it.

Another grand invention, perhaps in the typical guy's eyes, is silicone. The Perfectly Natural anatomical breast implants have come to the rescue. Forget the Wonderbra; this is a saline-filled implant that reflects the shape of a natural breast.

Women who have this done are at a slightly increased risk of getting arthritis, having unusual hair loss, loss of energy, rash, memory problems, headaches, nausea, vomiting or irritable bowel syndrome. It also makes breast cancer more difficult to detect.

Another possible side effect is that deflation can occur. Can we say, human blow-up doll? One word: Kleenex. The worst side effect for that would be embarrassment.

Do you have social anxiety? While most college students look to alcohol to aid them in this department, there is also Paxil.

Some possible side effects are dry mouth, sweating, nausea, constipation, sexual side effects in men and women, yawn, tremor or sleepiness.

"Man, we finally got Bill out of the house. Too bad he threw up and fell asleep before we even made it into the bar."

These are humorous examples of problems, but there is also a point that many overlook.

We want a quick fix — nothing that involves patience — just payments.

Take, for instance, Ritalin. This is used to calm hyperactive children who suffer from attention deficit disorder.

Thousands of children take this sedative before school to stay focused. Yet it is only a temporary solution to an overall ignored problem.

The bottom line is that when you hastily solve a problem, you are only granted side effects.

Martin Luther King week has different meanings for everyone, can be celebrated many ways

TRAVIS WEIGEL

As yet another week-long tribute to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. comes to an end, it is important that we all take some time to reflect upon what this week of celebration actually means. We need to step back and ask ourselves, are we simply celebrating the man or are we celebrating the movement?

For many of us, this holiday is a way to honor and recognize one of the world's greatest civil rights activists. However, like many other great men and women, King would have never attained such a high stature without standing on the shoulders of his predecessors. Fortunately for King, his predecessors included the likes of Harriet Tubman, Susan B. Anthony and other suffragists, Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln, just to name a few.

Despite this, only King is recognized for his work in the civil rights movement. With all the pomp and circumstance surrounding his name, you would think he invented the entire movement. Unbelievably, we — as a society — idly sit by and let one man take all the credit for a philosophy and legacy that was first introduced more than 200 years ago with the founding of our great nation.

To others, MLK Day is nothing more than a celebration of the black civil rights movement. After all, the holiday is named for an black civil rights leader and is celebrated only two weeks before Black History Month. This view might be a little narrow-minded and based on rather poor assumptions, but it does recognize everyone for their role and involvement in helping the movement to progress forward.

This view usually focuses on the fact that blacks were once slaves. However, many people feel little to no connection with this event, since they were not directly affected by, nor responsible for, the slavery that occurred more than a century ago.

Although these are overwhelmingly popular views, others still see MLK Day as a celebration of the civil rights movement in general. These people recognize that the civil rights movement encompasses far more than just race and ethnicity. It includes everything from censorship and flag burning to property rights and the freedom of religion. In short, they believe everyone should have equal and fair access to all of the rights guaranteed to U.S. citizens by the acts of Congress, the Constitution and its amendments.

Originally, MLK Day was meant to celebrate diversity and the civil rights of everyone, but it has become overwhelmed with thoughts of King and the black civil rights movement. By having it named after King, a single individual, it is as though we are saying that, without him, the civil rights movement would have never occurred, which is anything but true. The truth is that the civil rights movement has been around since the dawning of time and is far greater than any one man.

As the leading country in the world's civil rights movement, we should not have a holiday that is overly biased toward any one man or group. Rather, it should be something that is universal and inclusive of everyone. King is undeniably one of the greatest men ever to walk the face of the earth, but he does not deserve to be deified at the expense of the movement we are supposed to be celebrating. So instead of recognizing one man, this holiday should reflect what it is celebrating — the civil rights and liberties of everyone.

By calling it Civil Rights Awareness Day, or something similar, we would be able to celebrate openly and freely what we have accomplished and where we are going.

Closed-minded individuals to blame, not republicans

Editor,

In a journalistic endeavor the editors of Seventeen would be ashamed of, David Levin discussed the prejudice and racism rampant in conservatism. In fact, had carbon copies of this sentiment not appeared in papers and magazines nationwide on a weekly basis up to this point, there might have been something redeeming about his article.

Why is it that those who proclaim themselves the harbingers of open-mindedness are so often the most ignorant? Levin proved himself to be more prejudiced in his half-page column than most Republicans could ever dream.

Indeed, Levin picked an easy target. With the state of the media at the current time, it's more socially acceptable to be a murderer who was abused as a child (but only if they blame it on Sunday morning cartoons) than a Republican. The Collegian and several other papers propagate this sentiment with columns such as this one. The difference is, this time Levin showed his intolerance and ignorance clearly.

Levin named three senators and two governors who have loose associations with racist activity. Loose is exactly what some of these are; Bush's pandering is a facet of modern elections and pales in comparison to Clinton's, and the others' cases can also be argued. Either way, he came up with five Republicans who might be in some way prejudiced. The conclusion? Republicans are racist.

Members of Rage Against the Machine endorse socialism. Do the feelings of Zack, Tim, Brad and Tom mean Democrats as a whole are revolutionary, violent and fans of hard guitar riffs? Levin dons a Jerry Garcia-like haircut. Does this mean all Democrats are stoners writing prejudiced columns to waste time until the next Phish concert? Several members of Clinton's Democratic council were involved in getting FBI files on Republican high-ups. Does this mean Democrats as a whole are rampant violators of privacy rights? Ted Kennedy drinks and womanizes enough for any five guys. Does this mean all Democrats are beer-swilling adulterers? The answer, of course, is no. Why does Levin feel the standard of ignorant association applies only to the right wing?

Racism is a serious problem. Unfortunately, some of the idiots who shout racist sentiments the loudest happen to call themselves conservatives. As a result, Republicans receive a bad name. That considered, what is racism if not a thoughtless ignorant stereotype, taking bad characteristics of one or two bad eggs and using them to label a larger group?

If this is the case, what does the huge and showy "Republican Racism" headline in the center of the Opinion page indicate? It indicates that a writer took the characteristics of a few bad eggs and used them to label a large group. The foundation of prejudice is a stereotype, and the foundation of a stereotype is ignorance. America's biggest problem is not Republicans but closed-mindedness, and columnists such as Levin breed this.

To end, consider the following. Republicans often are slammed for not apologizing for past actions. If history then is prevalent in determining party character, let's go back a little further than Helms. The battles of Gettysburg and Shiloh were ordered and fought by a North led and populated by Republican Abraham Lincoln and a South led and populated by Democrat Jefferson Davis.

CHANGES

Alumni Association again alters designs for proposed center; increased funds still necessary

BY JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

SOURCE: KSU ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

The projected starting date for the construction of K-State's new alumni center is still months away, but plans for the facility and a non-related project surrounding the building site south of Memorial Stadium continue to evolve.

The biggest change made in the facility's design is the location of the center's parking lot, said Karen Shafer, director of communications for the KSU Alumni Association. Shafer said the lot would be moved from the front of the facility to the back due to extra space granted by the university.

"It will look a lot better now and we'll be able to spill out to the front (of the lawn) for events," she said, adding that the size of the parking lot also would increase with its relocation.

Funding for the center has increased from its original estimate of $7 million. Shafer said the funding needed, which will come from private donations and will be used for site development and landscape costs, now is estimated at $10 million. Despite the change in funding and refinement of the center's design, Shafer said the projected date of fall 2000 to start construction remains the same.

"We're still on schedule for that," she said. "There really isn't much new to the design. The main changes are with the site."

Changes are also in order for areas surrounding the new alumni center. Diane Hinrichs, faculty adviser for the KSU Foundation, said the organization is planning to build a Senior Sidewalk that would begin at the corner of 17th Street and Anderson Avenue. The sidewalk, which would not be built in conjunction with the center, would offer graduates the chance to leave their mark, on K-State with a $50 brick-shaped granite block that would include their name and the initials of their college.

"This is kind of a senior class gift," Hinrichs said. "This concept kind of went away back in the '80s. We're trying to revive this by doing something unique, so we created a Senior Sidewalk."

Hinrichs said the sidewalk would began with the December 1999 graduating class and would be placed in August. The project would move north down 17th Street and eventually would reach the main campus sidewalk that extends to Waters Hall — though Hinrichs said that, according to architects' estimates, this probably would not happen for more than 100 years.

Although construction on the alumni center will not begin on the site south of Memorial Stadium until the fall semester, the club sports that used the open field for practice in the past already have relocated.

Kevin Koelsch, senior in architectural engineering and member of the K-State lacrosse team, said the team relocated to an open area near Manhattan Town Center last semester, but will continue to use Memorial Stadium's field for future games.

"We haven't been able to practice there for a while," he said. "The only inconvenience has been the driving, because we have a bigger area to practice on now."

Professor questions dismissal from KU for research reasons

■ Scholar visited K-State in September for debate regarding God's existence.

BY TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fred Whitehead, who argued against the existence of God in the Sept. 2, 1999, debate "Does God Exist?" in McCain Auditorium against William Craig of Talbot School of Theology at Biola University, will be dismissed from the University of Kansas Medical School after 21 years of service.

Whitehead, associate professor of family medicine at KU Medical School, was advised by executive dean Dr. Deborah Powell in a letter of the termination of his appointment. He was told his departure was in deficit status and his research did not fit the mission of the KU Medical School.

"I was utterly astonished," Whitehead said. "I have never discussed my research with her in the past."

There probably is no connection with the "Does God Exist?" debate, he said.

Many other faculty members were in vulnerable positions like himself, Whitehead said. He has no tenure, and his position is secured on an annual contract.

Whitehead said other faculty members were harassed by the dean. She urged them to retire when they did not want to, he said.

Powell said she was unable to discuss the issue because Whitehead is a faculty member.

Dr. Robert Trueworthy, chairman of the Faculty Council of the KU Medical School, said Whitehead was promoted last year from assistant to associate professor.

His research concerns mostly the humanities and the history of the medical field, not science, he said.

"He doesn't have a medical degree," Trueworthy said. "But he has made many contributions in the past."

Whitehead's contract is an annual agreement, he said. In this case, he simply was not reappointed. Trueworthy said there is a difference between dismissal for cause and non-reappointment.

"There was no cause for dismissal, as far as I can tell," Trueworthy said. "We reviewed the handbook, and all the rules for dismissal have been followed so far."

Whitehead said he plans to appeal the dismissal on the grounds of no due process, bogus reasons and the violation of academic freedom.

He also has spoken with state legislators about the matter. His dismissal is effective June 30. Thus far, he has not gained much support from the faculty, he said.

"I certainly support his appeal," Trueworthy said. "But I am in no position to evaluate him."

Attila Zsivoczky, senior in marketing and international business from Hungary, has qualified to represent his country in the 2000 Olympic Games this summer in Sydney, Australia.

Zsivoczky makes Olympic team; men's track squad rebuilds

Attila Zsivoczky has left the K-State track and field team to pursue his Olympic career.

Zsivoczky was a leading athlete for the team, and he was in a league of his own, K-State head track coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Rovelto said Zsivoczky's situation was similar to a basketball player who decides to leave without using all of his eligibility. Zsivoczky already had graduated, and it was in his best interest to make this decision, Rovelto said.

"Would we love to have him? Sure, but it is in the best interest of Attila, and in his heart, he did the right thing," Rovelto said. "It is no more surprising than when a basketball player leaves early. You know when you recruit those players as freshmen that they are likely to leave early, you just don't know when.

"At his age, he was the best guy in the world the last four years," Rovelto said.

Without the services of Zsivoczky, Rovelto said the men's track team looks to rebuild.

"We are just trying to build back up," Rovelto said.

The team, Rovelto said, will continue rebuilding in the Iowa State Open on Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

K-State also will have athletes competing in Wildcat Heptathlon/Decathlon in Manhattan. Heptathletes and decathletes compete in a variety of events that cross the track and field landscape.

"These athletes are certainly well-rounded, and the reality is a very good heptathlete is a good athlete," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said while the competition for this meet will be better than last week's competition — a meet in which both teams fared extremely well — some athletes still are working to break off some of the winter-break rust. He also said the better times will come later in the season.

"By the end of February for the most part we need to have everyone trained well and in a position that they can do a good job," Rovelto said.

K-State's women's team looks strong, Rovelto said.

"The women's side is very strong, and there is no denying that when you look at the team," Rovelto said. "They should be really good."

Wildcats look to end streak with victory over Colorado

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After falling to Iowa State 72-61 Wednesday night, the Wildcats will travel to Boulder, Colo., Saturday in the hopes of snapping a three-game conference losing streak.

K-State (8-7 overall, 1-3 Big 12) has fallen into a four-way tie for seventh place in the conference after losses to the Cyclones, Tigers and Jayhawks.

The Buffaloes (10-6, 1-3) broke a three-game skid of their own with a 88-80 victory over No. 17 Oklahoma on Wednesday night.

"They're a team that is capable of scoring a lot of points, so I would characterize them as more of an up-tempo team," K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said.

Colorado's offense is led by senior point guard Jaquay Walls, who scored 28 points and dished out eight assists in the Buffaloes' win over the Sooners. Walls is averaging 15.6 points per game this season.

"We're going to have to contain his dribble penetration," Fox said. "If we can do that, we give ourselves a good chance of getting a win."

The Buffs will have to be wary of the Wildcats outside game, with guards Galen Morrison and Cortez Groves combining for nine three-pointers against the Cyclones.

"That takes some heat off," Fox said. "We shot the three pretty well (against Iowa State), but in this league, you've got to have everything clicking — your defense, your three-point shot and your inside game. If you don't have all three working, you're going to get beat, more than likely."

Fox said the Cats will need to work on their defense after a less-than-stellar performance Wednesday night.

"They tend to shoot the ball very well at home — they're a good offensive team," he said. "Iowa State's the first team to shoot 50 percent on us in two years, so we're going to have to address our defense right now."

K-State's Tony Kitt (back) tries to get the ball away from Colorado's Aki Thomas (left) and Tyron Manlove (right) in last year's game at Bramlage Coliseum.

Inside, the Wildcat front court will battle with returning starters Jamahl Mosely and Will Smith. Mosely is averaging 11.8 points and 6.8 boards per game for the Buffaloes.

Colorado also possesses a 6-foot-1-inch freshman out of Denver, Richard Fox. Fox has made his presence known early, scoring 8.9 points and grabbing 7.6 rebounds per contest.

"He's a big kid with good hands, but he's still a freshman," Mark Fox said. "I think he's talented, but I think he's not as big of a threat as the guys on the perimeter."

K-State leads the overall series with Colorado, 84-33. However, in Boulder the series is notched at 26 wins apiece.

"For some reason, it's been difficult for a lot of people to go there and win — especially this year — but I can't pinpoint a difference," Mark Fox said.

Tip-off is set for 4 p.m. CST at the Coors Event Center.

Women's team needs win to stay in conference race

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two teams fighting to keep the top of the conference standings in sight will battle it out 7:30 p.m. Saturday in the Hearnes Center in Columbia.

The K-State women's basketball team (9-9, 2-3) will face a Missouri (11-4, 1-3) squad that has struggled recently, losing two blowouts to Nebraska and Texas on the road, but the Tigers will be licking their chops, waiting for the Cats in Columbia, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

The Cats also will be in need of a win after losing a 51-47 heartbreaker to Texas Tech last Tuesday.

"Missouri is coming off of two road games which were losses," Patterson said. "They're going to be determined, focused to get a victory. They will be grouchy, mean and ticked off, but they're going to run into an opponent who feels the same way."

K-State must be careful not to dwell on the Texas Tech loss too much. Patterson said this season's previous losses to ranked teams have carried over.

"I think we've addressed the fact that after previous losses to ranked teams, we've really let that affect us the next time out," Patterson said. "But this time in the locker room, we have a different feeling. I think we have a handle on how to take this disappointment."

In order to win Saturday, the Cats will need to get more production out of their post players. Senior forwards Angie Finkes and Nicky Ramage struggled to find their touch against Texas Tech's athletic, shot-blocking post players. Finkes only could manage six points, and Ramage scored nine of her 13 points in a seven-minute span.

"They had a huge vertical and liked to block shots," Ramage said. "You just can't shoot over stuff like that."

The Cats will face a similar inside presence against Missouri. The Tigers feature 6-1 senior forward Amanda Lassiter, whose average of three blocks per game leads the Big 12 Conference. Lassiter also has posed problems for opposing defenses, averaging 17 points a game in Big 12 play.

An area in which K-State should have an edge over Missouri is the three-point shooting department. Missouri is 11th in the conference in defending the perimeter, and the Cats have two of the top-three three-point shooters in the conference. Junior guard Kim Woodlee, after making her 176th trey, actually tied the K-State record for three-pointers made.

Even more pleasing for the Cats, sophomore guard Kristin Rethman, who normally has been a standstill three-point shooter, had success driving the lane against Texas Tech.

"Kristin had a very attack-minded demeanor tonight," Patterson said. "I hope that's something she continues to build on. It will make us a better ball club."

Tennis team seeks revival in coming year

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If success is based on expectations, then the K-State women's tennis team should have an extraordinary year.

"Our players made a lot of progress this fall in terms of work ethic and teamwork," head coach Steve Bietau said. "I think we can expect some good things this spring."

With six of his seven letter-winners returning from a year ago, Bietau said he is confident that this season will be nothing less than an improvement.

The Cats open spring 2000 play at 2 p.m. today in Tucson, Ariz. K-State will take on San Diego, the first of three matches on the courts of the University of Arizona.

San Diego is No. 29 in the Intercollegiate Tennis Association rankings, and features Zuzana Lensenarova and Katarina Valykova, the No. 1 and No. 3 players in the nation, respectively. The duo also ranks No. 2 as a doubles squad.

K-State then will face New Mexico on Saturday at 1 p.m. and battle Arizona at noon Sunday to round out weekend competition.

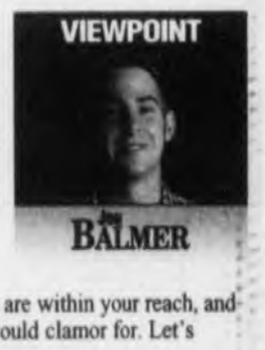
Bietau, in his 16th year at the Wildcat helm, sees the trip to Arizona as a worthwhile way to debut the spring season.

"This will be a good opportunity to find out where we are," he said. "The competition won't get much tougher than this the rest of the year. We have a lot of unknowns right now as far as our lineup any of the three days.

"This group of players has matured and improved. It is my hope that they handle this competitive situation in a good way. We're very excited to get the season underway."

Leading the Wildcats will be junior co-captains Anna Pampoulova (Sofia, Bulgaria) and Eva Novotna' (Pardubice, Czech Republic).

"Both these young women understand the hard work necessary to be successful, and I'm proud to work with them as captains in our program," Bietau said. "Over the past two years, they've developed strong leadership skills and I'm confident they'll help direct our team in a positive way."



Pampoulova was named to the Big 12 All-Conference team last spring after recording a team-high 15 victories. Novotna', an Academic All-Big 12 pick, notched 12 wins

Letter asks Jordan to remember fans

Dear Mr. Jordan,

I realize you're pretty busy right now trying to figure out just what "president of basketball operations" truly entails, but perhaps you'll stumble across this letter in between rap sessions with Spike Lee over an upcoming film titled "The Wiz 2000" and deciding how to incorporate inconspicuously a giant swoosh into the MCI Center hardwood floor.

Mike, I come to you as a simple basketball fan with a few simple requests. No, I don't want the light shed on exactly what kind of barber possesses the tools and slanted view of reality needed to craft Detlef Schremph's hair. No man but the sculptor and Detlef are privy to that chunk of insight. Instead, I ask only for a few things that are within your reach, and that I believe all NBA fans would clamor for. Let's begin.

First, let's start with something I'm sure you're eager to change: Washington's name and mascot. I'm a fan of the old school, and hearing the moniker "Washington Bullets" once again would be sweeter than any Marvin Gaye love ballad. It evokes a certain image in my head of Wes Unseld battling his Afro more than any defender, and 7-foot-6-inch Gheorghe Muresan battling that persistent nemesis, gravity. Reverting back to your franchises past won't be as bad as you think: Look at the popularity of the "retro" New York Jets.

OK, the name was changed because people felt it reflected the violent nature of life in Washington, D.C., but until unjust titles like the Utah Jazz and Los Angeles Lakers are corrected, I say take your complaints elsewhere.

Even if a name change doesn't come about, can you please redesign Walter the Wizard, or whatever the heck that pointy sorcerer's name is? Perhaps Washington officials forgot the first commandment of the NBA: Thou shalt not create a mascot with no commercial appeal. Since when has surrealism been the chic mascot style? Just seeing that disproportional magician prancing about Mitch Richmond's jersey makes me long for the Bullets' patriotic beachwear uniforms of the '80s. Not exactly eye candy for the masses.

There's more to be done than just patch up your team's image, though. You're only one man, I realize, but the power you possess to cast about change through the entire NBA is real and desperately needed. Let me break it down for you:

With selfish players bent on escaping a franchise that dared to draft their upper-level talent (Can you hear me in Houston, Steve?), their dilemma could be solved in an easy and cost-effective manner: If they beat Mr. Jordan in a game of one-on-one, their demands will be met. No stubborn holdouts or silly contract disputes. Just a chance for players to earn their way out of town.

Then there is the issue of Marv Albert, and the solution is easy: Get rid of him. I realize he's the narrator of one of your finest highlights (the "Oh-a-spectacular-move-by-Michael-Jordan" layup against the Lakers in the 1991 NBA Finals clip), but there are enough women-beaters in the league now as it is. We don't need any women-biters adding to the mix.

Bridal Show to offer prizes, planning advice

BY AMY CUNNINGHAM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Prospective brides and grooms have a chance to subtract $1,000 from the cost of their wedding.

The 29th annual Manhattan Bridal Show will begin at 11 a.m. Sunday at Houston Street Ballroom. Those in attendance can register for a chance to win several prizes, including a top prize of $1,000 of Bridal Fair Bucks to be used at most of the participating vendors.

According to Dave Lewis, president of the Manhattan Bridal Corporation, an organization of local businesses who organized the event, the bridal show will feature 23 of the area's wedding vendors.

"One of the things about this corporation is that it is an elite group. Members vote on new businesses coming in," Lewis said. "We feel that these are some of the best businesses that Manhattan has to offer."

The bridal show, touted as "A One Stop Source for All Your Needs," will feature an hour-long fashion show at 2:30 p.m. presented by Schoen's Bridal World of Downs, Kan.

Alan Parker, owner and manager of Borck Brothers Fine Menswear, said the reason to attend the bridal show is simple.

"If you are a bride, you will see every aspect there is in one spot. The Manhattan Bridal Show will offer the broadest selection without duplicating," Parker said. "Brides can register for a mailing list so that they can be informed about our products."

Some of the vendors, such as Janice Hill, owner of Vern's Cakes, stressed the value of the event to college brides.

"If you are a bride, you will see every aspect there is in one spot."

— Alan Parker, Borck Brothers Fine Menswear

"This offers us the chance to help someone with their wedding, especially when someone is away from home at college," Hill said. "We try to help them answer questions like, 'Who can I lean on? Who can I trust?' I try to take a load off of them and lead them if they need it. We are here to educate the brides. We are going to be with them right up until their wedding day. If you need help, we, the members of the association, will find you the help you need."

The association is willing to walk brides through the entire process of planning a wedding from start to finish, including those little things often left off a bride's list, said Darrell Penland, manager for Cinderella Dry Cleaners and Laundry. For example, he said most people do not think about the importance of properly caring for their once-in-a-lifetime wedding garments.

"We do a good job pressing and cleaning wedding gowns before and after the event," Penland said. "At the bridal fair, we will encourage brides to register with our shop. Their guests may come in and buy them a gift certificate for a wedding gown preservation. The show is a nice way for us to let brides know where they can go and who they can trust."

Some businesses use the bridal show as a way to communicate with their customers. Donna Willis, assistant general manager for the Hampton Inn, said this venue allows her business the opportunity to meet with prospective clients.

"This helps us to learn more about what the brides and grooms want. Hopefully, they will think of us, and we will be able to recommend other services to them when they ask," Willis said. "There are lots of ways to have a wedding."

The members of the organization said they are proud of their commitment to service. Shirley Schoen, owner of Schoen's Bridal World, stressed the importance of service in the wedding industry.

"You need to make the bride feel like she is a special person," Schoen said. "I dearly love all of my girls. I feel like each one of them is one of my granddaughters and I treat them as though they were."

Study says violence against women global issue

BY SHEILA HOTCHKIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — One of every three women worldwide has been beaten, raped or somehow mistreated, according to a sweeping new report that says violence against women should be treated as a global health problem rather than just a law enforcement matter.

"I see the health care setting as an opportunity — and right now, it's an opportunity lost," said co-author Lori Heise, who visited at least 20 countries during the past decade, collecting data from 2,000 domestic violence studies. "It's an opportunity to perhaps prevent a health problem from materializing."

Authors of "Ending Violence Against Women," released Thursday by the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health and the Center for Health and Gender Equity, say it is the first study to take a worldwide look at violence against women.

Besides immediate physical injuries, abuse also has been linked to problem pregnancies, substance abuse, gastrointestinal disorders and chronic pain syndromes, perhaps due to anxiety, the study said.

"Women who have a history of abuse are at much higher risk of having these chronic conditions than other women," said Heise, the co-director of the Center for Health and Gender Equity.

Anywhere from 22 percent to 70 percent of the women interviewed never had told anyone about abuse they suffered, according to the studies compiled in the report.

Heise also said the report included studies that, for the first time, linked child mortality to mothers' abusive relationships.

A Nicaraguan study concluded that children of abused women were six times more likely than other children to die before age 5. An Indian study also found that women who had been beaten were more likely than other women to face miscarriages, stillbirths or infant deaths.

Other studies linked abuse to miscarriages, premature labor and fetal distress.

"We don't understand what's operating there because people are just beginning to look at it," Heise said.

The report said the health care system is the only institution that interacts with nearly all women during their lives, giving health professionals an ideal vantage point to identify and assist victims of abuse.

Dr. John Nelson, a gynecologist and spokesman for the American Medical Association, said he agreed unequivocally.

Semester at Sea gives students view of world

■ Program offers courses, visits to far-flung locations.

BY MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sarah Doerfler said last fall was the best semester of her life.

Doerfler, junior in elementary education; Trevor Hague, senior in industrial engineering; and Sean Carty, senior in management information systems and financial management, all took part in the Semester at Sea program sponsored by the University of Pittsburgh.

"This was the best 100 days of my life. I can hardly show my photo album without breaking into tears," Doerfler said.

Students who participate in the program live on a ship for 100 days, take courses and travel around the world. Hague said they traveled to Canada, Japan, China, Vietnam, Malaysia, India, Egypt, Turkey, Croatia, Italy and Morocco.

Of all the international programs available, said Barry Michie, director of the study abroad program at K-State, Semester at Sea was good because it gives the students more direction than exchange programs do.

"It is a brief introduction without the long-term obligation," Michie said. "If I was interested in exploring the four corners of the world, I would go with Semester at Sea."

The program can cost about $14,000 to $16,000. Carty said he spent about $19,000, including spending money. Hague said he spent about $15,000.

The S.S. Universe Explorer, the ship they traveled on, typically would be on the sea for a few days, then port for a few days, Hague said.

"We were moving so fast, it was hard to grasp where you had been when every two days you were in a new country," Hague said.

Sean Carty, senior in management information systems and financial management; Sarah Doerfler, junior in elementary education; and Trevor Hague, senior in industrial engineering, stand aboard the S.S. Universe Explorer as part of Semester at Sea.

The ship is a floating university for half of the year, and it serves as a cruise ship during the other half, Doerfler said.

"Dining rooms were classrooms and the casino was a library," Doerfler said. "Most of the classes were in the front of the boat. They had glass windows, and during class you could see dolphins jumping."

The ship was perfect for college students, Carty said.

"It was big and sturdy with all the normal cruise ship accommodations, but nothing too nice," he said.

The ship offers courses through the University of Pittsburgh.

Michie said most of the credits transfer to K-State.

"The ship's curriculum was more social-science based, but there has recently been a push to produce opportunities for students of other curriculums," Michie said. "This is the Cadillac of the international student programs."

Hague said he planned to attend Semester at Sea for a year and a half.

Part of the course work is doing fieldwork in the countries students visit.

"We would have to go see different places, then write papers on it," Hague said. "It made you branch out and do things you would not have done, like visiting orphanages or domestic abuse centers."

Not all experiences in port countries were purely academic.

"One of the best memories of the trip was Vietnam," Doerfler said. "A friend and I were in a bar and man was sitting at a table with bottle of whiskey the size of a lamp shade."

Doerfler said the man told them that he wanted Americans to think of Vietnam as a country, not a war.

"He told us to pick out a print on the wall as a gift from him, to remember Vietnam," Doerfler said.

One of Hague's best memories was porting in Morocco and climbing a mountain with his friends.

"We sat on the peak, ate lunch, looked at the view and thought about what we had done on the trip," Hague said.

Although the students were at sea, they did not forget K-State.

"I was talking to my parents on the phone in Egypt when we played Nebraska," Doerfler said. "The first thing I thought about was getting to Trevor and Sean and to tell them we were losing."

Hague said he was the second-to-last off the boat when it docked in Florida.

"Coming back was like a giant circle — nothing has changed, but I have," Hague said.

All three students encourage others to look into the program.

"Go give it a chance," Carty said. "It is way better than the brochures made it out to be. Nothing beats living in the now."

Activists reflect on Roe case

BY DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jan. 22 marks the anniversary of an event that both Brenda Lea Mayberry and Tiffany Pollard are passionate about, but for different reasons.

On that day in 1973, the Supreme Court released its opinion on Roe vs. Wade, making abortion legal in the United States.

Mayberry, the president of K-State and Manhattan's chapter of the National Organization for Women and graduate in curriculum and instruction, said for her and many others in her organization it is a day of celebration.

"Just like you celebrate the end of the year or the millennium, we celebrate the end of another year that abortion has been legal," she said.

Pollard, senior in biology, is the president of K-State's Students for the Right to Life, a group that opposes abortion.

She said although she doesn't plan to do anything ceremoniously, the Supreme Court decision will enter her thoughts that day.

"I will probably take the time to say a rosary and pray for the women and children who have been the victims of abortion," she said. "And I will pray that the decision will eventually be overturned."

Mayberry also plans to spend quiet time reflecting with a few members of her organization.

"We just always meet and discuss our friends that aren't with us anymore," she said. "It's very personal and private."

She said the decision is one that is kept in mind all year long.

Just this Thursday, she said, the Kansas Legislature began debate on a bills that would change abortion laws in the state. Members of her group were there lobbying and discussing their views with lawmakers.

"When it comes to reproductive rights, it is not a once-a-year event," she said.

Pollard said pro-life activists visited the capitol as well on Thursday. She said her organization schedules most of its events in the spring.

"We have a number of programs that call attention to the issue in the spring," Pollard said.

However, neither Pollard or Mayberry expected many people to know the importance of the upcoming anniversary.

"I hate to say it, but it seems like abortion is so entrenched in our society that it's just something that we take for granted," Pollard said. "Whether we see it as evil or good, it's just there."

Mayberry said women who remember life before the Roe vs. Wade decision are more likely to remember its anniversary.

"If you talk to older women, they know about it," Mayberry said. "They're the women who didn't have it then.

"They are women who were fighting for it. Unless you're over 35, you don't have a memory of life pre-Roe vs. Wade," she said.

She said some women remember it as clearly as others remember when people walked on the moon.

"Every generation has some event that sticks in their minds," Mayberry said. "For ours, it's pre-Roe and post-Roe, no matter how you feel about it."

STORY BY REED DUNN

Pierce Pettis, John McVey to perform Saturday at Manhattan Arts Center for BirdHouse Productions

Garth Brooks was impressed. So were 7 million others.

Pierce Pettis wrote the song "You Move Me," which Garth Brooks recorded as a single and for his "Sevens" album. Pettis said Capitol Records contacted him earlier this week to tell him the single has reached a circulation of 7 million.

"It's like 7 million people voted for you," Pettis said. "It's like you've communicated with 7 million people. It's just wonderful."

Pettis and John McVey will be co-billing for the first BirdHouse Productions show of the season 8 p.m. Saturday at the Manhattan Arts Center. BirdHouse Productions is in its fifth season of presenting acoustic music in Manhattan.

David Kamerer, founder of BirdHouse Productions, said the Pettis/McVey performance will be a great way to start the season.

"They are friends and they complement each other's styles," Kamerer said. "You get more energy when there's more than one person on stage."

BirdHouse

Tickets for the concert are $10 for the general public and $8 for students and seniors. Tickets are available at the Dusty Bookshelf and at the door.

Kamerer said Pettis writes songs of human life, love and relationships.

"Pierce is definitely one of the best up-and-coming writers," Kamerer said. "We're definitely going to hear more hits from Pierce."

Steve Martini, BirdHouse organizer, said Pettis provides an entertaining folk-style show.

"He's very entertaining," Martini said. "He's not a comedian, but he puts on a good show."

Pettis was in Manhattan in fall 1996 for a Habitat for Humanity benefit. Kamerer said the show was successful and the response was worth bringing Pettis back to town.

"It was a great show," Kamerer said. "It was very powerful and there was a huge audience response."

Since Pettis' last performance in Manhattan, he has released his sixth album. Martini said the albums he has heard are great, but nothing compares to hearing Pettis live.

"The first time I heard his album I thought one or two of the songs were really good," Martini said. "After seeing him live, there was not one song I did not think was great."

McVey has released two albums and was the National Academy of Songwriters Acoustic Artist of the Year last year. Kamerer said McVey's style is somewhat like Pettis', but there is a slight difference.

"So many of our artists write songs, play guitar and sing," Kamerer said. "The two artists are similar, but there is a subtle difference in their styles."

Martini said the spring season is one of the best lineups BirdHouse Productions has had in the last few years. He said the Pettis/McVey show will give those in attendance an idea of what type of musicians BirdHouse Productions brings to Manhattan.

"It will give you a good idea of what BirdHouse is about," Martini said. "It is indicative of what type of shows we put on."

Pettis said this show will be different from his first show because he has been writing so many songs in recent months. He said his wife, Michelle, also will be singing harmony for the performance.

"I've been constantly writing. I've probably written three or four songs this month," Pettis said. "I'm very happy to be coming back. It was extremely well organized last time I was in town."

"AFTER SEEING HIM LIVE, THERE WAS NOT ONE SONG I DID NOT THINK WAS GREAT."

Founder of BirdHouse Productions

Golden Globe nominees serve as Oscar preview

BY KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

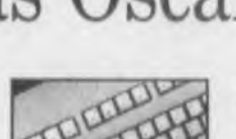
On the surface, the Golden Globe Awards are similar to any other film awards.

In presentation, nominees who win awards go to a podium where they give drawn-out speeches thanking everyone they ever knew.

In practice, the nominees and even winners often are the same as those who are recognized by the Academy Awards.

The Golden Globe Awards, however, are not decided by members of the film community, like the Oscars are. In fact, the Golden Globes are not decided by Americans.

The Hollywood Foreign Press Association, which represents newspapers and magazines in nearly 50 foreign countries, began presenting awards in 1944 at informal ceremonies. In 1955, the Golden Globes also began to honor achievements in television.



Lately, the Golden Globes have become less of its own awards and more of a precursor for who's in the running for Oscars.

Such is the case when the 57th annual award ceremony takes place at 7 p.m. Sunday on NBC. Although the Golden Globes separate many of the categories into comedies and dramas, the Oscars undoubtedly will choose many of the nominations from the compiled nominations.

Some of the more interesting categories:

■ Tom Hanks is missing from the list of best actors in a drama, but the list includes Russell Crowe for "The Insider," Matt Damon for "The Talented Mr. Ripley," Richard Farnsworth for "The Straight Story," Kevin Spacey for "American Beauty," and Denzel Washington for "The Hurricane." Crowe is misplaced in this category, since he was in more of a supporting role than Al Pacino was. Washington had the best overall performance of anyone else in this category.

■ Jude Law ("The Talented Mr. Ripley") is the best actor among those up for supporting actor. Others include Michael Caine for "The Cider House Rules," Tom Cruise for "Magnolia," Michael Clarke Duncan for "The Green Mile," and Haley Joel Osment for "The Sixth Sense." Osment could be a contender, because children are so rarely nominated, and because "The Sixth Sense" had such an effect on audiences.

■ ON THE WEB
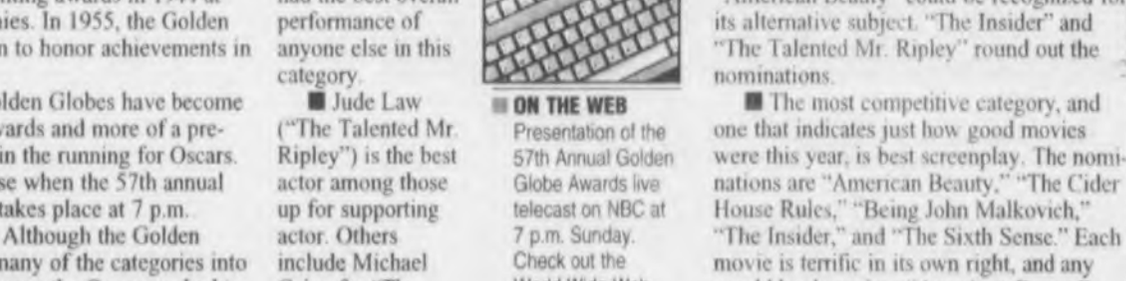
Presentation of the 57th Annual Golden Globe Awards live telecast on NBC at 7 p.m. Sunday. Check out the World Wide Web page at www.goldenglobes.org.

■ For best drama, "The End of the Affair" seems the odd movie out, and most audiences would probably substitute no-show "The Green Mile" for a nominee. The best movie was "The Hurricane," although "American Beauty" could be recognized for its alternative subject. "The Insider" and "The Talented Mr. Ripley" round out the nominations.



■ The most competitive category, and one that indicates just how good movies were this year, is best screenplay. The nominations are "American Beauty," "The Cider House Rules," "Being John Malkovich," "The Insider," and "The Sixth Sense." Each movie is terrific in its own right, and any would be deserving. "American Beauty" seems to be the most popular of the movies among the press.

■ Barbra Streisand will be the recipient of the 2000 Cecil B. deMille Award for her contributions to entertainment. Streisand was the first woman to win a Golden Globe as a director for the 1983 movie, "Yentl," and has won more Golden Globes than any other artist in the entertainment industry. Streisand also has earned Oscar, Tony, Emmy, Grammy, Cable Ace and Peabody awards.

Rebels promise more sabotage of Columbian electric towers

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOGOTÁ, Colombia — Leftist rebels promised Thursday to keep blowing up electric towers until the government meets their demands for peace — a campaign that already has caused severe power rationing for hundreds of thousands of Colombians.

Civic groups, meanwhile, planned a nationwide protest against this week's pylon bombings. The rebel attacks have forced school closings, hurt businesses already hobbled by recession and prompted utilities to announce rate increases.

In a radio interview, Nicolas Rodriguez of the leftist National Liberation Army, or ELN, said his group has lost patience with the government's peace strategy, which has focused on negotiations with a different rebel faction.

"The ruling class listens only to the voice of dynamite and rifles," said Rodriguez, the top commander of the 5,000-member rebel group, to Radionet.

Rodriguez said the bombings also were to protest government plans to privatize state-owned energy companies, including one whose installations were crippled by rebel bombs Monday. Economists say the sell-offs are a key part of loan agreements with international creditors aimed at rescuing Colombia's faltering economy.

Hundreds of rural towns and the country's second-largest city, Medellín, have weathered severe energy rationing since explosives planted by the ELN damaged or toppled 22 electrical pylons across a mountainous central region.

In Medellín, a city of 2.5 million people, many restaurants and offices were operating by candlelight after dark. City schools were closed indefinitely, forcing more than 650,000 students to stay home.

In the neighboring state of Choco, 14 towns lost power altogether.

ELN is angry because President Andres Pastrana has focused his peace efforts on negotiations begun last year with Colombia's largest guerrilla force, the 15,000-member Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC.

The FARC now openly controls a huge swath of southern Colombia where Pastrana withdrew his troops as a concession to facilitate the talks. While the talks have made little progress, business and government leaders now regularly meet with rebel chieftains.

Once-secret Nixon cassettes now available for purchase

■ Nixon tapes $18 each, have offensive language.

BY DEB RIECHMANN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Hear Richard Nixon like you've never heard him before.

The National Archives on Thursday began distributing cassettes of the president's once-secret tapes — at $18 a pop. Warning: The government has determined that these tapes contain language some people might find offensive.

For years, Americans have read transcripts of the Nixon tapes — salty language and all.

But unless they traveled to the archives in College Park, Md., they could not listen to the tapes. Copying was prohibited. So, besides a few bootleg tapes illegally broadcast years ago and snippets of recordings played in court, the Nixon tapes have not been aired publicly.

Now, 26 years after Nixon resigned, the public will hear Nixon's baritone voice on television and radio. Students will listen to him in class. Historians, Nixon buffs, journalists and writers around the nation will play and replay their own Nixon tapes at home, or maybe in the car.

They will hear the famous "smoking gun" conversation about Watergate that led to Nixon's resignation. They will listen to the infamous tape erasure — a full 18 1/2 minutes of buzzes and clicks. They will hear the chat between Nixon and former White House counsel John Dean, who tells the president: "We have a cancer — within — close to the presidency that's growing."

"I certainly think the American public has a right to hear this material. Those tapes resulted in Richard Nixon resigning from office. And while they know the content, they really sound much different than they read," said Dean, now an investment banker in Beverly Hills, Calif.

"Nixon kinda growls," he said.

Dean's voice also can be heard on tape.

"Obviously, there's some stuff on there that I find embarrassing with hindsight," said Dean, who was in his 30s during Watergate. "I was young, awed by the presidency for a long time, and I would approach it much differently today than I did back then."

Nixon secretly recorded 3,700 hours of tape. So far, 264 hours of Watergate and so-called "abuse of government power" tapes can be purchased. These contain conversations about the break-in and bugging of the Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate in 1972, and the subsequent cover-up and wrongdoing by the White House.

The archives began taking orders early this month. Thursday, the government is distributing the first batch — 12 1/2 hours of tapes played in court in the mid-1970s. The tapes cost $18 for each 30-minute recording. All 264 hours cost $702. Prices are set to cover the cost of copying and packaging tapes. The archives will not profit from the sale.

ABC News bought a complete set and plans to begin airing them tonight on "Nightline," said producer Jon Ebinger. C-SPAN, which in February 1998 began airing President Johnson's White House tapes on the radio and its Web site, is waiting to assess the quality of the Nixon tapes before deciding how to use them, said history producer Maura Pierce.

Junior Natalia Farmer (Cheshire, England) also will provide team leadership, collecting a team-high eight doubles victories last spring.

One of three sophomore returnees, Alena Jecminkova (Libusina, Czech Republic) is ranked No. 8 in the Central Region and No. 68 nationally after an 8-1 singles record last fall. She also teams with Pampoulova in doubles to rank No. 7 in the region in that category.

Freshman Petra Sedlmajerova (Usti Nad Labem, Czech Republic), after winning six matches in her fall debut as a Wildcat, is ranked No. 11 in the region, while Pampoulova sits at No. 22.

Finally, didn't the NBA's slogan used to be "It's fan-tastic?" Let's revive this hoop ideology by actually making the game fun again. Mandatory 15-minute autograph sessions for all players following games, affordable tickets and fewer Isaiah Riders in the league are a good start. It probably wouldn't hurt to collaborate with ESPN on more of those "SportsCenter" commercials either.

Mike, I've said my bit as a fan who used to wait eagerly to witness you in the beat of the playoffs during the early days of summer. You've inspired dreams in the past. Now it's time for you to inspire the league you helped elevate for two decades.

You might be new to the business aspect and political workings of an NBA executive, but I have faith you'll get the hang of it in no time. I also have faith that you'll never lose your touch with the common fan like so many other corporate types have. If you keep this relationship, the goals you've set for Washington as well as the entire league can be achieved.

Solving Big Gheorghe's gravity problems is another matter.

concerns, seized on Lott's statement and insisted voters want action on education.

"Members of Congress who have been in their districts understand that education is the top priority for most Americans," White House press secretary Joe Lockhart said. "I think there will be a political cost for those who want to walk away."

Lott fired back, saying that Congress would move ahead to balance the federal budget, protect Social Security and Medicare, improve education and health care and the national defense.

When Clinton's "College Opportunity Tax Cut" is fully phased in 2003, a family earning $120,000 or less annually could receive a tax deduction of up to $10,000 for tuition, fees and job-related training. Alternatively, taxpayers could seek a maximum credit of $2,800 a year. A similar proposal sponsored by Schumer died in Congress last year.

The president's proposal included $35 million for the college Completion Challenge grants, designed to spur college dropouts to return to class; $40 million for a new initiative to help minorities pursue five-year dual-degree programs in fields where they are underrepresented; and $716 million for Pell grants.

Clinton also will seek a combined $400 million increase for initiatives such as the Gear Up program, which helps disadvantaged youths stay in high school, and TRIO, which helps them stay in college.

Fiery accident north of K.C. on I-29 kills 10

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PLATTE CITY, Mo. — A truck jackknifed on an icy stretch of interstate north of Kansas City on Sunday, causing a fiery, multi-car accident that killed 10 people, authorities said.

The accident at 1:50 p.m. involved 19 cars and five trucks, many of which burst into flame, perhaps because one of the trucks leaked hydrochloric acid, Sgt. Jack McMillan, of the patrol, said.

■ THOMAS ACCIDENT
See page 6 for an update on Derrick Thomas.

It took rescue workers over eight hours to reach the final two victims, whose car was buried at the bottom of the wreckage.

Nine of the bodies were burned beyond recognition.

Interstate 29 was closed in both directions.

Falling snow had covered already icy roads, making driving dangerous across the region. A truck jackknifed, and cars began crashing into it, McMillan said.

Some of the wrecked vehicles were melted together from the heat of the fire, which burned for about an hour. The wreckage still was steaming at 10 p.m.

Derrick Thomas, a star linebacker for the Kansas City Chiefs, was injured seriously in a separate, one-vehicle crash Sunday. A spokeswoman for Liberty Hospital confirmed that the football player was there, but declined to confirm reports that his back had been injured.

Chiefs' spokesman Bob Moore confirmed that another person in the vehicle with Thomas had died.

Campaigners round up votes in Iowa caucus

BY RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DES MOINES, Iowa — On the eve of Iowa's caucuses, Republican and Democratic presidential candidates canvassed churches and national talk shows Sunday, scouring this snow-crusted state for last-minute support even as they began looking ahead to contests in New Hampshire and beyond.

"This is the first step in several steps of the journey," Bill Bradley, the former New Jersey senator who trails Vice President Al Gore in Democratic polls, said on CBS.

Entering the first election contest of Campaign 2000, Republican George W. Bush and Gore had wide leads in polls of voters who planned to visit schools, civic clubs, fire stations and other sites today to support one of eight main contestants.

The underdog candidates, all resigned to losing, were shooting for face-saving finishes and Iowa's true reward: momentum for New Hampshire's Feb. 1 primary.

what is a caucus?

As the first caucus in the nation, the Iowa caucuses often are looked to as an indicator of how well candidates will fare in the upcoming nominee race. Since 1972, the eventual nominee of each party has finished in the top three of the Iowa caucuses. Here's your guide to today's caucuses.

What is a caucus?

A caucus is a meeting every two years of residents in a state's particular precinct. Only the two main parties, Democrats and Republicans, have caucuses.

What happens at a caucus?

■ During a presidential year, caucus participants elect delegates to the county conventions in March. County delegates elect delegates to district and state conventions where delegates for national conventions are elected.

■ Caucus participants also vote for which presidential nominee they prefer to represent their party. As the first results in the nation, these votes are among the first indicators as to how the candidates are doing with grassroots Americans.

Who can participate?

■ Anyone who will be of voting age by the Nov. 7 presidential election and is a registered Democrat or Republican can attend a caucus.

What happens next?

■ Because the caucuses often are looked to as an indicator of a candidate's success, many candidates use them to decide whether to continue their race. If a candidate places below the top three, they might decide to drop out due to the high cost of continuing their campaign.

■ The first primary occurs in New Hampshire after the Iowa caucuses.

"This is a marathon, not a sprint," Republican Steve Forbes said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The footrace in Iowa, a test of political organization, favors the national front-runners. A Des Moines Sunday Register poll of 1,200 likely caucus-goers showed Gore leading Bradley among Democrats 56 percent to 28 percent. Bush led Forbes 43 percent to 20 percent in the Jan. 16-21 survey, which had an error margin of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Bradley is in danger of finishing worse than expected in a contest that traditionally punishes candidates

half-pipe DREAMS

STORIES BY JOSEPH HURLA

Local skateboarders work to raise money, construct place of their own

Ryan McCants and J.P. Redmon do not want to break the law.

But sometimes they have no choice.

As skateboarders in Manhattan, McCants and Redmon have no place to skate, except on private property and with consent of the property owner.

So they break the law.

"There currently is no place for us to skate — legally — in Manhattan," McCants said. "So, sometimes, we just skate illegally."

Skaters wait for their run on the platform of a half-pipe ramp at the new skate park in Junction City. The ramps are located in Bramlage Park on Grant Avenue in Junction City.

To avoid having to continue this activity, McCants and Redmon have led a movement to bring a skateboard park to Manhattan. However, while a skateboard park is opening just down Interstate 70 in Junction City, the pair continues to search for funds to build the park.

Janet Benson, Redmon's mom, has helped to oversee the pair as they have worked to gain approval for the park and — more recently — as they have worked to generate funds to pay for it.

"This is a genuine grassroots movement throughout the country," Benson said. "Young people are out there raising funds and getting involved."

The movement in Manhattan began when the men began to voice their opinions at city meetings discussing the prospect of such a park. They were concerned that there was no place they could safely and legally skate in Manhattan, and they proposed the park as a solution.

The City Commission approved a plan to put a skate park in CiCo Park — if the pair could raise half of the money needed.

After a pledge of $10,000 from the City/University Tax Fund — along with several thousand dollars in private donations gained through various fund raisers — the men and the others taking part in the project are half way to their goal of $29,500, Benson said.

However, she said the goal is theoretical, as donations of supplies and equipment could lower the Jonathan Mitchell's dream of a skate park in Junction City has become a reality.

Thirteen months after first suggesting the park as a solution to the problem of having no safe, legal place to rollerblade, the park is complete. Mitchell, freshman in public relations, said the park will be a benefit to skateboard and rollerblade enthusiasts in Junction City and the surrounding area.

"We can't skate here on campus or in our hometown, either," Mitchell said. "With this park, you don't have to worry about cars plowing you over or getting kicked out."

Mitchell said he got the idea for the park in December 1998 when he and his friends

Cats 'crawl' through Aggieville, raise money for deafblind children

BY TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The words "pub crawl" drew a crowd of more than 90 to the first-ever Cat Crawl, a pub crawl in support of Katlyn's Hope Inc. Katlyn's Hope is a non-profit organization that raises funds for deafblind children.

Shari and Jeff Willis, Katlyn's Hope founders, said they decided a pub crawl was one of the most beneficial ways to draw a college crowd into the organization. The couple started the organization after the 1996 death of their deafblind daughter, Katlyn.

Rhonda Lyne, Cat Crawl organizer, has been involved with other Katlyn's Hope events. Lyne and Katlyn's parents said they decided the Hawkwalk in Lawrence was beneficial, but a pub crawl would put a new twist in fund raising.

"We did not really want to do two walk events in one year, so we came up with the pub-crawl idea," she said. "This seemed like a fun way to raise money and also include more random people who would like to help the cause. Some people did not approve of the use of alcohol, but enough others in the community have been supportive. Radio stations and Aggieville bars have been a great source of advertisement."

The Cat Crawl lasted from noon to 6 p.m. Saturday. Six Aggieville bars were included on the list of stops, with contests, a silent auction, raffle and a three-ball tournament.

Preregistration included more than 50 people, but at least 90 started the crawl at Fast Eddy's. Shari Willis said the turnout was larger than the group had anticipated.

"It is going so well," she said. "We are raising a lot of money, and everyone is obviously having a great time. The tremendous support of Manhattan will allow us to continue this event next year, and even more people will come. We will do this again."

The crowd ranged from college students to Katlyn's family and friends. Events at the different bars allowed the afternoon to be interactive for the pub-crawl participants.

Porter's had a martini contest, including trivia questions such as asking the name of the original James Bond martini. A martini-tasting contest challenged participants to identify various martinis from a shot-glass sample. Every contest winner throughout the afternoon received prizes donated by local businesses.

Lucky BrewGrille sponsored a silent auction, which included bidding for an autographed football from the K-State football team. An hourlong massage, Korean martial-arts lessons and a one-night package for two in Lawrence were other items auctioned. Door prizes and an ugliest-shoe contest were among other events during the crawl.

Many of the college students said they either heard about the crawl through friends or advertisements.

Soldiers face accusations of mistreatment of Kosovars

UROSEVAC, Yugoslavia — U.S. soldiers serving with the NATO-led peacekeeping force in Kosovo might have treated men in Kosovo too roughly and had "inappropriate physical contact" with local women, U.S. army headquarters in Kosovo announced Sunday.

NATO is investigating allegations the soldiers acted inappropriately while doing crowd control in Vitina, about 25 miles south of Kosovo, according to a statement from Cap Bondsteel, the main U.S. base.

"Preliminary findings ... indicate several soldiers may have been involved in misconduct including improper use of physical force and threats against Kosovo males and inappropriate physical contact with Kosovar females," the statement said.

No charges have been filed, and investigations into alleged incidents are continuing, the statement said. It did not offer further details.

There was no indication the alleged wrongdoing was related to the killing of an 11-year-old Kosovar girl, also in Vitina. A U.S. soldier serving with the international peacekeeping force in eastern Kosovo was charged last weekend with sexually assaulting and killing the girl.

Seton Hall works to improve reputation after dorm fire

NEWARK, N.J. — Within hours of last week's residence hall fire that killed three students and injured 62, Seton Hall's public relations team was holding strategy meetings to discuss preserving the university's reputation, the Newark Star-Ledger reported Sunday.

Seton Hall officials said in a news release that they hired a marketing communications firm one day after the fire to poll colleges and universities about residence hall sprinkler systems. The poll, which surveyed 37 colleges in seven states at random, showed 45 percent of campus residence halls were not equipped with sprinklers.

Despite the public relations firm's hiring, Seton Hall spokeswoman Lisa E. Grider told the Star-Ledger that it is too soon to worry about the school's image when five students remain hospitalized.

The residence hall where Wednesday's fire started was built before laws required sprinklers in new campus residence halls. Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., said Sunday that she plans to introduce legislation requiring sprinklers to be installed in all campus residence halls.

"You have to protect them where they are. We can't count on them evacuating," said Dan Jones, fire chief in Chapel Hill, N.C., who has led a national campaign to install sprinklers in campus housing since a 1996 fraternity fire killed five people at the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill.

Although most university handbooks detail fire procedures and most residence hall staff members conduct fire safety talks, few students pay attention, Jones said.

"Experience tells me that 18- to 24-year-olds have a sense of immortality," Jones said. "You're just not going to get them to pay close attention to safety lessons."

At Seton Hall, many students said they did not leave when the alarm sounded early Wednesday because they thought it was another false alarm — there have been 17 this school year.

Investigators at Seton Hall still were trying to determine the cause of the blaze that broke out in a third-floor lounge of the freshman dorm.

Essex County Prosecutor Donald Campolo has said investigators have not ruled out arson, careless smoking or electrical problems as possible causes. His staff would not comment on the investigation Sunday.

Students will be able to return to the residence hall today. Classes, canceled after the fire, were to resume Tuesday.

Burial services were planned for today for the three 18-year-old victims.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There were errors in Friday's Collegian.

The Tim Lim Scholarship in Agriculture and Tim Lim Undergraduate Scholarship in Agriculture was established by Tim and Julie Lim.

Diane Hinrichs is the faculty adviser for the K-State Student Foundation and the Stewardship coordinator for the Foundation.

The alumni center's driveway will move from the front to the back of the building with the new renovations.

With the Student Senate transportation Program proposal, a bus pass would cost $20 and a Bramlage parking permit would cost $50.

Black Student Union would have $6,500 to spend on a speaker.

Dustin T. Petrik is a member of Student Senate.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

High schoolers compete in decathlon

By Danica Coto
Kansas State Collegian

Adam Larson was upset.

Instead of seeing 50 miles into the horizon, all he could see were endless clouds. He thought the long hike had been fruitless.

After a moment of reflection, he found more satisfaction in walking through a cloud. After all, he said, "Who hasn't wanted to walk through a cloud?"

Larson, a Shawnee Mission Northwest High School student, was one of three presenters who spoke at the awards banquet for the 10th Kansas Academic Decathlon on Friday and Saturday.

This competition tested high school students' knowledge on a variety of subjects and was sponsored by the K-State Mortar Board National Senior Honor Society chapter.

Larson's speech was symbolic of the effort 180 students from 17 different high schools put forth for the opportunity to represent Kansas at the National Academic Decathlon in San Antonio this spring.

"It's the premier academic competition," Diane Hansen, Kansas Academic Decathlon director, said. "It's really the toughest, and it's known as that across the United States."

Any school that wants to participate can get involved, but it has to buy $500 worth of materials and find students who want to study and do all that work, Hansen said.

Hesston and the Shawnee-Mission area have regional competitions, but it's just for practice. Some coaches see it as a way to figure out which students will be on their team, Hansen said.

Each student team has a coach, who begins preparing the students in late September or early October.

Matthew Mosher, coach for Independence High School, said this was his first year as a coach, an experience he said he enjoyed.

"They were on their own," Mosher said. "It was very self-directional on their part. I was more a coach that encouraged them than a teacher that just prepares them."

The topic for this year's decathlon was "The Sustainable Earth." In addition to participating in a superquiz about this topic, students took tests on different subjects such as music, fine arts, economics and math.

The first day students gave prepared speeches, were interviewed by judges and wrote essays. The second day they were handed the tests.

An awards banquet concluded these activities, and large and small schools received medals for individual achievements.

At the end, students were trying to figure out who the overall winner would be, glancing around to see how many medals their school had earned.

"I'll be honest," said Bill McClain, senior at Shawnee Mission East high school. "I didn't think we were going to make it until the very last second. We weren't doing as well as we hoped."

McClain said he plans to prepare for the next decathlon, but has to set his priorities.

"First I'm going to get some sleep, then I'm going to study like crazy."

His coach, Phil Childress, said they were excited about the win and are looking forward to working hard for the national competition.

"The preparation all comes in motivation, and tonight has been the motivation," Childress said.

Although state meet director Carla Jones said she is happy with how the event turned out, she said she wants more schools to get involved, especially those in central and western Kansas. She said some incentives have been given, such as providing lower fees for schools.

High school coaches were encouraged to recruit more schools. If more than 20 schools participate next year, Kansas has the opportunity to send one small and one large school to participate in the 2001 Decathlon finals in Alaska.

Kansas is the first state to have the decathlon each year, something that is beneficial for all of the high schools and for K-State, said Emily Howard, senior in accounting and finance and academic decathlon chairman.

"The product of it is really exciting," Howard said. "It's a chance to show off K-State to them."

SGA workshops to teach campaign tips

By Angela Kistner
Kansas State Collegian

Students interested in becoming involved in Student Governing Association can learn how to run their campaigns by attending workshops offered by SGA.

At 8 p.m. Feb. 3 in the Union 206 and at 7 p.m. Feb. 8 in Union 207, Jason Heinrich, Leo Prieto, Tracey Mann and others will give presentations on involvement opportunities within student government and the best ways to manage a campaign for office.

Heinrich, student body president, said the workshops are open to everyone, but they specifically will be targeting minority groups on campus. He said SGA has been working on ways to diversify Student Senate and to get more minority participation in student government.

"This was the best one to start off with," he said.

Prieto, former student body presidential candidate, said he is excited to help out with the workshops.

"If I can help increase people running for office that are under-represented, it's worth a shot," he said. "However, I don't think this is the solution to the problem. The system isn't really set up for under-represented students."

Heinrich said he hopes the workshops will help get more minority students in student government, but he said it's not going to happen overnight.

"I don't think we can expect half of the Senate to be minority students next year," he said. "This is just the first step — getting information out there."

In order to get more minorities involved in student government, Prieto said K-State needs to make a move toward having seats in Senate designated specifically for multicultural students.

Heinrich said this was something that was proposed last year in Senate, but that workshops were the better option right now. It would depend on the success of the workshops to see if Student Senate would move toward the multicultural seat idea, he said.

Prieto said he hopes his bid for president last year opened up the doors for other minority students to run.

"I hope it encouraged people to participate and doesn't turn them off," he said.

Some of the things the workshops will go over is how to put up signs, where to get signs, forming support groups and getting a core team together.

"Some of the behind-the-scenes things that no one really knows about," Heinrich said.

Mann, former student body president, said he is excited to help with the workshops because it's important for K-State to have good leaders.

"And those leaders have to know how to campaign well," he said. "It's very grueling, very demanding. It's definitely survival of the fittest."

Time Warner to merge with EMI in $20 billion deal

By Noelle Knox
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Time Warner, which only two weeks ago announced a stunning $145 billion merger with America Online, plans to shake up the music industry through a $20 billion merger with EMI Records, home of the Beatles and the Rolling Stones, a source familiar with the deal said Sunday.

The two companies will announce the deal formally in London today, the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press.

London-based EMI confirmed Sunday that it is in the final stages of negotiations and said an announcement is forthcoming. Time Warner in New York also acknowledged the talks, but spokesman Edward Adler said, "No deal has been signed."

The deal, if it is approved by regulators, likely would be a boost for music sales over the Internet. Both Warner and EMI have been testing ways to let customers digitally download music via their computers. The new company would have a very captive audience with America Online's 20 million subscribers.

The merged company, to be called Warner EMI Music, would be the second-largest music company with more than $8 billion in annual sales. Only Seagram's Universal Music would be bigger.

EMI brings to the deal the Virgin, Priority and Capitol record labels — including names like the Spice Girls, Van Morrison and Frank Sinatra. Time Warner contributes its Atlantic, Elektra and Warner Brothers labels that include Cher, Eric Clapton, Phil Collins, Madonna, Metallica and REM.

According to the source, the negotiations between Warner and EMI started before powerbrokers discussed Time Warner's deal with America Online. Roger Ames, chairman of Warner Music Group, approached his longtime friend Ken Berry, head of EMI's music division, in the fall.

The two structured a deal in which Warner will pay EMI shareholders about $1 billion, or about $1.65 a share, in exchange for 50-percent ownership in the combined company, the source said.

Warner also will have six seats on the new board of directors, and EMI will have five seats.

The merger is expected to close in about a year.

This "represents an opportunity to establish the world's premier music group and to create very considerable value for shareholders of both companies," EMI said in a statement.

Dedicated teens deserve money for skate park

The youth of Manhattan deserve commendation and support for their initiative in trying to bring a skate park to town.

Several Manhattan-area teen-agers — led by J.P. Redmon and Ryan McCants — have taken the lead in pushing to bring the skate park to CiCo Park. However, they need help if they are to achieve their goal.

The group is responsible for raising more than $29,000 — half of the anticipated cost for constructing the park. To date, they have raised about half of that sum. While K-State has kicked in with money from the university-city fund, K-State students and staff can help even more.

The entire Manhattan community — including students — should show their support for these high school students who have worked hard to introduce the city to a new type of entertainment.

Not only would a skate park be new to Manhattan, it would be geared toward high school youth. This is the age that commonly is left out of entertainment options. The park will provide a safe, fun place for rollerbladers and skateboarders to have fun.

The best way to support the kids would be to throw some money their way. However, that is not always possible for college students. For those with limited cash flow, the group could use help with its fund-raisers, which have included parking cars and running a Moonwalk in Aggieville.

Junction City just completed work on a skate park, and turnout at the park so far has been high. That puts Manhattan youth at a disadvantage, because it is so easy to travel down the highway.

But the park is a worthwhile endeavor, and the youth behind the idea deserve to see it come to fruition.

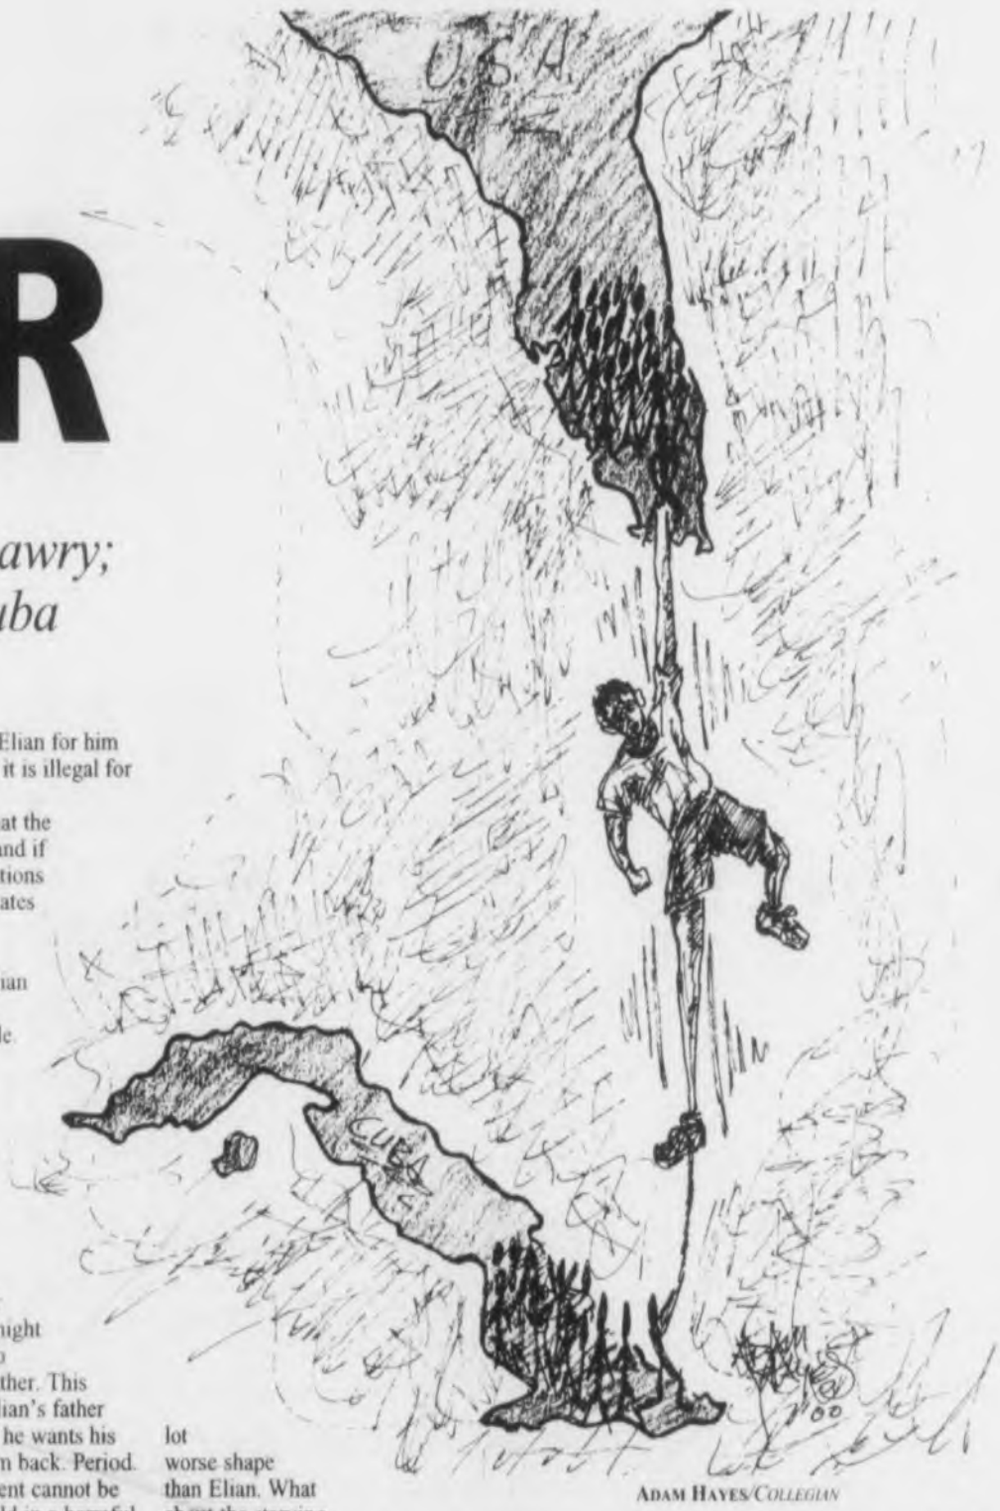
3-party system needed for more togetherness

Editor,

Liberals like David Levin are, for my tastes, far too quick to point a finger at conservatives for the world's ills and whine to the government to solve all of our problems when we should all be pulling ourselves up by the bootstraps and solving problems ourselves.



Concurrently, conservatives are far too entrenched in their old traditions to bother with outside opinions and new ideas that might make their political philosophies and strategies better for everyone.

The point? Maybe it's time for a three-party system to inject some life and civility into the whiny world of politics. Better yet, how about a one-party system? Maybe that will force people to divert their energy to solving problems together.

Tug of WAR

International custody battle gone awry; Elian belongs with father in Cuba

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

A boy was found floating alone on an inner tube in the middle of the ocean.

He had no mother or father with him when he was rescued. He was found north of Miami by a couple of fishermen. According to the Jan. 17 issue of Newsweek, it was obvious to the fishermen who found him that the child was not American.

Still, the fishermen picked the child up — as would anyone with a heart — and took him ashore.

This is where the controversy begins. Instead of the United States finding out where the child was from and taking him back to that place, they found out where he was from and, based on that information, decided to keep him. The boy's name is Elian, and he is Cuban.

Here are the basics, according to Newsweek: Elian was born in Cuba, a communist country, to Cuban parents. They divorced, and Elian went with his mother, though his father stayed close by and was not absent from his son's life.

Apparently, Elian's mother decided to escape from Cuba to live in the United States with relatives, who are Elian's great-aunts and uncles. During the trip, the boat broke down and eventually just fell apart. Only Elian and two other Cubans survived. Elian's mother died.

Now, Elian's father is alive and well in Cuba, and he wants his son back. However, the United States, being noble as usual, decided that it would be morally wrong to send Elian back to a communist country, despite the fact that his biological father wants him. There has even been a subpoena issued to Elian for him to appear in court, which means it is illegal for him to leave the United States.

This leads Cuba to believe that the United States kidnapped Elian, and if there were ever a reason for relations between Cuba and the United States to improve, it surely has been forgotten by now.

Here is what I think: Give Elian back to his father.

This is a simple custody battle. One parent had custody and, unfortunately, that parent died. So the child should be sent to the other able-bodied parent. This is how the system works. For example, a mother moves her child to Indiana while the father still lives in Oregon.

A few years later, the mother passes away. Unfortunate as it might seem, the child gets sent away to Oregon to live with his or her father. This happens because it is the law. Elian's father has active parental rights, and if he wants his son back, it is his right to get him back. Period.

Some would argue that a parent cannot be granted custody if it puts the child in a harmful situation, such as abuse or neglect. I will admit that it might not be exactly beneficial to live in a communist country.

However, it is his home, and he has lived there the first six years of his life. If it were not for his mother's initiative to escape, he would have continued to grow up in Cuba, without any of the United States' concern or care, for that matter.

This is not intended to say the United States is heartless. But there are plenty of countries with unfavorable situations and children in a lot worse shape than Elian. What about the starving children in India or the thousands of children dying from AIDS in Africa? Or, how about when Russia was still a communist country? We didn't go save all its children from their harmful parents.

As sad and terrible as these things are, the United States cannot be a knight in shining armor to every under-privileged child in the world.

Furthermore, if we are going to play savior to every less fortunate country, shouldn't we worry about our own first?

Granted, the United States is wonderfully advantaged compared to most countries, but we still have problems.

We should take care of the homeless, hungry and abused American children before we take on the huge responsibility of everyone else's.

Anniversary of legalized abortion in U.S. not occasion of pride, celebration

More than 39 million dead.

You would think the headlines would be screaming it. But no. For the most part, the media continues to ignore the slaughter of the innocent, much as it has for the past 27 years since the Supreme Court legalized all abortions in the United States on Jan. 22, 1973.

We go about our daily business the same as always, not even realizing that more than 3,300 babies will die from legalized abortion — today.

Abortion currently is legal in every state, although some outlaw late-term abortions. Kansas technically outlaws late-term abortions, but the law is filled with loopholes and is not enforced.

Long before the Kansas Board of Education decision made headlines, Kansas — specifically Wichita — was known nation-wide as a place where women could come to have their child exterminated up to the moment before birth. Gov. Bill Graves has fought long and hard to ensure that this practice continues and is fully protected.

It is an established and recognized medical and scientific fact that life begins at conception. An unborn baby is a unique, individual person. The child is of a different gender than the mother half the time, often has a different blood type and has completely unique physical and genetic fingerprints.

Within 18 days of conception, the baby's heart begins to beat. Within 40 days, brain waves can be detected. By eight weeks, all body systems are present and the baby is capable of sucking its thumb. This is not a blob of tissue; this is a living human being.

There is no valid reason to take the life of an innocent person. If the child has Down's Syndrome, is the product of rape or incest or might have disabilities, he or she is still a human being, and typically still has the capacity to lead a happy and productive life. Every pro-choice argument is pointless in light of the fact that abortion is the taking of an innocent human life. There is no good reason, ever, for murder.

Children of rape have every right to live, as do handicapped children, children with Down's Syndrome or children of poor single mothers. If one is to argue that abortion must be permitted in these instances, they must also be willing to argue that all grown persons with handicaps, deformities or health problems be lined up and shot.

It would be nice if every child was a wanted child, but since when does a person's right to life depend on whether or not someone else wants them? Besides, there are currently more than two million couples in the United States waiting to adopt. Every child is wanted — by someone.

Pro-choice activists continually repeat, "I support a woman's right to choose," like a broken record. Right to choose what? To not pay her taxes? To drive 150 mph? To abuse or neglect her children? Abortion is not about choice. Choice is when you choose Pepsi over Coke or what color to die your hair. No one has the right to choose to take the life of another person. Abortion is about whether or not we can decide that certain classes of human beings are not persons and are therefore unfit to live.

Then again, it's not as if we haven't been down this road before. In 1857, in its infamous Dred Scott decision, the Supreme Court ruled that slaves were not human beings, but mere property, to be mistreated and disposed of at will by their owners. In this vein, it is interesting to note that a disproportionate number of abortions are performed on the poor and minorities. This reflects the goals of Margaret Sanger, founder of Planned Parenthood — the United States largest abortion provider.

For 27 years, this supposedly safe procedure has left in its wake not only millions of dead babies, but thousands of mothers physically scarred and millions of mothers emotionally scarred, for life. As long as 20 years after having an abortion, mothers continue to suffer every day under the knowledge that, whether they realized it at the time or not, they had their very own child killed.

Thirty-nine million children murdered. I am proud to be an American, but I am genuinely ashamed that our nation, which claims to be a refuge for the oppressed and a champion of freedom, has denied its youngest and most vulnerable members the most fundamental civil right of all — the right to live. May God have mercy on the United States of America.

Kansas City Chiefs wide receiver Kevin Lockett, along with his mother, father and brother, Aaron Lockett, cuts the ribbon to open the new Academic Learning Center geared for student athletes. KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kevin Lockett's best-known contributions to K-State might be the ones he made at KSU Stadium during his years as a wide receiver.

During a dedication ceremony Friday, Lockett, a Kansas City Chiefs wide receiver, made a contribution of a different kind. He unveiled the Lock-ett Up Foundation Academic Learning Center on the fourth floor of Hale Library. The new learning center, which consists of two classrooms equipped with 24 computers and a large study area, is the product of a $25,000 commitment made to the KSU Foundation by the 1996 alumnus' Lock-ett Up Foundation.

"This place holds a special place in my heart," Lockett said. "I just wanted to give back what I was given at this great university."

While open to all K-State students for use, the learning center also will aid K-State's student athletes as they juggle classes and team commitments, said Beatrice Lockett, Lockett's mother and member of the Lock-ett Up Foundation.

Beatrice said space in Vanier Football Complex, where athletes meet with study groups and tutors, can become crowded quickly, and the new learning center will give athletes stretching room.

"In the evening, more athletes need to study than Vanier can hold," she said. "They need this extra space."

In his speech during the ceremony, football coach Bill Snyder spoke of how school work was a driving force in K-State's sports program.

"Education and athletics have grown very close here at K-State," he said.

The opening of the center marks the first step in a program put together by Lockett's organization, created to fund community service and youth- development programs.

Guest-reader presentations at Manhattan's Theodore Roosevelt Elementary School and K-State's Stone House Early Childhood Center, in which Kevin Lockett has participated, are past programs the foundation has sponsored.

Future plans include the establishment of the Lock-ett Up Foundation Scholarship Program and the Lock-ett Up Foundation Reading Program.

"We have a lot of things on our plate at the moment, a lot of things in the works," Beatrice Lockett said.

Lockett ended the ribbon-cutting ceremony with a plea for program volunteers, especially those willing to serve as guest readers.

"If any of you have a day or an evening free, call Theodore Roosevelt and ask how you can help," he said. "You could help these children develop skills necessary to survive."

'American Beauty' nabs 3 Globes

BY LYNN ELBER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — "American Beauty" captured the Golden Globes for best drama, director and screenplay Sunday, and "Toy Story 2" nabbed the best musical or comedy award.

Denzel Washington received the award for best actor in a dramatic film for his work in "The Hurricane," based on the real-life wrongful imprisonment of Rubin "Hurricane" Carter.

Jim Carrey, who gave an uncanny impersonation of the late comic Andy Kaufman in "Man on the Moon," won as best actor in a movie comedy on Sunday.

"Second year in a row — what's going on here, man?" Carrey said. "I'm the establishment I once rejected. ... I'm the Tom Hanks of the Golden Globes."

British actress Janet McTeer won best actress in a musical or comedy film for her performance as a Southern mother in "Tumbleweeds."

The award for best actress in a dramatic film went to Hilary Swank for the real-life story "Boys Don't Cry," in which she played a young woman who was killed after her masquerade as a man was discovered.

Tom Cruise of "Magnolia" and Angelina Jolie of "Girl, Interrupted" won motion picture supporting actor honors.

"Wow. God, I didn't expect this," Cruise said, then thanked wife Nicole Kidman, who couldn't attend because of work. "Her generosity, her support, her sacrifices, her talent — she inspires me."

A poignant moment in the television categories came when Michael J. Fox was named best actor for the comedy "Spin City," which he announced he is leaving because of his fight against Parkinson's disease. But he handled it lightly.

"Actor out of work — news at 11," Fox said.

Pedro Almodóvar's "All About My Mother" was named best non-English language film.

In the television categories, cable channel HBO and its stars were big winners.

"The Sopranos" was named best drama series and dramatic acting trophies went to Edie Falco and James Gandolfini. The acclaimed mob drama also earned a supporting actress trophy for Nancy Marchand.

Among other TV winners, Jack Lemmon was named best miniseries or TV movie actor for Showtime's "Inherit the Wind."

"In the spirit of Ving Rhames, I'm going to give this to Jack Lemmon," Lemmon said, lightheartedly recalling the year in which winner Rhames gave his trophy to Lemmon.

"American Beauty" was the leading movie contender going into this year's Golden Globes, a ceremony which can serve as a signpost to what will come at the Oscars. The dark suburban fable gained six Golden Globe nominations, including best dramatic picture, dramatic actress for Annette Bening, and dramatic actor for Kevin Spacey.

St. Louis Rams, Tennessee Titans to meet in Super Bowl

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. LOUIS — Their offense imploding, their cover blown, the St. Louis Rams looked ready to head home.

Then Kurt Warner played like an MVP, getting the Midwest Express attack the one touchdown it needed. The unheralded defense did the rest, and the Rams are heading to the Super Bowl to play the Tennessee Titans.

Warner hit No. 4 wide receiver Ricky Proehl with a 30-yard touchdown pass with 4:44 remaining Sunday to lift St. Louis past Tampa Bay 11-6 for the NFC championship.

"It didn't matter who did it," the quarterback said. "As long as he was wearing a Rams jersey, it didn't matter.

"But when it comes down to making a play, we've made plays all year long. Ricky came through today."

Proehl had six catches for 100 yards. None of those — or the 33 receptions he made this season, or the 467 of his entire 10-year career — meant anything close to his leaping grab over backup cornerback Brian Kelly.

"I'm the guy they're always trying to get rid of," he said. "I'm the guy they are always trying to replace. You know, there's 100 Ricky Proehls out there. I beg to differ."

Tennessee, which won the AFC crown in Jacksonville 33-14, handed the Rams their first loss in their seventh game of the season, but opened as 8-point underdogs.

"We know we're in for just as tough a game against the Titans," said Warner, a former Arena Leaguer who got a chance to play this year only because starter Trent Green wrecked his knee in the preseason.

Tampa's gallant defensive effort looked like it would be enough to steal the victory.

But quarterback Shaun King made several critical mistakes down the stretch, including an interception at midfield by fellow rookie Dre' Bly that set up the winning drive.

"We brought them into our zone, we brought them into our misery," said Warren Sapp, the Defensive Player of the Year, "and we had them down 6-5 and just kept battling ... and it came down to one play."

Tampa Bay coach Tony Dungy said: "It's a very tough feeling, difficult to be that close to a Super Bowl and not get it done."

BOULDER, Colo. — Jaquay Walls is earning a reputation as a second-half player.

Walls scored 24 of his 32 points after halftime, including a critical four-point play in the final minutes, as Colorado beat slumping K-State 78-70 Saturday.

After scoring 19 second-half points Wednesday against No. 17 Oklahoma, Walls accounted for 14 of Colorado's final 19 points to help the Buffs (11-6, 2-3 Big 12) send K-State (8-8, 1-4) to its fourth straight loss.

"I hit two three-pointers early in the game and then missed a couple of shots," Walls said. "I caught myself thinking, 'Uh-oh,' but then I just decided to concentrate on my shot for the rest of the game."

Jamahl Mosley added 22 points and 12 rebounds as he and Walls combined for 69 percent of Colorado's offense. Tony Kitt led Kansas State with 21 points and 14 rebounds, and Cortez Groves finished with 18 points.

"I think we got some good shots, they just didn't fall," Kitt said. "The shots were there, and the opportunity was there in the last five minutes. Our defense was good, but not good enough to win, and winning is all that matters in this game."

The Wildcats never led in the second half but were within two points, 63-61, before Walls made a three-pointer while being fouled by Donnie Wallace with 2:30 remaining. He made the ensuing free throw, and Mosley pushed the lead to eight with an inside basket 45 seconds later.

"I knew I was going to get fouled, but I didn't know if the shot was going to drop," Walls said. "I didn't see it, but I heard the crowd."

K-State never got closer than four points the rest of the way as Colorado converted 10-of-11 free throws — including its last six — down the stretch. The Buffs outscored the Wildcats 24-5 from the foul line.

"I don't want to say the officiating beat us, but 32 (attempts) to 10 is very interesting," Wildcats coach Tom Asbury said. "This game was decided at the foul line. ... We should have been at the foul line a lot more — a lot more — than we were."

K-State controlled the boards and made six more field goals than Colorado but suffered through a 3-for-17 stretch late in the second half. Mosley encountered no such slump, finishing 9-of-14 from the field and converting several three-point plays.

"It has to do with the way we practice," Mosley said. "Going up against Aki Thomas, Ernest Renfroe and Richard Fox beats you up, so that in games — even Big 12 games — it's not nearly as bad as in practice."

Split track squad finishes well at home, Iowa State Open

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track and field program split up this weekend to take care of business.

The team's heptathletes and pentathletes were at home in the Wildcat Pentathlon, and they fared well in the competition.

Two K-State pentathletes Carmen Wright and Terresha DeRossett took second and fourth in the competition. Wright scored 3,766 points in the competition and DeRossett scored 3,607 points.

K-State head track coach Cliff Rovelto said the two athletes showed progress.

"Our performances were a total reflection of the break over the holidays," Rovelto said. "Terresha's shot put was a big improvement. For this time of year, we are where we need to be."

In the heptathlon competition, Josef Karas placed third for the Wildcats. He finished with a total of 4,900 points. Rovelto said the meet was a good performance for Karas.

"Josef's 1,000 meters is pretty good right now," Rovelto said. "This is his first-ever indoor heptathlon, but it was a solid performance. He is doing well, especially for a true freshman."

K-State also had additional athletes competing at the Iowa State Open in Ames, Iowa.

The Cats' Tamel Sisney took second place in the men's weight throw with a mark of 61 feet, 7 3/4 inches, and he placed second in the men's shot put with a mark of 55 feet, 9 inches in the men's shot put.

In the women's weight throw, Anna Whitham won the competition with a mark of 57 feet, 11 3/4 inches, and Erin Anderson won the pole vault with a 12 foot 3 1/2 inch vault. She also placed second in the women's high jump.

K-State sprinter Rachel Woods won the 400-meter dash with a time of 56.04. In the distance competition, Amy Mortimer won the women's mile run with a time of 4:46.87, and teammate Korene Hinds placed second with a score of 4:48.39.

In the 3,000-meter run Amanda Crouse placed first with a time of 9:56.63. The team also fared well in the 4x400 meter relay, winning the competition with a time of 3:48.85. The team also won the distance medley with a time of 11:30.92.

The Cats' next action will come next weekend in Lawrence at a triangular meet with the University of Kansas and Missouri.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team fell to Missouri by eleven points Saturday, 52-63, but it wasn't that close.

The Cats (9-10, 2-4), coming off a loss to Texas Tech, hoped to regain their confidence with a win on the road at Missouri (13-7, 2-3). Instead, little went right for K-State all night.

"This is the kind of game where you have such a poor performance that you address it after the game and then absolutely have to lay it aside," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"We just struggled in every aspect," Patterson said.

The game went poorly for the Cats from the beginning. It took K-State 4:37 to score its first basket of the game, and by that time the Cats had turned the ball over four times to Missouri's swarming half-court pressure defense. Missouri forward Amy Monsees alone would steal the ball five times in the first half as K-State ended the half with 17 turnovers.

The Cats scored only 28 points in the first half on just 16 shots. Much of the inability to create shot opportunities lied with Missouri's defense, which pushed K-State's guards away from the basket. As a result, point guard April Sailors and guard Kristin Rethman often found themselves trying to set up the offense near half-court.

K-State still entered intermission with the score tied 28-28, mostly due to 12 of 14 shooting from the charity stripe and a tough defense that held Missouri to 36-percent shooting.

"The one positive I would bring from this game is that in the first half we held them to 28 points," Patterson said.

In the second half, the problems that had plagued K-State in the first half only worsened. The Cats' shooting woes continued.

K-State, in addition to only shooting 23 times, made just six shots the entire half. K-State's final 13 for 39 shooting was its lowest output for the season for both shots made and shots attempted and was far below its conference-play average of 22 of 50.

For the second straight game, K-State struggled to get the ball to its post players, and as a result, the Cats made just three shots inside the paint in the second half.

When the Cats did get the ball into the lane, Missouri's post players, Amanda Lassiter, Monsees and Marlena Williams, who combined for four blocked shots and 12 steals, threw it back out.

K-State forward Nicky Ramage said the Cats' offensive struggles were partly their own fault.

"I don't know if it was really tough defense or if it was just our lack of discipline on the offensive end," Ramage said.

Eventually, Missouri was able to pull away from K-State with easy lay-ups off K-State's continuous turnovers.

"They were making lay-ups, stealing the ball and getting turnovers," Ramage said. "And when you have something like that happen, you need to slow down. We had problems getting the ball in and when that happens, it leads to turnovers, turnovers and more turnovers,"

After Saturday's loss, K-State is now saddled with a 2-4 conference record and faced with an uphill battle to place in the upper half of the Big 12. Sailors said the Cats are currently worried more with the present than the future.

Tigers' No. 11 defense rips apart Cats in 2nd half

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Head coach Deb Patterson called it a total 20-minute collapse.

After dueling to a 28-28 tie at the intermission, the Wildcats simply fell apart in the second half at the hands of the No. 11 defense in the nation.

"Missouri is athletic enough and aggressive enough that if you're not setting screens, if you're not disciplined in your cuts, and if you're not aggressive — they're going to crush you," Patterson said.

The Tigers took full advantage of those opportunities, scoring 34 points off turnovers against the Cats on Saturday en route to a 63-52 victory at the Hearnes Center.

"Over the course of the game, if you look at the first half, their pressure held us to 28 points," Patterson said. "On the game, they forced us into 30 turnovers."

The 30 turnovers was the most committed by K-State since Jan. 9, 1999, when No. 7 Texas Tech forced 32 against the Cats. The Tigers' 18 steals for the game was also the most since the Red Raiders nabbed 20 in last year's contest.

In Columbia, Mizzou's defensive effort thwarted any Cat attempt of getting into an offensive rhythm.

"I don't think we really got into our offense the second 20 minutes," Patterson said. "When you look at the fact that you had only 13 field goals in the game, you're looking at a very ineffective offensive performance. And again — that's credit to Missouri's defense."

The Tigers also took advantage of their size, with their shortest starter standing at 5 feet, 10 inches tall.

"I think they did a nice job of maximizing their wingspan and athletic ability to take away passing lanes," Patterson said.

However, junior point guard April Sailors said it wasn't the Tigers' size or defensive pressure that determined the outcome of the game.

"I don't think that was the problem," she said. "I think it was us mentally. We just didn't compete, and we weren't mentally there."

Nevertheless, the agile Missouri defense forced 17 turnovers in the first half alone, while the Cats were able to muster a 28-28 tie at the intermission.

"In the first half, with all those turnovers, we were very fortunate to be hanging with them," senior forward Nicky Ramage said. "But it hurt us in the second half. It just proves that with all those turnovers, you can't hang with a team, especially a Big 12 team."

Patterson said critical turnovers, leading to lay-ups and immediate scores, were the difference in the two halves of play.

"Any time a turnover changes the momentum of the game, it's just crushing," she said. "Our first half turnovers didn't necessarily do that. We held them to 28 points, so those turnovers weren't the end of the world.

Record breaker

Junior guard Kim Woodlee three-point field goals made with two against Missouri, escalating her total to 178. Woodlee broke the mark previously held by Missy Decker (1993-1997).

A traveling team

K-State's trip to Missouri was its 10th road game of the season. The Wildcats are scheduled for six more away games, giving them a total of 16 for the season — the most in school history.

Turnover woes

The Tigers forced 30 Wildcat turnovers in Saturday's game, the most since Jan. 9, 1999, when K-State committed 32 against No. 7 Texas Tech. Missouri also collected 18 steals against the Cats, the most since the Red Raiders' 20 in the Jan. 9 contest last season.

Closing in on a milestone

With 501 career field goals made, senior Angie Finkes needs one more to break into the top 10 in Wildcat history. Senior Nicky Ramage needs 12 rebounds to reach the 500 mark for her career.

Chief's defensive player injured, passenger killed in car accident

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LIBERTY, Mo. — Derrick Thomas, a nine-time Pro Bowl linebacker for the Kansas City Chiefs, was injured seriously in a one-car accident on an icy road Sunday afternoon that killed one of his close friends.

Television reports said the 33-year-old Thomas, one of the NFL's most dominant defensive players, sustained a broken back. But a team spokesman as well as a spokeswoman at Liberty Hospital declined to confirm that.

Thomas and his companions were en route to Kansas City International Airport to fly to St. Louis for the Buccaneers-Rams NFC championship game when their car rolled over several times on a snowy, icy highway about 1:30 p.m.

Both Thomas and the man who died were ejected from the vehicle, the Missouri State Highway Patrol said.

The dead man was identified as Michael Tellis, 49, of Kansas City, Kan., the patrol said. A close friend of Thomas, Tellis helped him set up projects such as a charity golf tournament that had become an annual event in Kansas City.

An icy snow began falling in the Kansas City metropolitan area around noon. The weather also was being blamed for a pile-up on Interstate 29 northwest of Kansas City in which 10 deaths had been confirmed by Sunday night.

Chiefs' spokesman Bob Moore said team officials and doctors were en route to Liberty Hospital north of Kansas City, but were having trouble negotiating the slick highways. Chiefs president Carl Peterson was on his way back to Kansas City from St. Louis, where he had been watching the NFC title game.

Thomas, who became an immediate star after being taken in the first round of the 1989 draft, has spent all 11 years of his NFL career with the Chiefs and was an All-Pro in his first nine seasons after an All-American career at Alabama. In just his second season, he set the NFL single-game record with seven sacks against Seattle.

The game was the same week as Veterans Day and Thomas dedicated his performance to his father, an Air Force pilot killed in Viet Nam.

Coaches designed their entire defense around the quick-hitting, 6-foot-3-inch, 255-pound Thomas, and he was a mainstay in a consistently tough defense, which helped the Chiefs become one of just three NFL teams to win 100 games in the decade of the 90s.

Thomas made headlines in 1998 when he lost his temper during a Monday night game against Denver and committed three personal foul penalties in the Broncos' final touchdown drive. He was fined and suspended for one game and issued an apology to the Broncos and to his fans.

With one of the quickest first moves of any defender in the league, Thomas became known for his "sack and strip" move, where he closed fast on a quarterback's blind side and hacked at his arm to knock the ball out of his hand.

Head coach Gunther Cunningham, the Chiefs' defensive coordinator from 1995 to 1998, said Thomas was primarily responsible for the Chiefs' leading the league with a plus-130 turnover ratio in the 1990s.

"I take my hat off to No. 58. He is the most underrated football player right now on our football team," Cunningham said in December. "For one reason or another, everybody looks at Derrick Thomas and says, 'Well, he didn't show up in the playoff game.'"

"If Derrick is not out there at right end, the Chiefs would not have been as successful as they've been for the last 11 years. Derrick was the starting point to getting there."

Washington blows over audiences in 'The Hurricane'

moviereview

"The Hurricane"

Showing: Seth Childs Cinema at 7, 10:10 p.m.
Starring: Denzel Washington, Vicellous Reon Shannon

BY KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The word "best" doesn't seem to do enough justice to "The Hurricane."

It easily is the best movie of the year (the time in between the Academy Awards). The movie is without a doubt Denzel Washington's best work. The script is the best of its subject. If we were handing out Oscars, I'd even say the musical score was the best.

What puts "The Hurricane" over the top is that it not only is running on all cylinders in terms of production, but that it is also an extremely important work.

Washington plays Rubin "Hurricane" Carter, a boxer who wrongfully is convicted of murder and sentenced to life in prison. While serving time, he writes his autobiography, "The Sixteenth Round," which eventually is read by a boy (Vicellous Reon Shannon) being home-schooled in Canada. The boy becomes enthralled with Hurricane's story, as do the people who are schooling him, and together they fight to get Hurricane released from prison.

The movie is based on the real-life story of Carter, who served 20 years in prison because of racially motivated prosecution.

In a story so embedded with racial conflict, this movie transcends that subject to also deal with how a man deals with unfair imprisonment, how a boy makes a leap of faith, and how fate both can destroy and resurrect a spirit.

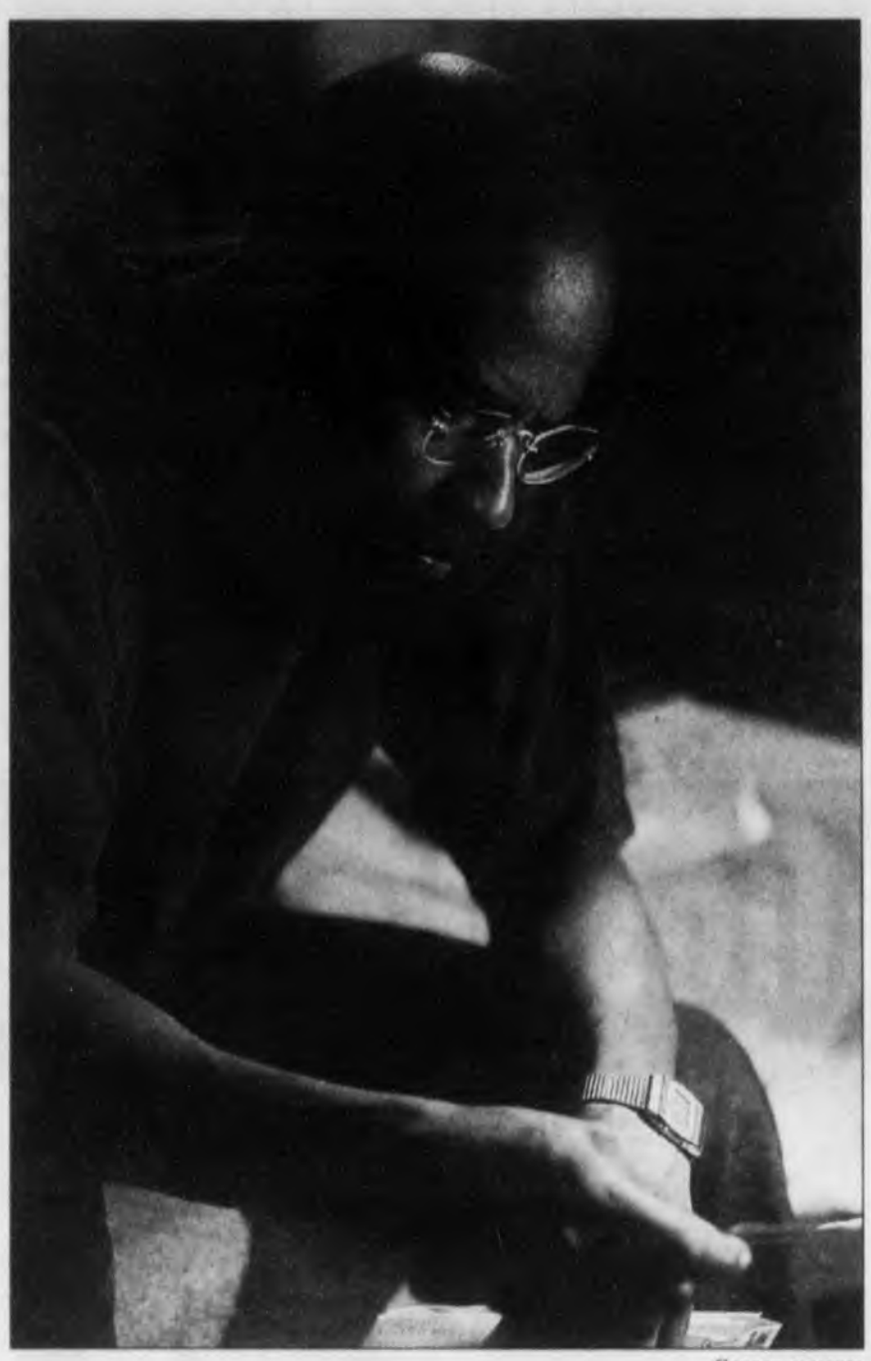
That's not to say race is anything but a predominant issue in the story. But the topic is dealt with in a unique way. There is obvious racial hatred, but the movie is not naive enough to make any character completely racially sensitive. When Shannon's character is telling his teachers that Hurricane was convicted by white juries, one of them says, "Not all white people are racist."

To which Shannon's character says, "And not all black people are murderers."

Even Hurricane struggles with being able to trust white people — the same race that wrongfully put him in prison.

Hurricane's inner struggles are the most spectacular scenes in the movie. The first occurs when he is sent to solitary confinement for refusing to wear prison-issue clothing. His consciousness splinters into three separate personalities, and the viewer sees just how close Hurricane was to resorting to hate instead of mental discipline.

Washington is most spectacular in these scenes but is solid throughout the entire movie. Anyone could have played Hurricane as a man with composure throughout the movie. What Washington brings to the role is someone just on the brink of losing that composure. He avoids making the character either strong or weak, but instead determined and vulnerable. Not since "Glory" has Washington brought this amount of character to a movie — never has he moved the audience so much.



He, and the movie, deserve Oscars.

Direction for this movie would be a difficult task, especially because of the transitions between time periods at the beginning of the movie. Director Norman Jewison takes the viewer back and forth through Hurricane's life — not to be fancy, but to provide the viewer with the adequate background at the appropriate times.

The story almost is journalistic in its unfolding of Hurricane's life — first as a famous boxer, then as a convicted murderer, then as a boy, then as a young man, then as a man struggling for freedom. The screenplay is written with the most important facts first, while still allowing room for a suspenseful story.

In short, this movie has it all.

Most importantly, the movie hammers home a message and a moral appropriate for its release date — the weekend before the observance of Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday.

Rubin Carter's story passionately retold in movie soundtrack

Various artists
"The Hurricane: Music From and Inspired by the Motion Picture"

BY JOSEPH HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anyone who cannot make it to the theater to see the new movie, "The Hurricane," simply can buy the soundtrack and kick back at home.

While the soundtrack does not offer the visuals the movie does, it does tell the story of boxer Rubin Carter. It tells this story using a variety of songs, from Bob Dylan's 20-year-old classic ballad, "Hurricane," to The Jazzyfatnastees' new "I Don't Know."

Dylan's song, which he wrote in the mid-1970s to tell Carter's story, reveals the fighter's plight in orderly, obvious fashion. The entire album, however, tells different parts of the story as it bounces between old classics to new could-be hits. All of the songs eventually fit together to form one large story.

The first song, "Hurricane," is performed by a collaboration of modern rhythm and blues and pop artists. It provides a perfect example of what the album leans toward, which is a darker, pessimistic sound about life. Also, as one of the new songs on the album, it shows that perhaps little has changed since Carter was arrested in the way minorities are treated.

Overall, this album is impressive. It tells the story not only of an imprisoned boxer, but of racism in America during the past 30-plus years.

Even those who might not be tantalized by the mix of new songs will be able to find solace in the classics.

Those unimpressed by Dylan, Ray Charles and a remake of "The Revolution Will Not Be Televised" are bound to find at least some of the new songs that are to their liking.

Because of the mix of old and new tunes — coupled with the statement about racism — I give this album a thumbs up and recommend that everyone at least sample the album in search of something that appeals to them.

Compelling characters create vivid story in 'Girl, Interrupted'

■ Ryder, Jolie both deliver magnificent performances in true story of female author.

moviereview

"Girl, Interrupted"

Showing: Seth Childs Cinema at 7:15, 10 p.m.
Starring: Winona Ryder, Angelina Jolie

BY KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Consider this a mediocre thumbs up.

While not enthusiastic about "Girl, Interrupted," I still must recommend the movie simply because it is flawless.

By that I don't mean the movie was terrific, only that is was without error. It's a solid movie, although not dynamic. It's emotional, just not heart-wrenching. It's thought-provoking, not monumental.

"Girl, Interrupted" is the contemporary female version of the 1975 classic, "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," starring Jack Nicholson. I'm hesitant to say that, of course, since "Girl, Interrupted" actually is set in the 1960s, and is based on Susanna Kaysen's autobiography of the same title.

Nevertheless, the two films are somewhat similar in mood, setting and even — to some extent — plot.

"Girl, Interrupted" tells the story of Susanna, played by Winona Ryder, who admits herself into a mental hospital after pressure from a psychologist and her family. Susanna, although having attempted suicide, is placed among others who seem — from her perspective at least — to be much more ill than she is.

Susanna develops a kinship toward the wildest of the patients, spectacularly performed by Angelina Jolie (also in "The Bone Collector"), although the relationship gets Susanna in further trouble as the two disobey hospital rules and even attempt an escape.

As far as plot goes, the movie actually moves very little, but Ryder does a tremendous job helping the viewer chart the progress of her character. Susanna by no means gets better right away — in fact, her exposure to Jolie's character makes her turn for the worse. Susanna enters the hospital confused, and Ryder evolves the character into the highs of sanity and the depths of depression with skill.

But the Oscar buzz for this movie already is swarming around Jolie — and rightfully so. While her character also evolves in the movie, the most impressive scenes are when Jolie completely cuts loose and the viewer seems chilled by the overwhelming sense of illness and insanity. Her character is eerie in her mixture between victim and villain.

This movie also marks one of the few films directed by James Mangold, who also adapted the screenplay from Kaysen's book. Mangold also wrote and directed "Cop Land" in 1997, which also received critical acclaim, but Mangold has done little else.

And like "Cop Land," this movie is good not because of the compelling story, but because of well-crafted characters and actors who fit the bill flawlessly.

"Girl Interrupted" is the true story of Susanna Kaysen, whose prescribed "short rest" at a mental institution becomes a two-year-long stay. Susanna (Winona Ryder) must choose between the world of people who belong on the inside of the institution — like Lisa (Angelina Jolie) — or the often difficult world of reality on the outside figure significantly.

"Basically, we need lots of concrete," Benson said.

Although the group has not yet reached its goal, Benson said the project has already been something of a success.

"I think it's been a wonderful opportunity for the kids," Benson said. "They're able to do something for themselves and for the community. It teaches them to get involved.

"Government is not them. It's us," she said.

Jonathan Mitchell, freshman in public relations and organizer of the skate park in Junction City, said although the park just opened in Junction City, adding one in Manhattan would still be good for the youth of the area.

If the group reaches its goal, Mitchell said its efforts would be appreciated by the entire community.

"It shows what the kids can do when they set their minds to it," Mitchell said.

One person who is pulling for the group is Riley County Police Department Lt. Buddy Mays. He said that, although he cannot remember the last time someone was issued a ticket for skateboarding in the city, there are occasional complaints that had to be dealt with about where skateboarders are skating.

There also have been tragic instances that would make a park beneficial, Mays said.

"A few years ago, we had a fatality accident up on Stagg Hill involving a skateboarder," Mays said. "The accidents are few and far between, but it does pose a dangerous problem for both the skateboarder and the pedestrian."

Safety is just one of the concerns that prompted the youth to push for a skate park, but with half the funds raised, McCants said he does not intend to slow down.

"People are helping out as much as ever," McCants said. "We don't want them to think we have let off pressure and everything is quieting down."

McCants said he does not want to let the pressure off because they deserve a place to skate.

"Skateboarding and rollerblading are legitimate sports, just like baseball and football," McCants said. "There are legal places for them. We should have ours."

Until that time, McCants said, they will continue to skate any place they can find, legal or not.

SKATEBOARD

often were threatened with tickets and hassled by military police in Fort Riley. Now, just more than one year later, the park is complete.

"We expect a really good turnout," Mitchell said. "We'll get people from as far as Salina and Lawrence, because our park is better than Lawrence's, and — until we built this park — their's was the best in the area."

Junction City engineer Tom Niell, who was in charge of the construction of the park, said that with only the skate park in Salina as a comparison, the Junction City one was exceptional.

"Relative to that one, I'm very pleased with it," Niell said. "I think it will allow the kids to do a lot more than the Salina park. It turned out to be more than I expected it to be."

Mitchell said that although the park is now finished and has exceeded some expectations, the road was not always so smooth.

He said it has taken a lot of work on his part, and on the part of the many people who have helped him.

Despite the effort, though, he said it will foster good behavior by skateboarders.

"It's been pretty stressful getting it set up, but now we'll just have to worry about small problems, like graffiti," Mitchell said. "It will keep kids off the street and out of trouble."

Niell said Mitchell has been the driving force behind bringing this project to completion, and said he deserved praise for that.

Niell said Mitchell provided the spirit necessary to generate enough interest in the project to see it get done.

CAT CRAWL

president of its Pi Kappa Alpha chapter, said he came in support of his fraternity's new addition to their community service.

"The opportunity to sponsor this cause arose in our search for community-service ideas," he said. "The vice president of the house is friends with Shari, and we decided to do it. We will definitely be coming back next year. K-State is a great place to party, and this is a good cause."

Keola Mendenhall, senior in bakery science, heard about the event from a friend and thought it would be something new and interesting.

"Although everyone is drinking, and that is something that I enjoy, the flip side of this is supportive," he said. "You get a free T-shirt and hang out with all of these crazy people for a few hours."

By the end of the day, Jon Brand, a godparent of Katlyn's, said the Cat Crawl was a complete success.

"The turnout was so excellent that a second annual Cat Crawl can be expected next year," he said.

who fail to meet expectations.

His latest poll rating was beneath the intentionally low threshold his advisers set as a measure of accomplishment: the 31 percent showing by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., in a second-place finish behind then-President Jimmy Carter in the 1980 caucuses.

With the rest of the GOP field in single digits, Forbes has long said he is the conservative alternative to Bush.

The polls show that about one in 10 voters are undecided, giving the candidates incentive to campaign hard Sunday.

"The only thing I know to do is to encourage our folks to get out and vote. We need as big a vote as possible," Bush told reporters between campaign stops.

In a lengthy interview with ABC, Bush struggled with his explanation for supporting a sales tax increase in Texas after making a no-tax pledge. The second-term governor said he had qualified the promise by also pledging to reform education funding in the state, an effort that presumably led to the tax proposal.

Dismissing the issue, Bush said, "There's pledges all the time" and reviewed a record as governor that included two major tax cuts.

He also continued to flesh out his views on abortion, a critical issue to many GOP caucus-goers. Asked about the topic for the fourth day, he predicted that Texas would outlaw first-trimester abortions if the Supreme Court reversed itself and let states impose strict anti-abortion laws — a position Bush says the court should take.

Maintaining a caucus tradition, several campaigns had supporters papering churches and parking lots with leaflets. Religious conservatives represent a third of likely caucus-goers and are more likely than most voters to attend the sessions.

Telefund to raise money for K-State

■ Fund-raisers hope to bring in $1.2 million.

By COURTNEY DUFFIELD
Kansas State Collegian

The world's largest all-volunteer telefund to raise money for higher education has kicked off at K-State.

"We raise a substantial amount of money that is returned to the colleges," said Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving at the KSU Foundation.

Dowell said the KSU Foundation Telefund's goal is to raise $1.2 million dollars. He said on average it raises $60,000 each night.

"We try to increase it a little each year," Dowell said. "Our goal last year was $1.1 million, and at the end we made $1.127 million."

Dowell said there are individual prizes given to the volunteer callers. A car is even given to one random volunteer.

The car is on display on campus and provides more information about the Telefund.

Dowell said a brochure detailing all the prizes is sent to students after they sign up to work. The Telefund is at the Foundation in the Hollis Telefund Center, which has 80 phones.

About 1,500 student volunteers will call alumni from their colleges and ask for donations, Dowell said.

"Students can sign up through their college," Dowell said.

Virginia Moxley, dean of human ecology, said the College of Human Ecology elects two students to be on the Human Ecology Council. Those two students then pick one person from each organization in the College of Human Ecology to help recruit students to volunteer at the Telefund.

The most productive way the College of Human Ecology finds people to help is through word-telefund prizes

To volunteer for Telefund 2000, students can sign up at their dean's office. About $45,000 in prizes from alumni, friends and the business community will benefit Telefund 2000 callers. Here are just a few of the possibilities.

Grand prizes
Students completing a 6-10 p.m. calling session will be eligible for up to $30,000 in Parents Telefund Scholarships and an array of other prizes, including a 1999 Plymouth Neon.

10 p.m. prizes
Each night, up to 25 prizes, including food, clothing, certificates and services, are distributed via random telephone calls.

Milestone prizes
When Telefund's overall total hits a $25,000, $50,000 and $75,000 mark, the caller making the milestone call will receive Manhattan Town Center certificates worth $25, $50 and $75.

Jonas Stewart, junior in political science, got his start in politics with his mother during the 1984 presidential campaign when he was 5 years old. Stewart, a member of K-State Young Democrats, leaves this week for New Hampshire, where he will work on Bill Bradley's campaign.

Passion for politics motivates student to help Bradley camp

Jonas Stewart was only 5 years old when he entered the arena of politics.

He vaguely remembers going door-to-door with his mother promoting the 1984 Democratic primary candidate Jesse Jackson.

Jackson might not have made it past the primaries, but Stewart, once again is campaigning for the candidate whom he deems as the best man for the job, and he is hopeful that Election 2000 will bring about someone who is ready to make a change.

"One reason there could be so much apathy with people our age is we've had a series of candidates who aren't very radical when it comes to change in either direction," he said. "We need someone who does what he feels and not what the polls say."

Stewart, member of K-State Young Democrats, leaves this week for New Hampshire, where he will lend a hand to Bill Bradley's campaign to beat out primary front-runner Al Gore. While in New Hampshire, Stewart will be going door-to-door talking to people and trying to sway any undecided votes.

On the local level, the Young Democrats, along with the College Republicans, will be creating programs on campus to increase voter turnout and political awareness.

The Young Democrats will sponsor voter registrations at various spots around campus this fall, Stewart said. As for this semester, the group is talking about having a mock debate with people impersonating presidential candidates.

Mark Barkman, state vice-chair for College Republicans, said they are also planning some events and activities down the road.

"There will be concerted efforts to bring about better voter turnout," he said. "We should get the ball rolling pretty soon."

Once the two groups collaborate and coordinate events, it will be up to each individual to decide which issues are the most important, Barkman said.

"I have a hard time coming up with what should be important to each person," he said. "To each their own. All students don't have one important issue."

Michael Oldfather, faculty adviser for Young Democrats, said he is unsure of what the most pressing issues will be in the upcoming election.

"This is the first election that I don't have a sense of what the biggest issue is," he said. "But, so far, the polls say health care."

Bush slips past Forbes as Gore wins big over Bradley

The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — Opening the presidential election season, Republican George W. Bush won Iowa's caucuses in a closer than expected race against conservative publisher Steve Forbes. Vice President Al Gore breezed to a Democratic victory over Bill Bradley and declared, "I can't wait to get to New Hampshire."

Forbes' showing set the stage for a three-way showdown in New Hampshire's Feb. 1 primary. Sen. John McCain of Arizona holds a slight lead in most GOP polls in that state and hoped to sustain it even after bypassing Iowa where Forbes took advantage.

Bush described the caucus results as a validation of his compassionate conservative agenda.

"It's a solid victory, and I'm humbled," he told the Associated Press as the presidential campaigns put the best-possible spins on their finishes.

Forbes said, "we vastly overperformed the polls and have emerged as the conservative candidate" going into New Hampshire. He told the AP, "I'll take more losses like that, and I'll win the nomination."

With results from 86 percent of Iowa's counties, Bush had 41 percent of the caucus vote and Forbes 30 percent. Former Amb. Alan Keyes was a respectable third at 14 percent, with Gary Bauer at 9 percent, John McCain 5 and Orrin Hatch just 1.

Forbes started, and funded, a particularly vigorous campaign here, calling on Academic equity focus for center

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

Many years have passed since a court case that originated in Kansas led to the desegregation of all schools in the United States.

However, educational institutions still are in need of assistance when it comes to creating a hospitable environment for students.

The Midwest Equity Assistance Center, on the fourth floor of Bluemont Hall, is an organization created just for this reason, director Charles Rankin said.

"The Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education decision upset the school systems in this country," Rankin said. "Lyndon B. Johnson made available assistance to school districts who were grappling with dissolving the dual school system that existed, by and large, in 18 Southern states."

Funded by the U.S. Department of Justice through the U.S. Department of Education, the assistance center deals with the well-being of 3 million students in 2,200 school districts in Kansas, Iowa, Missouri and Nebraska.

The center employs specialists in the fields of bilingual education, communications, elementary and secondary education, public relations and school psychology, as well as computer technicians and librarians.

"We're here for three main reasons," Rankin said. "We're here for technical assistance, professional development and information dissemination."

The organization first opened its doors Oct. 1, 1973, at the University of Missouri, operating as the Midwest Equal Opportunities Center. The organization's move to the K-State cam

Car accident leaves Chiefs' linebacker paralyzed

■ Derrick Thomas faces surgery for fractures to spinal column.

By DOUG TUCKER
The Associated Press

LIBERTY, Mo. — Derrick Thomas, one of the most feared pass rushers in NFL history, has a broken neck and back and might never walk again.

The star linebacker of the Kansas City Chiefs has paralyzed legs following a car crash on an icy road in which his friend was killed.

Thomas has use of his arms and upper chest, and doctors hold out hope he might fully recover. Doctors said the 33-year-old player faces extensive rehabilitation and probably will have surgery.

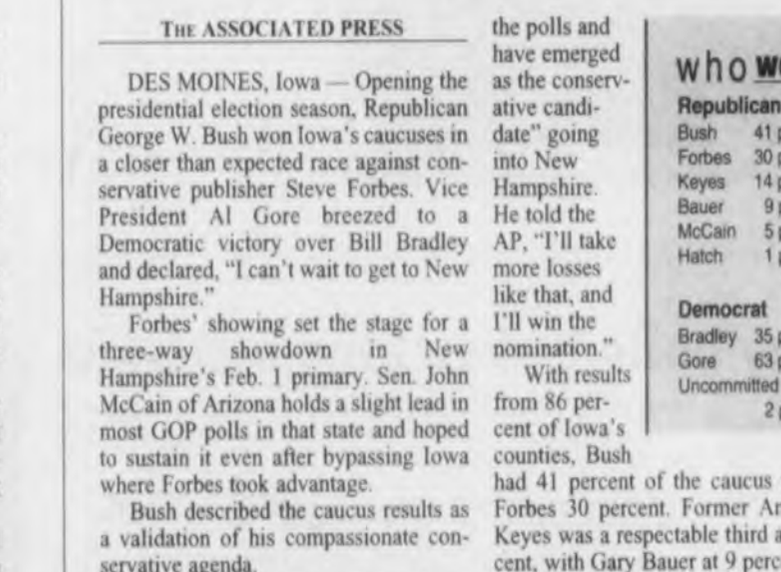
"I don't think you can say anything right now," Dr. Jon Browne, the Chiefs' team physician, said Monday. "These type of injuries have a mind of their own and a treatment pattern of their own. They're all uniquely and individually different."

Thomas was being transferred from the Liberty Memorial Hospital to the Ryder Trauma Center at Jackson Memorial Hospital in Miami. Thomas was born in Miami, and his mother lives there.

Friends and teammates came to the hospital Monday. Also visiting was Steve Palermo, a former American League umpire who was shot in 1991 and left partially paralyzed.

"Do not rule anything in," said Palermo, a Kansas City resident and friend of Thomas. "And do not rule anything out. He understands the gravity of it. But he's also very optimistic."

Thomas has fractures in vertebrae in his neck and back.



"Derrick's injuries are primarily to the spinal column," Browne said. "He does have some neurological impairment, which is continuing to evolve."

With an infections smile and fun-loving attitude, Thomas is one of the most popular athletes in Kansas City history, almost on a par with baseball great George Brett. Friends dubbed him "social director of the NFL."

"We drafted this young man 11 years ago, and you hope for a lot of things from a No. 1 draft choice," Chiefs president Carl Peterson said. "But he's given of himself far beyond anything I could hope for. He's touched so many lives."

Thomas was driving with two friends to Kansas City International Airport on Sunday headed for the NFC Championship game in St. Louis.

TAKE note

Diversity awards. Two K-State staff members received awards for a commitment to diversity.

Patricia Hudgins and Keener Tippin were the recipients of the Drum Major Award. The award is given to people who demonstrate outstanding advocacy, leadership and a continuing commitment to diversity on campus.

Kathy Greene, co-chair of the Martin Luther King Observance Committee, said the recipients exemplify certain aspects of King's beliefs.

"The recipient is one who demonstrates a commitment to diversity, who exemplifies a day on, not a day off," Greene said.

The recipients were nominated and awarded by the MLK Observance Committee, which is composed of university faculty and staff, along with other campus-related organizations.

Tippin, research news coordinator for News Services, said receiving the award was an honor to have his efforts recognized.

"It's an honor to be recognized by my colleagues for my leadership and advocacy for diversity, but it's a bigger honor to be mentioned along with some of the other recipients of the award," Tippin said.

Tippin was previously the co-chair of the MLK Observance Week Committee for two years and has also served on the Black Faculty/Staff Alliance.

Hudgins said she was surprised and honored to receive the award.

"Sometimes when you juggle things and you are the behind-the-scenes person, you don't expect to be recognized," Hudgins said. "You do all of the work so others can be glorified."

Hudgins has served on the MLK Observance Week Committee for five years and was the co-chair for two years.

"I really felt very honored to be a recipient of the award considering the previous recipients — to think that you could be thought of as highly on campus as some of the people who have been past recipients," Hudgins said. "It's something I'll cherish for a long time."

Man detained for fatalities from smuggling operation

LAS CRUCES, N.M. — A 23-year-old man accused of organizing a smuggling operation that ended in a fatal crash in southern New Mexico appeared in federal court here Monday and was ordered held pending a detention hearing.

No hearing date was immediately set for Gonzalo Ruiz Diaz of Chihuahua, Mexico, said Patricia Chavez, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque.

Diaz was being retained in the Dona Ana County Detention Center.

U.S. Border Patrol spokesman Doug Mosier of El Paso, Texas, said Diaz was driving a carryall ferrying nearly two dozen illegal Mexican immigrants when it overturned Friday on U.S. Highway 70 about halfway between Alamogordo and Las Cruces after a tire blew out.

One man, 30-year-old Luis Cantellano, was killed, and 20 other passengers were injured.

"The smuggling originated in central El Paso, and in Las Cruces they picked up a second group," Mosier said. "I think it's definitely part of a smuggling operation that may have been transporting illegal immigrants for quite some time."

A criminal complaint against Diaz accuses him of bringing illegal aliens into the United States from Mexico and of aiding in their transportation once they were in this country.

The complaint said Diaz, himself an illegal immigrant, made arrangements for the immigrants to travel from Las Cruces to Fort Worth, Texas, and then on to Kansas.

Dress-code public hearings earn state Senate approval

TOPEKA — A proposal to require local school boards to have public hearings about whether they should adopt dress codes won the endorsement of the Senate Education Committee on Monday.

Senate Majority Leader Tim Emert offered a successful amendment to his own bill, which originally would have required school districts to adopt policies requiring students to wear uniforms.

"This bill started out as a mandate, and, quite frankly, it was just to get some attention for the bill," Emert, R-Independence, said.

Emert said he still thinks uniform dress encourages discipline and reduces disruptions caused by students picking on each other for not wearing designer clothes.

However, he said each school should be able to make its own decision on the matter.

"All the research shows that if it's going to work, you don't mandate it," Emert said. "It's that kind of thing that has got to come from people wanting it."

The bill, which the committee approved on a unanimous voice vote, would require school boards to have hearings about dress codes by the end of the year.

At the suggestion of Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, Emert included a provision allowing students to provide input on standardized dress.

Chairwoman Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, suggested that teachers should have to abide by the same dress code as students.

"It would raise a lot of hackles if students weren't allowed to come in their Levi's and sweats and teachers were," she said.

Although the bill would leave the decision on standardized apparel to local school boards, it would set certain criteria for any dress codes that were adopted.

For instance, the bill would exempt students whose parents object on religious or philosophical grounds.

The bill also would provide financial assistance or required apparel to poor students.

Carolinas, Florida struck by winter thunderstorms, sleet

A wintery mix fell on the Carolinas Monday while thunderstorms hit Florida.

Snow and sleet fell over interior sections of the Carolinas, and as much as 9 inches accumulated in some places.

The heavy, wet snow broke tree limbs and power lines in both states. Coastal areas of the Carolinas reported rain while Florida saw heavy thunderstorms and wind.

K-State researcher's bacteria cleanses polluted soil

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It can't sit, stay or roll over, but a K-State researcher and his team have a bacteria that still does an impressive trick: it eats pollutants.

For the past five years, George Marchin, associate professor of biology, has been looking at soil samples containing a strain of the bacteria, Bacillus thuringiensis. What makes it so special, he said, is it can survive concentrations of the toxic metal chromium, which kills most bacteria, and it can defuse the concentrations.

Marchin said the samples were taken from Crawford County, Kan., an area in the southeast historically contaminated with heavy metals such as chromium from old mining operations.

Chromium, found naturally in soil, plants, water and animals, exists in two forms important to humans.

One, chromium III, is actually a nutrient required by the human body in tiny amounts. However, industries such as chrome plating, dye manufacturing and welding can convert it to chromium VI, which has been linked to lung cancer, complications during pregnancy and other disorders, according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

Marchin said this thuringiensis strain is special because it has adapted a way to reverse the chromium III/chromium VI change. An organism like thuringiensis represents the essence of bioremediation because it converts a poison instead forcing health officials to start a more complicated toxin removal, he said.

"Industrial technology created the chromium problem. Bioremediation technology can solve the problem," Marchin said. "That's the way I see it."

So far, Marchin said he and his team have been trying to find ways to give their bacteria's secret weapon, a chromium reductase enzyme, to other organisms.

Novik Nurhidayat, graduate student in microbiology, has been working with Marchin on the project for the past three years. Along the way, he wrote his master's thesis about the chemical makeup of the reductase enzyme and the location of its genes. Now he said he is writing his doctorate on the genetic sequence of the enzyme and how it is expressed.

In his native Indonesia, Nurhidayat said chromium and other heavy metals are common contaminants with the developing nation's factories. Learning how the thuringiensis strain adapted could make detoxifying easier and faster, he said.

"The more we know, the more we appreciate microbes," he said.

The genes for the enzyme have been mapped, cloned and sequenced, Marchin said, and there is interest in trying to place them into other organisms.

"There's a thesis full of numbers," he said, "You turn it over to agricultural engineers or chemical engineers at this point."

Marchin said he has sent samples to professors at the Uniformed Services University of Health Sciences, a military medical school in Bethesda, Md. The professors are interested in putting the gene into a radiation-resistant bacteria.

Meanwhile, K-State researchers are looking in a similar direction. Judy Roe, assistant professor in biology, said Marchin approached her about a year ago about putting the reductase genes into a plant.

The advantage, Roe said, is a plant with the gene might be able to take in chromium VI, convert it and keep it in the tissues of the plant. If the chromium still needs to be removed, it can be plucked out with the plants instead of attacking soils with complicated chemical means.

"According to what I've read, it's a lot cheaper, so it might actually get done," she said.

Roe said one "model organism" she is considering is Arabidopsis thaliana, a close relative of broccoli that's easily grown and produces lots of seeds. Roe said Arabidopsis also has a small collection of genes, one twenty-third the size of a human genome, making it easier to to insert new genes and control where they are expressed in the plant.

Lack of permit forces display to be removed

BY TANNER EHMKE

The 27th anniversary of Roe vs. Wade, the Supreme Court ruling to legalize abortion, came and went Saturday. A small group of students and faculty attempted to ensure that it would not go unnoticed.

Late Thursday night and early Monday morning, a group of six students and faculty decorated the free-speech zone north of the K-State Student Union with 150 posters to commemorate the anniversary. However, their efforts ultimately fell into the hands of grounds keepers who removed the decorations off the construction fences, shrubs and bushes soon after they were posted.

Dory Branch, graduate student in English, helped chalk the sidewalks and put up the posters to keep abortion legal and safe for women.

"Pro-life supporters get much publicity," Branch said. "The other side should be represented as well."

The group of friends and students who heard about the project made one attempt to display the posters at 10 p.m. Thursday, Branch said. The following morning, the posters were gone. The group's second attempt to post the material occurred between 7:30 and 8 a.m. Monday, she said.

"It's something we care about," Branch said. "Women have died because of illegalizing abortions."

Facilities Support Services Manager Loleta Sump said the posters were removed because there was no identification of any registered student group on the material, and they did not get approval to display the posters.

"We approve the time, place and manner of distribution of literature," Sump said. "Freedom of speech can occur anywhere, but we don't want litter on the campus."

If there had been any identification on the posters, Sump said, she would have contacted the group to work something out.

Sump said there are three areas to distribute literature on campus without approval: the free-speech zone, the quad between Calvin and Kedzie halls and McCain Auditorium, and the quad between Waters and Willard halls and Hale Library. The literature must be distributed by hand, she said.

People also can post literature on the public bulletin boards with no approval. However, it must say who it is from.

You'll never want to sell this book back.

Mega-mergers stretching limits of capitalism

In his cartoon, "This Modern World," on Jan. 19, Tom Tomorrow depicts Larry King interviewing Steve Case of America Online and Gerald Levin of Time Warner — with their respective heads sharing the same body. In the last panel, King asks the duo if they had any plans for further expansion.

"We can't really talk about that right now, Larry," says Levin.

"But let's just say we have plenty of room for Bill Gates' head," Case finishes as his counterpart chuckles. Three days later, Tomorrow's ironic prediction came true — sort of. Just replace Gates with EMI's Ken Berry.

The merger between Time Warner and EMI comes only two weeks after Time Warner's multi-billion dollar merger with AOL. The merger between Time Warner and the music powerhouse is just one in what seems like an endless parade of mega corporations buying each other to become mega-mega corporations, breaking records only set months (or in this case, weeks) before.

Some will argue this is merely capitalism at work, the greased wheels of the American machine turning. It's not that simple. When mergers become the trend, as they have, the word "capitalism" is being abused. Having the chance to succeed in business is woven into the American fabric, as well as having a competitive market, but there have to be limits, even in a capitalistic society.

A satirical newspaper, "The Onion," predicts the final merger in its book "Our Dumb Century": "Under the terms of the record $9.2 quadrillion merger, the Global Tetrahedron Conglomerate gains controlling shares of its final two competitors, Time-WarturABC- DissonylumbiaAT&T and Lockheed -ZweibSKBank, creating what company spokespersons called 'an unstoppable juggernaut wielding unparalleled wealth and power.' "

That is not capitalism.

Right or wrong, abortion will continue in America

Editor,

I believe Scott Roney's column on abortion makes many good points about the subject. I personally don't agree with abortion, but I do believe choice is necessary. Even if abortion were illegal, people still would get abortions. The only difference would be the amount of danger involved for the mother.

Let's relate this to the 18th amendment of the United States' Constitution. This is the one about prohibition. It failed miserably. Even though alcohol was illegal and more costly, people still drank. I believe that if abortion were illegal, back-alley clinics would open up all around the country offering services to women. The services from these clinics would not equal present abortion clinic quality. Therefore, the danger factor would increase dramatically.

No, abortion is not the answer to our cultural problems. But it does provide relief for a few people who have no other way out. It is better to give this relief by the skilled hand of a doctor than the unqualified hands of a quasi-surgeon.

ATM lures gambler to win lost money back rather than walk away

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

VIEWPOINT

JEFF ELLIOTT

This is a true story about two friends of mine, Bob and Stan. Their names have been changed, but the story remains unchanged.

Bob and Stan went to the riverboats in Kansas City, Mo., a few months after Stan turned 21.

They spent the first five minutes or so walking around the casino and adjusting to the foreign environment. With so many tables from which to choose, they finally sat down at a $5 blackjack table and tried their luck.

Bob — the more level-headed of the two — kept his bets small and consistent. Stan — the erratic one — went down $15 on the first three hands. Instead of slowly trying to get it back, he dropped three more $5 chips in the little circle and was ready to party.

Dealer had blackjack.

$30 in the hole, and with two $5 chips left, Stan let it ride — and got burned again.

Losing his personally set $40 limit in 15 minutes, Stan got up and went straight to the ATM — an act that would set the tone for casino trips to come.

By the time Bob, Stan and their friends wanted to go to another casino, Stan was down $50. Determined not to let the house get the best of him, Stan walked to another table on his way out the door and bet $50.

Dealer busted — Stan left even.

When they arrived at the new riverboat, Bob and the others went to the bar outside of the casino. Stan decided to try his luck inside.

A few bad bets and one ATM transaction later, Stan went back to the bar and found his friends drinking and watching SportsCenter.

Down $200, Stan refused to divulge the severity of his losses. Instead, he followed his friends into the second casino on the riverboat and made his way to the ATM.

After all was said and done, Stan went home $300 poorer — a minor loss compared to how much he would lose in the months to come.

Bob and Stan had many more adventures at the casinos. Bob, playing it safe, lost a little, and then won a little. Usually, he left even.

Stan — on the other hand — got creative and took his student-loan money with him.

A few months later, Stan was down $2,000.

This, however, is not as shocking as his winter break gambling finale.

Bob grew tired of watching Stan's debts grow with each attempt to win it back and told him he would not go along anymore.

Late one night, Stan steered his car onto the highway by himself, eager to win his money back.

Walking past the crowded $5 blackjack tables, he found a seat at a $25 minimum table.

Ten minutes later, Stan was broke and signed for a $200 cash advance on his credit card.

Fifteen minutes later, he was back at the cashier's booth, repeating the same process as before.

Then, Stan's luck changed.

With $250 worth of green $25 chips in front of him, Stan bet $200. He landed a seven and a four.

In blackjack, you almost always double down on an 11. Stan didn't have enough to double his total bet, but he slid his remaining $50 out there.

Face card.

After that, Stan hit an unbelievable winning streak. Betting $100 at time, he was up $1,000 after 1 1/2 hours. Content with walking away with $900 if he lost, Stan bet a black $100 chip and won.

Thirty minutes later, Stan had turned that $100 chip into another $1,000.

Then his luck ran out.

Sitting there with the $300 that he originally had lost, plus the $2,100 that he was up, Stan thought about walking away. It was 3 a.m. — the time he promised himself he would leave.

Although his debts had been erased and a casino pit boss was standing next to him watching his every move, Stan kept playing.

A new dealer came to the table and took everything Stan had won in 15 minutes.

Stan left the casino even on the night, and once again, he was $2,000 in debt. He walked away with nothing more than a good story.

If you gamble, learn from Stan's mistake: if you are winning, walk away with a profit. If you are losing, be willing to accept a loss.

If you haven't guessed yet — I'm Stan.

The gambling industry makes billions of dollars each year off of people like me.

Don't let them make you another sucker.

Lunar eclipse important to more than just loonies

VIEWPOINT

TARYN FORT

Thursday was the first full moon and lunar eclipse of the new millennium.

As has been observed with every such celestial occurrence, the crazies come to life and any activity becomes free reign. I would love to see some figures on whether there is a surplus of callers to the psychic networks on such a night. Do you suppose antique brooms are taken for a ride like some take an antique car for a drive every month?

A lunar eclipse or full moon functions not only as a celestial phenomenon. This occasion seems to ignite a sort of supernaturalness in everyone.

Spastic human nakedness makes its way into public, and original reasons for a theme party become available.

Parents and children set out for a night of telescopes and ridiculous-looking contraptions. The excitement of adults and children sometimes is equal on a night of eclipses and full moons. Maturity is not really a needed component to this situation.

Some people — like a king — freak out so much they die and leave three sons in a battle over the throne of a country named Bavaria. Not to worry, though. This happened in A.D. 840 and led to the division of the countries of France, Germany and Italy.

Eclipses seem to have come in handy around the world, throughout the spectrum of time.

Since the moon supposedly is associated with human behavior and emotion, it is logical that all the loonies of the world are given the chance to speak up during an eclipse or full moon. In accordance, the normals of the world usually go a little loony. It's like a crazy holiday that only occurs every few years: something with the potential of Mardi Gras but with a supernatural twist.

The same processes that make a sunset red are what make the moon reddish-orange during a lunar eclipse. A lunar eclipse actually is the sun, earth and moon falling into a completely straight line. The moon becomes caught in the earth's shadow. Some say the familiarity people feel toward the moon creates more wonder. Don't deny it. I saw all of those people standing on their lawns Thursday night. It was cold out and even though David Letterman was not on yet, you were checking that eclipse out.

Although the excitement of an eclipse is more understood now, eclipses have had a negative overtone for centuries.

Before the luxuries of street and neon beer lights, people actually walked in complete darkness (unbelievable, I know). So when a lunar eclipse occurred, people freaked out, believing it was a bad omen.

The ancient Chinese believed something was consuming the moon, giving it the term "chih," which means "to eat." The red color was associated with blood spreading across the face of the moon.

Ancient Chaldeans believed an eclipse displayed the moon's wrath. Thus, famine, disease and natural disasters were bound to occur. Whether this proved to be true, I have no idea. My guess is that if it did, it was coincidence.

Babylonians tried to see which quadrant of the moon was most eclipsed.

Taking that direction, they made a geographical indicator of who would suffer the most.

An entire Athenian fleet was destroyed mainly because of its belief that an eclipse was a bad omen. The fleet decided to delay pulling out of a two year siege, resulting in the Athenian democracy being overthrown. Its civilization permanently declined.

Christopher Columbus also had a run-in with the loony-lunar.

In 1503, Columbus and his crew were stranded in Jamaica, and the natives had ceased giving them food. This was after a few months, mind you. I do not believe they were trying to starve them.

Columbus learned an eclipse was coming soon and told the natives God would be displeased, and the moon would be removed. Needless to say, manipulation was an art even then. The stranded crew got its food and then Columbus found America. Not much to do in a short span of time, but then again, some people are capable of getting whatever they want (usually with that magical element of life: money).

Even the brilliant and underrated Albert Einstein was aided by an eclipse. Although it was a solar and not a lunar eclipse, it helped to prove his now-famous Theory of General Relativity.

Even though I leave you informed lunar-eclipse readers, I have not touched a brink of the information that also is available on celestial phenomena.

Try the Internet. Try to read a book. If that is too much, read a magazine article. I suspect there might be one in some weekly magazine this week. Try not to get too drunk in appreciation of the next occasion at which this phenomena may be witnessed. Try to get to California (I'm thinking Santa Monica), because the next one will be July 16, which will be best seen on the West Coast.

With tax season now only a few brief months away, students, faculty alike search for ways to find a tax break

FILE PHOTO ILLUSTRATION BY CLIF PALMBERG/COLLEGIAN

BY JOSH BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Punctuality and organization are the keys for students to avoid a tax-induced heart attack in April, said Richard Ott, professor of accounting.

Tax season might seem far off, but this is the time of year to start working toward the April 15 deadline, Ott said.

"The key is to just get your materials organized," he said. "Even if you take your statements to someone to prepare your taxes for you, get everything organized."

Most of the tax professionals will provide a booklet that will ask you information on dependents or itemized deductions, Ott said.

"If you fill that booklet out ahead of time, before you see your tax preparer, it will save you money in the long run because they obviously will not have to take as much time preparing your return," he said. "A lot of people get those booklets and ignore them, but it will save you money in the long run."

Another key for college students, Ott said, is to know how your loans and tax credits figure into the picture.

Student loans are a deduction for income off the interest on a loan, and you don't have to itemize them to receive the benefit. The maximum deduction for student loans is $1,500 in 1999.

The deduction is subject to some limitations. It is fazed out for individual single taxpayers with a modified adjustment gross income of $40,000 to $55,000.

"After $55,000 you can't take the deduction," Ott said. "And if you file married or joint, those numbers are $60,000 to $75,000.

"If you're a student, you are obviously not making that kind of money."

Students also should be aware of the Hope and Lifetime learning credits, Ott said. Those are two credits that students or their parents might be able to take. The Hope Learning Credit, which generally is for the first two years of college, can provide up to $2,000 in tax credit for any qualifying expenses.

A Lifetime Learning Credit, for post-Hope credit years, is worth up to $1,000.

For students or anyone without much tax savvy, a tax adviser is highly recommended by Ott.

"I just let my mom take care of my taxes," Jesse Tucker, senior in agriculture business, said. "The present tax laws are far too complicated for my feeble mind."

Ott said he hears that same story all the time.

"I think it tends to make many people insecure to do their taxes, and I think that is why so many turn to a tax professional," Ott said. "They want someone else to take the responsibility for it."

It is a good idea to talk with a tax professional, Ott said. He said the regulations are so complicated that a student needs to make sure they are staying within their legal limits while, at the same time, taking full advantage of their entitled benefits.

"There are certain little intricacies that you would do well by talking to a professional," Ott said.

Once everything is organized and accounted for the next step is to file, and electronic filing is definitely in, Ott said.

"I do know it's increasing more and more every year," he said. "People are becoming more comfortable with it."

The advantage is that the refund comes about two times quicker than a paper file, Ott said. Many computer programs also will check for any problems or missing information and the Internal Revenue Service will respond within 48 hours to confirm that your return has been accepted.

Kansas recently was listed in a national publication as one of the best states for e-filing income tax returns.

"Another advantage to filing electronically is that in many states, including Kansas, you can file federal and state returns at the same time," Ott said.

"Now is the time to start preparing your tax information," he said.

G-Phi sorority house undergoes renovations to update technology

BY GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More space and better technology is the main goal of a $950,000 renovation to the Gamma Phi Beta sorority's house, Nichole Kent, member and junior in advertising, said.

"I think the final product is something that we are all looking forward to," Kent said. "The renovations are a good way to take our chapter into the new millennium."

Funded through a loan, the house is being remodeled in order to provide members with larger living quarters, former chapter president Lindsay Vogel, said.

"We felt it was time to change," Vogel said. "All of the girls were asking for more space, so instead of losing them to apartments, we decided to go ahead with the renovations."

Along with enlarging rooms, the entire house is being wired with ethernet connections, a high-speed internet network that will link the house directly with the campus system.

"I think it is positive for the entire K-State campus," Kristen Corbin, chapter president, said. "We are keeping up with all the new technology and keeping the house up-to-date."

Vogel said the renovations will cause an increase in the house fee and the live-out fee for members in order to pay back the loan, but they intend on it boosting the number of members in the chapter.

"If anything, the new renovations will definitely increase awareness of the house because of the new technology," Kent said. "Hopefully, it will attract more members."

The renovations are estimated to be completed by the beginning of next year, Vogel said.

"We are suppose to be back in the house before Rush Week of next year so we can be prepared for new members," Vogel said.

All members of the sorority are moved out and are renting a vacant sorority house temporarily.

"We have moved into the former Tri Sig house," Kent said. "The transition has been a difficult change but we know it is worth it."

Corbin said members are keeping a positive attitude despite the movement from one house to the other in the middle of the year.

"I really think this is positive for the house," Corbin said. "We are all really excited to have it newly remodeled."

Stocks drop as interest-rate worries puncture optimism about earnings

BY EILEEN GLANTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Stocks plunged Monday as optimism about corporate earnings gave way to jitters about rising interest rates and the effect on profit growth.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 243.54 to close at 11,008.17, its steepest loss since Jan. 4, when it lost 359 points. The selloff was broad-based, with 27 of 30 Dow component stocks finishing lower.

Broader stock indicators also fell in a volatile session. The Nasdaq plummeted 139.32 points to close at 4,096.08, its worst point drop since it fell 150 points Jan. 5, and its fourth-biggest point decline ever.

The Standard & Poor's 500 fell 39.45 to 1,401.91, and the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell for the first time since Jan. 12, losing 10.99 to close at 522.95.

After a strong opening, stocks began to slide at midday as investors looked ahead to the next meeting of the Federal Reserve on Feb. 1 and 2.

In 1999, the Federal Reserve raised interest rates three times, hoping to keep inflation under control. While most economists see little evidence of inflation now, continued signs of economic strength have convinced some that inflation could escalate at any time.

The plummet comes a day before Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan's planned testimony before a Senate committee about the federal budget.

While Greenspan is not expected to specifically address interest rates, Federal Reserve watchers will carefully monitor his comments for any signs of the central bank's course, analysts said.

Hall not enrolled, technically not on football team

■ Leading rusher hopes to re-enroll, play next season.

BY MIKE VIETTI AND RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Joe Hall, K-State's leading rusher from last season, is not enrolled at K-State for the spring 2000 semester, and therefore, he is not now on the football team.

K-State head football coach Bill Snyder issued a statement about the situation through K-State Sports Information director Kent Brown.

"Joe is presently not enrolled in classes at Kansas State University and is considering options regarding the continuation of his education," Snyder said

HALL

Although Hall is not on the team at this time, Brown said the situation is subject to change.

"This doesn't necessarily preclude him from rejoining the team," Brown said.

When reached for comment at his home in Manhattan on Monday evening, Hall declined to elaborate on the reasons for his withdrawal from school, saying it was a mutual decision between him and the team.

"There are no hard feelings either way," Hall said. "It was just something I had to do."

Hall said he had entertained thoughts of transferring to a different school after the 1999 football season, but ultimately decided to stay at K-State. He would not discuss the reasons why he was considering transferring.

Despite his withdrawal from classes, Hall said he did not plan on leaving the Manhattan area.

"I just had to make some choices, and that's what I'm going through now," Hall said. "I'm not going anywhere."

Hall also said he hopes to re-enroll and that he plans to be back in uniform for the Wildcats' next season.

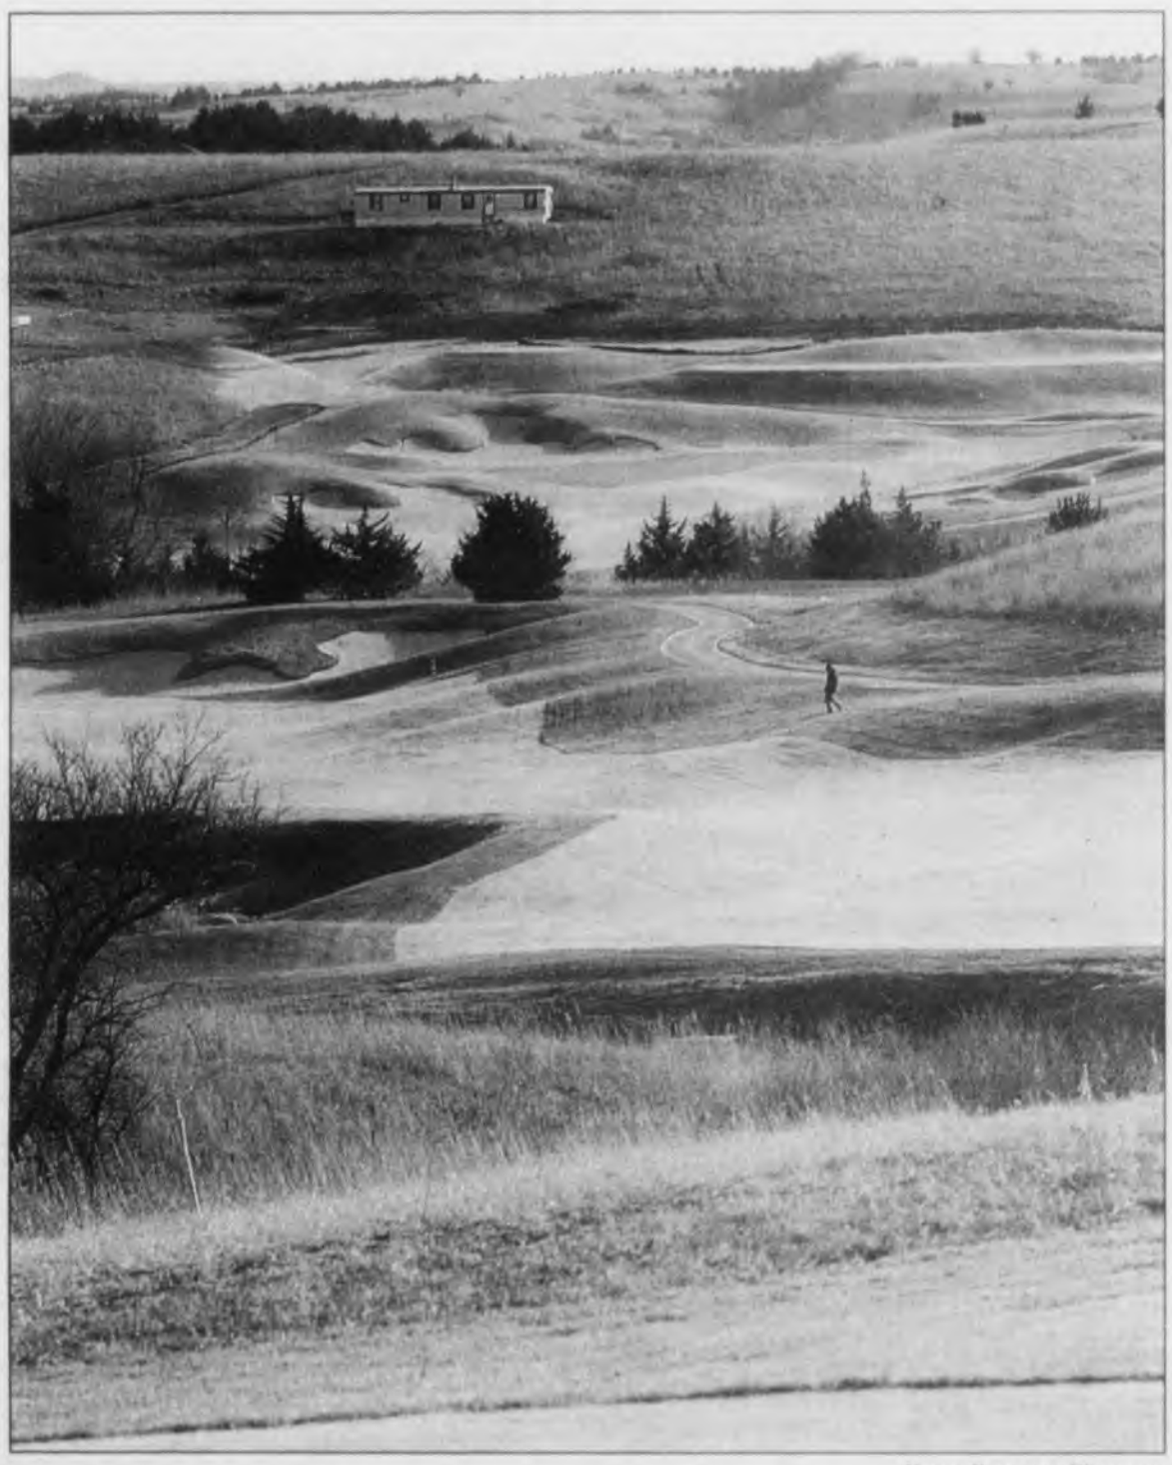
"I'll be playing next season, there's no question," he said.

Athletic Director Max Urick said Hall's current academic situation notwithstanding, it technically would be possible for him to be eligible to play football next season.

"Without knowing what Joe's credit hours and everything are right now, next year will depend on what happens between now and certification, which is next August," Urick said. "That's when eligibility is determined for next year."

Urick said Hall would need to accumulate a total of 24 credit hours and complete a certain percentage of the credits required for graduation to be eligible.

The 6-foot, 2-inch, 290-pound junior did not play in two of the Cats' 12 games last season. He was held out of the Texas game due to class attendance problems, and he also missed the regular-season finale against Missouri, six days after he was issued a minor in possession of alcohol citation.



"I just had to make some choices, and that's what I'm going through now. I'm not going anywhere."

— Joe Hall
Wildcat rusher

Despite missing games, Hall led K-State in rushing last season with 653 yards on 132 carries, while scoring six touchdowns. He gained starting status with a breakthrough performance against Utah State, carrying the ball 25 times for 195 yards and two touchdowns. Hall entered the game after junior running back David Allen left the contest in the first quarter with an injury.

He started the next three games, rushing for more than 100 yards against both Oklahoma State and Baylor. In doing so, Hall became the first K-State player to rush for more than 100 yards in three consecutive games since J.J. Smith did in 1994.

The Dallas Morning News named Hall to its second team All-Big 12 Conference squad.

Colbert Hills anticipates spring, grand-opening celebrations

BY CHRISTOPHER MCLEMORE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The wait is almost over for K-State golf enthusiasts.

Colbert Hills Golf Course is scheduled to open in late April, course officials said Monday.

Grand-opening activities will start April 28 and will continue for several days, according to Monte Griffin, executive director of the K-State Golf Course Management and Research Foundation.

An official agenda for the grand-opening ceremonies has not been formally announced. Griffin said there are a few events that are being finalized, and the agenda should be complete in the next few weeks.

While all of the festivities have not yet been formalized, Griffin said Jim Colbert, a K-State alumnus and the namesake of the course, will be present for dedication ceremonies.

"Jim Colbert intends on spending some time here in Manhattan," Griffin said. "He has played a large role in the development of the project."

The course will be open to the public May 6.

"Everyone will be welcome to play," Griffin said. "It will be a daily fee course, which means that a membership won't be required."

The exact green fees are still being decided upon, but Griffin said the fees will be more expensive than the green fees at other area courses. The fees are expected to be announced by March 1.

"This is a world-class golf course, so the fees will be more expensive," Griffin said. "But there will be a student rate available for those associated with the university."

The higher prices at Colbert Hills will be a result of the high cost to construct the course. The total cost for the course was more than $10 million, but Griffin said this is characteristic for a course the quality of Colbert Hills.

"It takes a lot of money to build golf courses," Griffin said. "A nice course like Colbert Hills will cost $10 million or more."

The completion of the course will finally give the K-State men's and women's golf teams a permanent home. K-State athletic director Max Urick said the course will help K-State compete with other Big 12 Conference schools.

"This is really important for the golf teams," Urick said. "We are the only school in the conference that isn't based out of a home course."

The men's and women's golf teams now rotate among local courses for practice and preparation. They utilize the Manhattan Country Club golf course for their tournaments. In the future, the teams will practice and have tournaments at Colbert Hills.

The 18-hole course will include a clubhouse, a driving range, a nine-hole par-3 training course and several practice areas.

The actual construction of the golf course began April 1998 and was finished October 1999.

"The course was finished from greens to tees at the end of October," Griffin said. "Now we're simply letting Mother Nature take its course."

While the greens have been completed, the course is still undergoing clean-up and a golf cart storage building is under construction. The clubhouse is also in the works.

Despite these ongoing cosmetic adjustments, the course will be ready when it is introduced to the public in the spring. Urick said he thinks both students and non-students will be pleased with the course.

"I'll be honest, I was flabbergasted when I saw the course," Urick said. "I am very enthusiastic about Colbert Hills because of the quality of the course and its design."

Griffin also said he thinks the course will be well received.

"Colbert Hills has far exceeded everyone's expectations," Griffin said. "I'm biased, but I think this course will be the best in the state, if not the four-state area.

"Everyone associated with K-State will be proud."

Women's basketball faces Goliath team at Iowa State

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team will face a David vs. Goliath-type matchup when they travel to No. 8/9 Iowa State tonight.

The Cats (9-10, 2-4) will face an Iowa State (14-2, 5-0) team that harbors a 10-game winning streak and an unblemished conference record. K-State, on the other hand, is looking to improve on what K-State head coach Deb Patterson called one of the team's worst performances of the season.

The Cats lost to Missouri 63-52, turning the ball over 30 times in the process. In addition, the Cats' leading scorer, senior forward Nicky Ramage, only managed to shoot the ball six times.

"We had trouble getting into our offense, and part of that was my fault, because I should have been posting up and keeping them on my back," Ramage said. "That's just something that's going to have to change, especially against Iowa State on Tuesday."

K-State will have to improve its game quickly against Iowa State for the Cats to have any chance at knocking off the Cyclones, Patterson said.

"If anything's going to motivate you to sharpen up quick, it's playing the No. 1 team in your league," Patterson said. "I look at that Iowa State matchup as something that immediately causes us to direct our vision forward, because if you don't, you know you're in for a lot of trouble."

Iowa State can cause trouble for opponents on both ends of the floor. The Cyclones are second in the Big 12 in both scoring offense and defense, and they have outscored their opponents by a conference-leading average of 17 points. Two Cyclone players, senior guard Stacy Frese and sophomore center Angie Welle, rank in the top seven in the Big 12 in scoring.

The 6-foot-4-inch Welle, who was named last week's Big 12 Player of the Week for her 24 point, eight rebound performance against Nebraska, might present the largest matchup problem for the Cats. Welle has scored more than 20 points in five games. The Cats will need senior forwards Angie Finkes and Ramage to step up against the big center.

Ramage said turnovers and putting the Missouri game behind them will be the keys to the game.

"It's over. We just can't think about it anymore," Ramage said. "We need to have a lot less turnovers when we go to Iowa State, a lot less."

Recent history does not favor the Cats tonight, as K-State has lost its last four in Ames.

"We have struggled our last two years up there," Patterson said. "And we understand that we're going to have to play at a much higher level to stay in the game."

Comparing scores

K-State lost Saturday to Missouri 52-63. When Iowa State faced the Tigers in Columbia on Jan. 5, the Cyclones won 79-67. The 12-point margin was the closest any Big 12 team has played Iowa State this season.

Record breaker

Junior guard Kim Woodlee snapped the Wildcat record in career three-point field goals made with two against Missouri, escalating her total to 178. Woodlee broke the mark previously held by Missy Decker (1993-1997).

Hurting in Hilton

Hilton Coliseum in Ames has not been hospitable to the Cats. K-State has not won at Iowa State since 1995; however, K-State leads the all-time series 34-14. Last year, K-State lost 86-53.

Ramage moving up

Nicky Ramage is climbing the record charts. She needs 34 points and 12 rebounds to move into 1000 point, 500 rebound club.

Too many turnovers leave team vulnerable; men lead Big 12 category with 20 this year

K-State's problems with turnovers have gotten out of hand.

Literally.

The K-State men's basketball team is giving away the basketball right and left, and with it, winnable games.

The Wildcats have become "Mr. Congeniality" of the Big 12, giving up possession of the ball with a smile and a kind pat on the back.

Some of these K-State turnovers come so effortlessly for the opposition I'm surprised they aren't being gift wrapped.

It's become so bad that K-State now leads the conference in the category, averaging a whopping 20 turnovers a game.

In the loss to Iowa State, K-State had three turnovers in the first minute alone. Three in one minute. At that rate, it would average 120 turnovers per game. That would be more than 3,000 turnovers in the course of the season, and I'm not counting the Big 12 tournament and the NIT. I am, of course, only speculating about a bid to the NIT.

In the game against Kansas, it was turnovers that sunk the Wildcats in the first half. K-State's comeback attempt in the second half was due in large part to solid play and a virtual elimination of turnovers.

Turnovers have become such a big part of each game I'm surprised there's not a special Classy Cat cheer or song the pep band plays every time the Wildcats lose possession.

The Wildcats have become so adept at giving things away you'd think they were working the free food counter at the local grocery store.

"Excuse me, Jeff Boschee. Have you tried a free turnover today? We've got an errant no-look pass that goes great with a three-on-one breakaway."

Maybe the team should come up with some kind of contest based on this turnover phenomenon. If the Wildcats commit fewer than 20 turnovers in a game, every fan in attendance gets a Taco Bell Enchirito. If they commit fewer than 10 turnovers, everyone gets a new house, season tickets and their own chartered jet. Boy, that would turn some heads.

Even though this problem has received so much attention, the turnover troubles cannot be pinned on only one player. This has been a total team effort. You know, the kind of teamwork that really can make a coach proud: a group of five guys pulling together to hand over the ball.

Of the top-20 players in turnover average in the Big 12, K-State has three: Tony Kitt, Galen Morrison and Cortez Groves. Several other Wildcats don't have far to go before they can be among the lucky few.

Part of the problem for the Wildcats is inexperience. True freshmen Quentin Buchanan and Donnie Wallace are becoming acclimated to the quickness and strength levels of Division I basketball.

But Buchanan and Wallace account for only 23 of K-State's 324 total turnovers.

The larger part of the problem is simply sloppy play. The Wildcats lose a lot of balls in transition because of consistently poor ball handling, ill-advised passes and problems getting the ball down the court and out of pressure.

Another factor in the wealth of turnovers is K-State's inability to establish a solid presence in the post position. The Wildcats have no consistent force under the basket, which causes the guards to force passes into the post, which translates into easy steals and miscues for the opposition.

The good news is that the turnover problem can be alleviated, if not eliminated, with time. Experience, practice and the return of Josh Reid in a couple of weeks should help put the problem to rest.

Hopefully, as the Wildcats move through the rest of the Big 12 schedule, they can put the turnover problem behind them by making the one turnover we would all support: a new leaf.

Career and Employment Services provides chance for students to hone interview skills

BY JUSTIN SCHUSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There is a lot more to landing a job than a good résumé, said Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services.

Schuley said interview skills are necessary for job candidates who want to prove to potential employers how they will fit into the company.

"It's a good opportunity to open doors for yourself."

— Marcy Atkinson, member of Mock Interview Committee

For students wishing to improve their interviewing skills, Career and Employment Services will coordinate mock interviews for students in the Colleges of Agriculture; Architecture, Planning and Design; Arts and Sciences; and Human Ecology.

The interviews, which take place at Holtz Hall, place students in a realistic situation with actual companies.

"It's a rehearsal for reality," Schuley said. "You'll get a critique of your performance."

Participating companies will conduct professional interviews as if they were considering the student for employment, Schuley said.

After the process, the interviewer will comment on things like a student's resume, delivery or attire.

Students wishing to participate can sign up online at the Career and Employment Service's home page. There is no cost, but students must be registered with Career and Employment Services, Schuley said.

Schuley said it's important to research a company before going into the interview.

Students can do this on the Career and Employment Service's home page or in person at Holtz.

"We have videos, binders and files on the companies," Schuley said.

Students also can prepare by talking to faculty or other students who have been through the process.

Marcy Atkinson, junior in industrial engineering and member of the Mock Interview Committee, said students will have the opportunity to increase their comfort level in the interview situation.

"It's a good opportunity to open doors for yourself," Atkinson said. "The more practice you have, the better you will be."

Aaron Henton, engineering manager for the Cerner Corp., said the main improvement most applicants need to make is an increase in confidence. Henton, a K-State graduate, has participated in this process as an interviewer for the past three years.

"I feel that it's a really good service for the students," Henton said. "I try to point out the things students do well to help them build confidence."

Here are the dates mock interviews will take place. For any questions on the mock interview process, call Career and Employment Services at 532-6802 or visit its web site at www.ksu.edu/ces.

Clinton aims to close pay gap

BY SONYA ROSS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton appealed Monday to members of Congress to do the right thing by closing the wage gap between working women and men. He suggested they could start by approving his $27 million plan to bolster enforcement of equal pay laws. Clinton proposed a similar request last year.

The president coupled his appeal with a request for Congress to approve a paycheck fairness act proposed by Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D. and Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., which would direct federal agencies to collect data about wage disparities and increase penalties for violating equal-pay statutes.

Clinton was joined by Michelle Akers, a member of the U.S. women's World Cup championship soccer team. Akers and her teammates have been boycotting training because they say they are paid less than the men's soccer team. They want raises from $3,150 per month to $5,000, plus bonuses of $2,000 per game.

"I want to stand here today for the women who have no voice," Akers said. "Women's sports and the view of women has changed a ton. However, we still have a ways to go. The battle is not over. We are still being discriminated against."

Women earn an average of 75 cents for every $1 men are paid, a disparity Clinton has noted in the past as evidence of social injustice.

For women of color, he said, the disparity is even greater: 64 cents for black women and 55 cents for Hispanic women.

"How would you like to show up for work every day, but only get to take home three out of every four paychecks?" Clinton asked. "It's not a women's issue. If a woman with a family is being denied equal pay for equal work, then her husband suffers. Her children suffer. The family dynamic suffers."

Under Clinton's plan, $10 million would go to the EEOC to train up to 3,000 employers and 1,000 staff inspectors about equal pay laws. Last year, Clinton proposed a similar, $14 million initiative that failed.

It would be the first time since the EEOC took responsibility for enforcement of equal pay laws in 1978 that the agency had money to train inspectors on the subject. The agency also would produce public service announcements.

The Labor Department would receive $17 million to help train women for jobs where they have been underrepresented, particularly in the high-technology sector, through career centers the department supports and apprenticeships. The department also would help employers improve their pay policies and strengthen public-private partnerships.

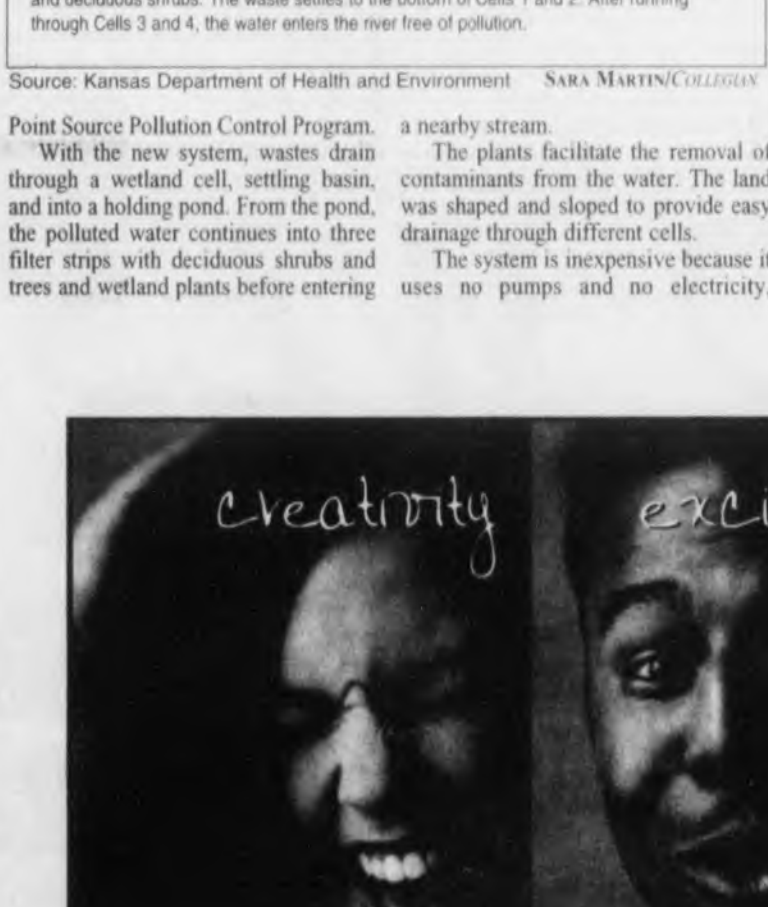
System created at K-State could rid farms of foul odor

BY MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Driving by livestock facilities in Kansas might not be as hazardous to people's senses of sight and smell anymore.

K-State's Department of Biological and Agricultural Engineering has built and is in the process of testing a new system that naturally disposes of waste material and contaminants for small- to medium-sized farms.

Kyle Mankin, assistant professor of biological and agricultural engineering, is in charge of assessing the system. He will decide what kind of management the system needs and the efficiency of its waste treatment.



"The system is basically all-natural, made up of wetland plants and trees," Mankin said. "The goal is to have a low-maintenance, low-cost system the small- to medium-sized farmer can afford.

"This system is simple to manage, easy to construct and not intimidating to the farmer," he said.

The development of the plan started when Rick Davis, Kansas Department of Health and Environment, entered a landscape design in a competition and won. Joe Harner, extension specialist, then developed engineering plans from the original design.

Construction began in the fall of 1998 and finished in the summer of 1999. The project, which was constructed at Nichols Dairy in Anderson County, was funded by KDHE's Kansas Non-Point Source Pollution Control Program.

The Runoff Cycle: how the water is cleaned

Runoff from the parlor and confinement areas enter the settling basin. The storage pond holds the liquid waste, which is released into a series of cells composed of wetland plants and deciduous shrubs. The waste settles to the bottom of Cells 1 and 2. After running through Cells 3 and 4, the water enters the river free of pollution.

Source: Kansas Department of Health and Environment SARA MARTIN/COLLEGIAN

With the new system, wastes drain through a wetland cell, settling basin, and into a holding pond. From the pond, the polluted water continues into three filter strips with deciduous shrubs and trees and wetland plants before entering a nearby stream.

The plants facilitate the removal of contaminants from the water. The land was shaped and sloped to provide easy drainage through different cells.

The system is inexpensive because it uses no pumps and no electricity, Mankin said.

"The plants create an environment that lets the natural ecosystem work," Mankin said. "Each part of the system removes pollutants and there are very few times runoff actually reaches the stream."

The new system provides other benefits besides filtering the livestock waste. The grasses and shrubs will provide a natural habitat that invites additional wildlife to the area.

It also is aesthetically pleasing to the passerby, Mankin said. The area is surrounded by trees and other plant life.

Traditionally, a lagoon system is used. After it rains, water and waste runoff collects in a lagoon.

Once the polluted water level rises, the lagoon must be pumped out and waste disposed safely. Mankin said this is expensive to the farmer.

Jennifer Morris, junior in biological and agricultural engineering, helped with the project. She and another student designed and installed a system that will store the water sampling equipment.

Water samples will be collected starting this spring.

Morris said she volunteered for the project to become more acquainted with the department. She will use part of the data collected with her honors project.

"The system is a completely natural way of purifying contaminants," Morris said. "The goal is to create a model that farmers in this climate region can use to remove wastes."

fundamentalist and conservative support to the more moderate Bush. McCain declined to campaign here, showing up in the state only for two debates. Keyes bested Bauer in the drive for support from conservative social activists. Hatch never gained a constituency and was sure to review his candidacy.

Among Democrats, Gore was winning 63 percent of the state's 47 Democratic nominating delegates, compared to 35 percent for Bradley, according to results from sample precincts.

Gore's big margin blunted Bradley's challenge going into New Hampshire next week, where Bradley has polled even with Gore, or even ahead. A relative said Bradley viewed his defeat as just a bump in the road.

In a sign of the tit-for-tat to come, Gore accused Bradley of going negative in the final days of the Iowa race — and said the tactic backfired.

"I think it was a mistake for his campaign to go to the so-called negative approach, but I'm not complaining," Gore said. "But based on what I've heard from from the voters out here, they didn't expect that and didn't like it."

The caucuses were expected to draw no more than 100,000 voters from each party. Iowa launches the presidential race into a frantic six-week stretch, with the New Hampshire primary a week away.

Iowans were attending caucuses at 2,100 sites across the sprawling state. In a display of basic grass-roots politics, voters here brave the winter weather and visit classrooms, libraries, fire stations, church basements, grain co-ops and even a few private homes to play their role in the American political system.

The process will yield 47 delegates to the Democratic convention and 25 delegates to the GOP convention, a fraction of the total a candidate needs to win the nomination.

TELEFUND

of-mouth between students, Moxley said.

"We also have instructors that promote signing up in class," Moxley said.

Moxley said the Telefund is a good experience for students because it could help them in their future careers. She said it is an excellent opportunity for students in majors that deal with marketing to gain experience.

Moxley said all students can benefit because they are able to have fun with other students and can talk to alumni.

"It is hard work that is fun, and you can see the results immediately at the end of the night," Moxley said.

Dowell said the money raised is divided among all eight colleges at K-State. Donors will be able to specify the college they would like their donation to go toward.

The College of Technology and Aviation in Salina finished its Telefund Sunday. The eight Manhattan colleges will start at the end of January and continue throughout February.

The money raised will be used for scholarships and educational materials.

"I have seen first hand the importance of scholarships, and I realized every little bit of money can help," Laura Helmke, freshman in pre-business administration, said.

STEWART

money matters on their mind, Stewart said.

"I think it's important to look at who will support state-funded education, especially since we attend a state school," he said. "We need to be voting with our pocketbooks."

Within the next few months, it is hoped all of the issues will come together to create election platforms, Barkman said.

"We've seen a number of issues," he said. "The media has its concerns. The candidates have their concerns. The people have their concerns. Once all these concerns come together, we'll get some of the more important issues."

"Right now it's a little too scattered," he said.

Oldfather said people often overlook voting, because they assume their voices do not matter.

"It's our country," he said. "If we don't participate, the people who do participate will make the decisions for us."

Barkman said his interest in politics began with the realization that each small step counts.

"My representatives and senators are there to bring about a better state and a better country for us," he said.

THOMAS

He lost control of his car on a snowy highway and it flipped several times. Thomas and Mike Tellis, 49, of Kansas City, Kan., were not wearing seat belts and were thrown from the car, police said. Tellis was killed instantly.

A third man in the car who was wearing his seat belt was treated and released.

The crash happened about 10 miles from another highway pileup in which 10 people died.

Thomas, a nine-time Pro Bowl player, holds the NFL one-game record of seven sacks and ranks ninth all-time with 126.5 career sacks.

The seven-sack game came against Seattle in 1990 near Veterans Day. He dedicated his effort to his father, an Air Force pilot who was killed in Vietnam in Operation Linebacker II.

With one of the quickest first moves of any defender in the league, Thomas became known for his "sack and strip" move, in which he would close fast on a quarterback's blind side and hack at his arm to knock the ball out of his hand.

The 6-foot-3-inch, 255-pounder holds Chiefs' records for career safeties (3), forced fumbles (45) and fumble recoveries (19). He starred at Alabama and was named to the Pro Bowl his first nine seasons.

Thomas made headlines in 1998 when he lost his temper in a Monday night game against Denver and committed three personal fouls during the Broncos' final touchdown drive. He was fined and suspended for one game and apologized to the Broncos and "to the youth of America."

He has been active in the Kansas City area with his Third and Long literacy program.

"God willing, all the initial reports will be off and he'll be OK," Chiefs center Tim Grunhard said. "Right now, I'm not concerned with Derrick Thomas the football player. I'm worried about Derrick Thomas the person."

CENTER

pus became complete in October 1978, when it became known as the Midwest Desegregation Assistance Center.

Due to a legislative change, the center modified its name to its current form on July 1, 1999, deleting a word from its title.

"Some of the powers that be believed that school desegregation, as far as a national issue, was passé. That's not really true," Rankin said. "People in Washington felt that if you pulled desegregation out of the title, you would have more school districts requesting assistance. It has unbelievably increased the numbers."

Rankin said parents, teachers or administrators can make requests for help from the center, but a small number of schools need a little extra push.

"Services can be accessed in many ways," Rankin said. "The courts can mandate the school deals with them. So can the Office of Civil Rights and the Department of Justice."

Popular questions cover issues such as racial and sexual harassment. Rankin said another significant problem is the tracking of minority students into special education programs.

"Some of the students who may be behavioral problems get tracked into special education so that teachers don't have to work with them," Rankin said. "There is an unbelievable amount of African-American males that get tracked into special ed."

The center's main function, Rankin said, was to ensure that all students are able to receive the education they are entitled.

"Public schools and universities are the vehicles for upward mobility," he said. "There's a direct correlation: The better education you get, and the more education you get, the more money you make. So if I can control your education, I can control your income."

Providing information to schools is also a big part of the job. A room in Bluemont Hall's basement is filled with equity materials ready to be sent to teachers and administrators.

"The library contains multiple volumes of equity materials," Rankin said. "In fact, we've been building a 20-plus year supply in excess of half a million dollars worth of materials."

Materials from the library are in constant circulation, Rankin said, with books and pamphlets being mailed to school districts requesting help.

The center now is looking at which issues will need the most attention in the future.

Program designer Marcela Parra specializes in bilingual education and students who use English as a second language, two issues she said are becoming important to schools.

"These are some of our most requested programs, due to the major waves of Spanish-speaking immigrants," Parra said. "We check to see how children are being serviced and if their educational rights are being considered."

Rankin said one of the biggest problems the center will continue to tackle into the next decade is the nationwide decrease in the number of minority teachers.

"The loss of minority teachers will leave roughly 100,000 minorities in the classroom to be role models for 17 to 18 million students," he said.

The center has worked with Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 in establishing an affirmative-action policy that could help with this problem.

Health QUESTION

Carol Kennedy
Director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center

Q How should preparation for exercise change with cold weather?

A Planning ahead for cold weather workouts is essential. Take into consideration the outside temperature as well as the wind chill factor.

- Listen to the local weather forecast to avoid surprises as much as possible. Usually the local temperature and wind chill are accurate.
- Dress appropriately using layers of clothing. Avoid exercising in the wind, rain or snow, but if you must, wear a windproof or rainproof jacket that allows moisture from perspiration to escape.
- Avoid frostbite or skin damage that result from freezing temperatures. Protect exposed skin.
- Avoid hypothermia, or a drop in body temperature, by staying dry. If you are warm because of activity, remove top layers of clothing before you become wet from perspiration and put them back on as you cool off.

Herb, vitamin supplements might provide students with remedy to cure their illnesses

STORY BY SARAH MCCAFFREY

Feeling better might be only an herbal supplement away.

There is an herbal supplement on the market for almost every ailment, said Patsy Anderson, certified nutritionist at Guiding Light Nutrition. Echinacea, vitamin C and colloidal silver help boost the immune system and ward off cold and flu viruses. Ginseng is known for increasing energy levels, St. John's Wort is suggested for curing the blues and Kava Kava eases feelings of anxiety and helps with insomnia.

Celebrities such as Alex Trebek and Annie Potts are praising all-natural dietary supplements. The number of people using herbal medicines has been steadily increasing in recent years. Pharmaceutical companies are jumping on the bandwagon to bring homeopathic therapies to the mass market.

Anderson said herbal supplements will be as easy to obtain as aspirin in the near future.

"In the next few years, the market will be saturated," Anderson said. "People are making more demands on traditional medicine. They're wanting more natural products that are safer to use."

Skepticism about the benefits of chemically produced pharmaceuticals is another driving force in the herbal medicine trend, Anderson said.

"Antibiotics kill good bacteria along with the bad," Anderson said. "Herbal supplements are 2,500 times safer than over-the-counter medications."

"Don't choose a small, unknown company," she said. "Go with a name you trust."

Before deciding to use supplements, it might be a good idea to consult your doctor first, Kennedy said.

Safety issues could arise for people with preexisting conditions or those already taking prescription medications.

"Physicians can be very helpful in determining whether or not patients should take supplements," she said.

Lafene introduces online prescription ordering to K-State

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

Standing in line for a prescription will no longer be an issue at Lafene Health Center.

Refill prescription orders can be made in advance by e-mailing the center. Other medical supplies can be ordered for pickup as well.

Pam Spaulding, director of pharmacy at Lafene, said the idea of online prescription ordering branched from the call-order service that the center developed a couple of years ago.

"It was only until a couple of years ago when you could call in prescriptions, and before that there was a wait," Spaulding said. "It was never more than 15 minutes before, and with e-mail it will take even less time."

Students and their spouses now are able to fill their prescriptions online by sending an e-mail order to Lafene.

"It helps the flow of filling prescriptions during peak times," Spaulding said. "Being able to e-mail online breaks the flow of traffic and helps things move easier."

After completing the online form, the e-mail will be sent to the pharmacy electronically at Lafene and will be ready to be picked up according to the time the student specified on the online form.

"This allows us to get prescriptions ahead of time so they can be ready when (the student) gets here," said Mark Brown-Barnett, who will be taking over as director of pharmacy at the end of the month. "The site is designed with time slots, and (the prescriptions) will be ready by the time they get here."

The site also allows students to order over-the-counter drugs.

Spaulding said the e-mails will remain confidential, however, and that the students will not receive a confirmation that their order was received.

"Once they e-mail in, the students won't receive any response, other than picking up their prescription," Spaulding said.

However, Spaulding said students can call anytime during Lafene's office hours to ensure the arrival of their order.

Brown-Barnett said he thinks students will take advantage of this new technology because of the convenience.

"The computer is something students are using more and more," he said. "Also, students can order anytime. When they had to phone them in, they had to call during hours. Now they can get online anytime and order."

The orders can only be picked up during Lafene's office hours from 8:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Saturdays.

Brown-Barnett said the online ordering system will prove effective and more convenient for the students and workers at Lafene.

CHELSEA SCHMIDT/Collegian

"I think it is a great step. We have the chance of filling the prescriptions prior to the student getting here which will smooth the process," Brown-Barnett said. "It should prove convenient for students, and that's what we're here for."

Katie Graham, freshman in open-option, said she thinks the online ordering will be used by K-State students.

"I think it would be great," she said. "Everybody is using computers nowadays, and it would be easier than picking up the phone."

High court approves states' right to limit campaign contributions

BY RICHARD CARELLI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a timely election-year ruling, the Supreme Court reaffirmed states' sweeping power to place limits on campaign contributions to political candidates.

The justices, splitting 6-3 Monday, reinstated Missouri's limits for state races and safeguarded, for now, the $1,000 cap on individuals' contributions to candidates for federal office, who could spend $3 billion nationwide this year.

About two-thirds of the states impose campaign contribution limits. In California, voters will be asked in a March 7 initiative to impose limits and ban corporate and union contributions in state races.

The court's three dissenters said Monday's decision tramples free-speech rights and voted for letting people contribute as much as they want to all candidates by overturning a 1976 Supreme Court landmark that still shapes the nation's political landscape.

"The American people know that our political system needs to be fixed, and today's decision sets the stage for further reform."

— President Clinton

The majority said fighting corruption, or even the perception of corruption, justifies contribution limits.

"Leave the perception of impropriety unanswered, and the cynical assumption that large donors call the tune could jeopardize the willingness of voters to take part in democratic governance," Justice David H. Souter wrote for the court.

"Democracy works only if the people have faith in those who govern, and that faith is bound to be shattered when high officials and their appointees engage in activities which arouse suspicions of malfeasance and corruption."

Left unaffected by the ruling is currently unregulated "soft money" — contributions made to groups that spend money without ties to specific candidates.

President Clinton praised the decision as a victory for democracy in a statement read by press secretary Joe Lockhart.

"The American people know that our political system needs to be fixed, and today's decision sets the stage for further reform," said Clinton, who is urging Congress to pass more campaign-finance changes this year.

Sen. John McCain, an Arizona senator and Republican presidential contender, also applauded the ruling as marvelous. He has made campaign reform the centerpiece of his bid for the GOP nomination.

Elian Gonzalez's grandmothers arrive in Miami

BY ALEX VEIGA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Elian Gonzalez's grandmothers flew from New York to Miami on Monday in hopes of meeting with their 6-year-old grandson before they return to Cuba, but the site of the get-together was in dispute.

The boy's maternal grandmother, Raquel Rodriguez, and paternal grandmother, Mariela Quintana, were invited to dinner Monday at the home of Elian's relatives in Miami, who insisted the meeting take place there.

Federal officials said the grandmothers were hoping to meet privately with Elian at a neutral site.

The Miami relatives have been caring for Elian since he was found clinging to an inner tube off the Florida coast on Thanksgiving. His mother and 10 other Cubans died in their ill-fated attempt to reach the United States.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service has ruled that Elian must be sent back to Cuba to live with his father, but the Miami family is suing in federal court to block the boy's return.

On Monday, the first day of the new congressional session, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott and Florida lawmakers introduced a bill to give Elian U.S. citizenship, which would free him from INS jurisdiction.

The grandmothers, who flew from Cuba to New York on Friday, had asked Attorney General Janet Reno during the weekend to arrange a meeting with Elian.

In a letter to the INS, an attorney for the Miami family said a dinner at the home of Lazaro Gonzalez — Quintana's brother-in-law and Elian's great-uncle — would let the grandmothers see and feel for themselves how well Elian is doing and how much he wishes to remain in the United States.

Armando Gutierrez, a spokesman for the Miami relatives, said the family would only allow the meeting to take place at the home.

"This is where they live. This is where Elian lives," Gutierrez said. "No budging on that."

The family planned to welcome the grandmothers with a dinner of roast pork, mixed black beans and rice and breaded chicken cutlets, Gutierrez said. Boxes of flowers were seen being brought into the home. About 300 people gathered outside holding signs and flowers to welcome the grandmothers.

However, Justice Department spokesman Carole Florman said authorities were trying to arrange a meeting at a neutral location.

"The grandmothers were not comfortable with a meeting at Lazaro's house. They want a private meeting with the boy," Florman said.

Gutierrez said the Miami family had bought cameras so Elian could take pictures of his grandmothers.

"There is an opportunity today for them to see with their own two eyes how well Elian is doing, that he is not tied to a chair in the basement, that he's going to school, that he's playing with his cousins, that's he got a nice, modest but clean, happy, living environment," said Spencer Eig, an attorney for the boy's Miami relatives. "That's something which they may not have known before, and this may go a long way to calming their anxiety.

On NBC's "Today" show, Rodriguez asked Congress not to give the boy U.S. citizenship and to let him return to Cuba.

KATS feature to help students plan curriculum

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

Checking the road to graduation will soon be as easy as logging on to the K-State Web page.

Susan Woodard, assistant to the registrar, said the Degree Audit Reporting System will be available to students sometime in March.

The program, which allows students to track their progress toward graduation, has been available to faculty and staff members since October on a trial basis.

Woodard said this has given those people using it the opportunity to identify problems before it is released to the student body.

"This is a computerized system that takes students' records and applies them to their individual degree requirements," Woodard said. "Students will be able to run a report and see all of the requirements they have completed, and they will know what they have to do to get their degree."

Woodard said one of the features of DARS will be a curriculum change option. She said this will allow students to select another curriculum and see how their current requirements would apply to another program.

"This program will allow students to see how courses they have previously taken apply to other curriculum choices without having to take the course catalog and look one by one," she said. "I think students will enjoy having the ability to check for themselves what options they have and what they can do to graduate."

Marian Tilford, office specialist in agriculture student records, said another benefit is to those students who transfer into K-State. With DARS, transfer students will have the ability to see which of their classes will transfer to K-State and what they have left to complete.

"A student at Johnson County Community College will be able to plug in course work and see how it will transfer here," Tilford said. "DARS will integrate several systems and will allow for many more possibilities and requirement options to emerge."

Woodard said the advising process also will become easier through DARS. She said with the system, students will be able to become better prepared for advising sessions because both the student and the faculty member will have access to DARS.

"We hope that with this program, the advising process will improve for the students," Woodard said. "Information will be available to both faculty and students so that the road to graduation becomes more clear."

Another main advantage to DARS is the ability to complete graduation checks efficiently. Tilford said graduation checks now are done manually, but cannot be updated throughout a student's academic career.

She said DARS has the capability to update a student's record quickly and will allow students to keep track of their remaining requirements.

"If students are unsure about what they have left toward graduation, they can go to one of the options and run their own graduation check," Tilford said. "Now, it is hard to keep student's records current manually, but the computer will continually update."

Tilford said she thinks many students will like the advantages DARS will have to offer. She said students will be able to receive many benefits from the program and will like the user-friendly system.

"DARS integrates the course catalog with the individual student's record," Tilford said. "It will take care of the tedious details and allow more time for students to explore their options in depth, so that it becomes more beneficial to them."

under construction

Once construction on the Degree Audit Reporting System is completed in March, the following opportunities will be available to students.

- Students will be able to track their progress towards graduation.
- They will be able to select an alternative curriculum and identify the current requirements for that program.
- Transfer students will be able to identify which of their credits will transfer to K-State and what their remaining requirements are.
- Efficient graduation checks will be available throughout a student's academic career.

Explosion in empty apartment investigated

■ Fire extinguisher said to be source.

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

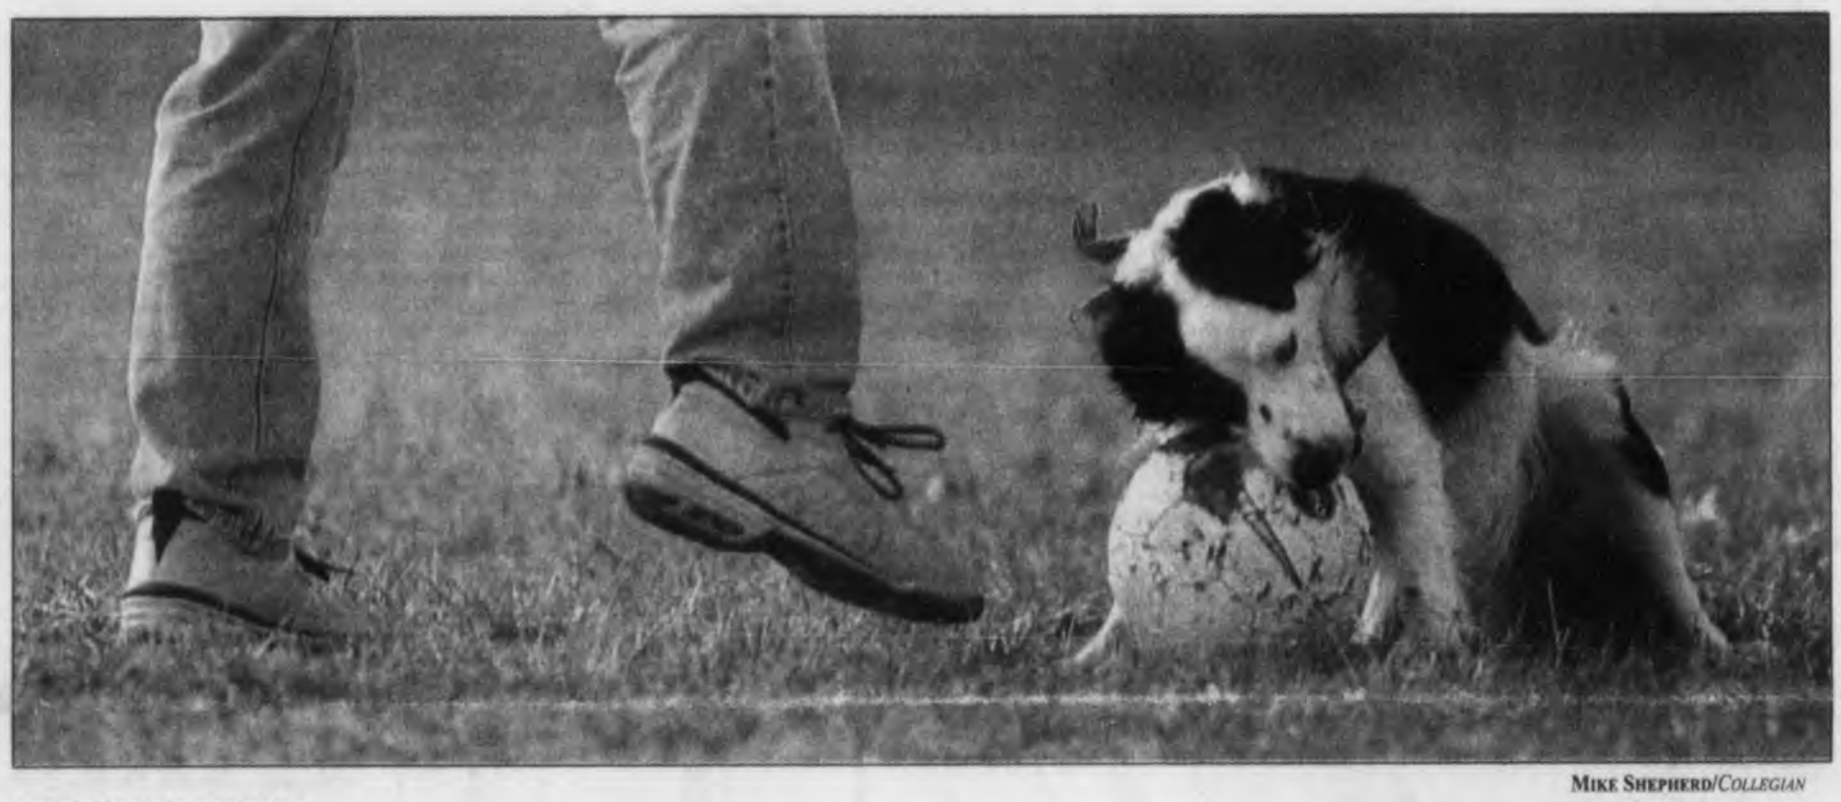
The Riley County Police Department investigated an explosion Tuesday morning.

Sgt. Hank Nelson said in a press release that a caller reported there was an explosion in the apartment complex located at 415 N. 16th St. The release stated that the caller indicated the explosion came from apartment 3.

Two fire extinguishers, both manipulated to serve a purpose other than their intended one, were found during preliminary investigation. One extinguisher was the source of the explosion, and the other still was intact when removed by the RCPD.

Detective Connie Miller said the extinguisher that did not explode was taken by the RCPD.

"The extinguisher that was not damaged was to be detonated," Miller said.



There were no injuries reported, and the damage to the apartment was minimal.

"There was no one in the apartment at the time of the explosion, and there were no residents of the apartment available for comment," Miller said.

Miller said further investigation will take place.

"The Kansas Bureau of Investigation is working with the Riley County Police to determine further information," Miller said.

No further information is being released at this time.

St. Isidore's, SGA offer philanthropic spring break options

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Several K-State students will focus their spring breaks on strengthening faith and offering service to poor communities. In association with the Student Governing Association, St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center will be sponsoring spring break alternatives to serve the poor in places such as Washington, D.C.; Alamosa, Colo.; Chicago; Saltillo, Mexico and Salinas, Calif.

Molly Mersmann, program chair and junior in secondary education, said the program gives students perspective.

"Many people have a limited view of the world," Mersmann said. "This is a way to see the world from a different perspective."

Mersmann said each trip will offer different projects intended to serve the community.

"In each place, we will concentrate on a specific task," Mersmann said. "In California, we will work with migrant farm workers; in Mexico, we are focusing on community improvement; in Colorado and Illinois, we are working with different problems within the community; and in Washington we are working with a soup kitchen."

The program has been successful in the past and already has begun to fill up quickly, Mersmann said.

"The Mexico trip is full, but there are openings on all of the other trips for interested people," she said.

Casey Clark, junior in biology and site leader for the Mexico trip, said the rewards for going on the trips are numerous.

"I think that the main thing people take away from the trips are the feeling of appreciation they receive," Clark said. "The people we do the services for make you feel so appreciated."

Clark said he went on the trip to Mexico last year and expects this year's trip to be as successful.

"Just being with the people down there, playing with the kids for a while and doing some of the jobs that need to be done is rewarding," Clark said.

Though Mersmann said community service and goodwill are not what most college-age spring breakers participate in, the rewards and benefits are plentiful.

"We do have free time every day, so it is not constant work," Mersmann said. "But the connection with the people and the friends you make through the trip make all the work worthwhile."

Father Keith Weber of St. Isidore's said students learn a great deal about themselves as well as other cultures and ways of life.

"It is very helpful to be able to step outside of our natural boundaries and see that the world isn't always what we live in," Weber said. "What the students learn and experience is the real reward."

trip destinations

Students interested in spending their spring break doing community service can choose between the following locations. There is a limit to how many students can participate in each trip.

Salinas, Calif.	$210
Chicago	$220
Alamosa, Colo.	$200
Saltillo, Mexico*	$280
Washington, D.C.	$280

Registration forms can be picked up at St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center, 711 Denison Ave., or from the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Study results show high school seniors more bored with classes, preoccupied with college

By ANJETTA MCQUEEN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — College freshmen say they often were bored as high school seniors, coming late to classes or missing them entirely, evidence of what university researchers call academic disengagement.

These students also worried about how to pay for college and one-quarter indicated there was some or a very good chance they would have to work full time while in school.

The 34th annual American Freshman survey questioned first-time, full-time college freshmen last year about their habits and attitudes during their final year of high school.

More than 260,000 students at 462 two- and four-year schools participated in the research by the University of California, Los Angeles' Higher Education Research Institute, primarily during summer orientation or in the first few weeks of college.

A record 40 percent of the students said they were frequently bored in high school classes, compared with the one-quarter who answered yes when the questions first was asked in 1985. More students also reported they were late to classes or skipped them.

College and universities need to make sure if the students are already feeling disengaged in high school that they are going to get the support, mentoring, tutoring and other services they need to make it through college, said Jennifer Lin of the United States Student Association, a Washington-based group serving 3.5 million students.

Linda Sax, a researcher who directed the survey, said the rapid advances in today's high-tech world might make it harder to keep students' attention.

"This is a reflection of an increasingly fast-paced society, made more so by computers and other media," Sax said. "Students tell us anecdotally that they love it when teachers use more interactive tools. But not all teachers do it."

Also, 30 percent of respondents said they often felt "overwhelmed by all I have to do" — the highest percentage since the question was first asked in 1985, when 16 percent felt that way.

Students increasingly are worried about the cost of higher education. A record 25 percent of students said there was some or a very good chance they would work full-time while in college. Just 16 percent answered that way in 1982, the first year that question appeared.

More college-bound students rate themselves as above average academically, 59 percent, compared with others their own age, and 34 percent reported earning an A average, more than in previous years. About half expect to earn at least a B average in college.

A record 40 percent of the students said they were frequently bored in high school classes, compared with the one-quarter who answered yes when the questions were first asked in 1985.

Sax said there is evidence that some students could be disappointed with their college report card. Corresponding performance on standardized tests and remedial course work suggest grade inflation.

"The expectations of students are very much at odds with the reality that the faculty feel they are facing with students," she said.

Among the other findings in the 1999 college freshman survey:

- Students are a bit older and are taking longer to finish high school.
- More aspire to be teachers and performers.
- While a record number of students did volunteer work as seniors, the percentage of those who thought it important or essential to influence social values dropped to 36 percent, its lowest point since 1986. Also declining was an interest in participating in community programs or becoming a community leader.

The survey was adjusted to represent the 1.64 million freshmen entering in fall 1999. The margin of error was less than 1 percentage point.

Students experience boredom as way to take their minds off stress

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

A study of college freshmen reports boredom in the classroom is on the rise.

Fred Newton, director of counseling services at Lafene Health Center, said boredom is a defense against pressure.

"Some of the studies I have seen and done show how youth today live for the moment and have grown up very early," Newton said. "The boredom can be seen as a survival mode."

Newton said the boredom factor seen in the survey also might relate to the stress students feel as they approach college.

"Boredom is the alternative to having to focus on something," Newton said. "Disengaging themselves from important things may be an out for students."

The study reported that as well as being bored, students felt overwhelmed by what they had to accomplish.

Abby Doornbos, freshman in business, said that during her senior year of high school she felt as though she had a lot to do, but was not necessarily overwhelmed.

"I was in a lot of activities, so I was never really bored," Doornbos said. "I did have the pressure of coming to college to deal with as well, but I don't feel as though I had too much pressure to deal with."

Sylvester Benson, principal at Manhattan High School, said he feels another component that drives

TAKE note

Hair blues. Bad hair days affect not just what's on your head, but what's in it.

A Yale University study of the psychology of bad hair days found that people's self-esteem goes awry when their hair is out of place.

They feel less smart, less capable, more embarrassed and less sociable.

And, contrary to popular belief, men's self-esteem might take a greater licking than women's when their hair just won't behave. Men are more likely to feel less smart and less capable when their hair stuck out, was badly cut or otherwise mussed.

"The cultural truism is men are not affected by their appearance," said Marianne LaFrance, the Yale professor who conducted the study. "This is not just the domain of women."

The study was paid for by Procter & Gamble, which makes shampoo and plans a new hair-care line called Physique to provide more control over hair.

Janet Hyde, a psychology professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison who studies body image and self-esteem, said personal appearance can have an enormous effect on people, especially adolescents. Hyde said she was surprised to hear bad hair had a stronger effect on men than on women in some cases.

For the study, researchers questioned 60 men and 60 women ages 17-30, most of them Yale students. About half were white, 9 percent were black, 21 percent were Asian and 3 percent were Hispanic.

The people were divided into three groups. One group was questioned about times in their lives when they had bad hair. The second group was told to think about bad product packaging, like leaky containers, to get them in a negative mindset. The third group was not asked to think about anything negative.

All three groups then underwent basic psychological tests of self-esteem and self-judgment. The people who pondered their bad hair days showed lower self-esteem than those who thought about something else.

Girl to be allowed to return to school after mental test

LEON, Kan. — A high school student suspended over a drawing that contained the words "I'll kill you" will be reinstated if she's cleared by a mental-health specialist.

The Bluestem School Board agreed unanimously Monday night to allow Sarah Boman to return if she is found not be a threat to anyone at Bluestem High School.

Earlier this month Boman was suspended for the rest of the year after school officials found a spiral drawing containing the words "I'll kill you all!" posted on a school door.

Board members met in an executive session Monday after receiving a recommendation from a suspension appeal hearing officer that Boman be allowed to return.

Boman told the board and the audience that she never could hurt anyone.

"I love everyone," she said, her eyes welling with tears.

Boman had said her drawing was an attempt at conceptual art. The drawing was supposed to show the deranged thoughts of a paranoid madman whose dog had been killed.

El Dorado, Kan. attorney David Ricke, who heard Boman's appeal, told the board there was no evidence that she meant the drawing to be a threat to anyone. Boman had admitted to making the drawing, which experts testified was conceptual art.

"Hopefully, as far as Sarah is concerned, the lesson has been learned and the district's message of concern has been sent," the recommendation states. "In consideration of the specific and narrow facts and circumstances of the case, the continued extended term suspension of Sarah Boman is not warranted and cannot be legally justified."

Man who shot wife on TV found guilty, receives life

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — A man who fatally shot his ex-wife at a cemetery while a TV camera rolled was found guilty Tuesday of murder.

A jury took just more than an hour to convict Emilio Nunez, 40, in the slaying of Maritza Martin.

Prosecutors did not seek the death penalty; Nunez will get life in prison.

A reporter for the Spanish-language network Telemundo was interviewing Nunez in 1993 at the grave of his 15-year-old daughter, who had killed herself. Nunez's ex-wife arrived unexpectedly, and he accused her of causing their daughter's suicide by slapping the girl because she was pregnant.

Nunez then pulled a gun, shot Martin in the head and fired 11 more times as she lay on the ground.

The reporter, Ingrid Cruz, and her cameraman ran for cover, but not before he filmed much of the shooting. The tape was shown in court.

Defense attorney Reemberto Diaz told the jury that Nunez was angered by the reporter's questions. The attorney said Cruz had asked questions designed to get an emotional response.

Telemundo spokesman Ted Guefen countered last week: "It is irresponsible to suggest that Telemundo or Ingrid Cruz are in any way responsible for this terrible tragedy."

Drug smuggler pleads guilty to 10 charges, faces prison

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — A drug smuggler who helped bankroll a movie with his profits has pleaded guilty to 10 charges.

Robert Hayes, 31, said Monday that he led a ring that bought cocaine and marijuana in Texas and Miami to sell in Louisville.

Hayes helped finance a movie, "Winner Takes All," with money he made selling drugs, federal prosecutor Alexander Taft said.

The movie, filmed in Louisville, stars Hayes and tells the story of two brothers who grow up in the inner city — one to become a Drug Enforcement Administration agent, the other a member of a crime syndicate.

It has been showing on the Black Entertainment Television cable network this month.

BET spokesman Michael Lewellen said the network was unaware of Hayes' background or the source of his financing.

Hayes pleaded guilty to charges that included operating a criminal enterprise, conspiring to distribute cocaine and marijuana and money laundering. The most serious charge carries at least 30 years in prison.

Firm explores nanoparticle uses

■ Nantek to help K-State with jobs, research funds.

BY JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Toxins, beware.

Nantek Inc., a local company, is researching new methods to clean them from the environment.

Nanoparticles, measured in billionths of a meter, form the foundation for Nantek's research. K-State Distinguished Professor Kenneth Klebunde did the original research, starting Nantek in 1995.

"When we make small particles out of regular materials, like magnesium oxide, they assume some remarkable characteristics," Klebunde said.

Nantek's research has shown that masses of these small non-toxic particles can absorb and destroy toxic materials, and can counteract chemical and biological weapons, Klebunde said.

"We want to sell to the military to protect our soldiers," Klebunde said.

Nanoparticles have civilian applications as well. Robert Rosander, who started Nantek with Klebunde, said the small particles also can be used in more mundane matters like water filtration and air purification.

At present, Nantek is building a pilot plant to investigate the practicality of producing these particles.

"We must demonstrate the ability to produce these particles in large quantities at an economic cost," Rosander said. "If we're successful, we'll be building a much larger plant in a few years."

The K-State Research Foundation helped Klebunde get Nantek started and has an interest in the company. Klebunde said some of the money generated by Nantek will go back to the university to help fund research by other professors.

"Any money that Nantek makes, a part of that will go back to K-State's Research Foundation," Klebunde said.

Olga Koper, a former doctoral student of Klebunde's, was the first person hired for Nantek and now is a senior scientist.

"K-State owns some shares, so if we succeed, then K-State also succeeds," Koper said.

But the benefits to K-State are not limited to funding for research.

K-State students looking to make their mark at Nantek will be welcome, Koper said.

"Any time we are looking for new hires, we advertise at K-State," Koper said.

Nantek employs 10 people, many of whom are recent graduates from local colleges. Five are from K-State, two are from the University of Kansas and one is from Emporia State.

Derrick Thomas crash used as evidence for supporting Graves' seat belt proposal

BY JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Supporters of a proposal from Gov. Bill Graves to strengthen the state's seat-belt law mentioned Derrick Thomas often during a legislative hearing Tuesday.

Thomas, linebacker for the Kansas City Chiefs, seriously injured his spine in an automobile accident Sunday on Interstate 435. He wasn't wearing a seat belt, nor was a passenger who died.

During a Senate Judiciary Committee meeting, supporters of the governor's proposal repeatedly noted that a second passenger in Thomas' car was wearing a seat belt and suffered only slight injuries.

Public safety and health officials hoped to use Thomas' case to overcome concerns that strengthening the state's seat-belt law would infringe upon Kansans' personal liberty.

"The minor inconvenience of belting up is negligible compared to the value of human life," said Clyde Graeber, the governor's secretary of health and environment.

Even an opponent of Graves' proposal, Ron Henneberg, a Belue machine operator, acknowledged that seat belts save lives.

However, he told the committee that state government should not use active coercion to force adults to buckle up.

Henneberg is president of A Brotherhood Against Totalitarian Enactments, or ABATE, which has long lobbied against seat belt and motorcycle helmet laws.

"Laws are supposed to ensure the greatest amount of liberty to the individual while maintaining a civil society," Henneberg said.

■ ON THE WEB
The seat-belt bill is SB 416.Bills are available at www.ink.org/public/legislative/fulltext.cgi

The committee did not take action on the bill, and its chairman, Sen. Tim Emert, R-Independence, said he does not know when he will schedule a vote.

"We'll see what the reaction of the committee is," he said.

State law requires all drivers and front-seat passengers to buckle up, as well as all children between 4 and 14, whether they ride in a front or rear seat. Children under 4 must be in child safety seats.

But failure to use a seat belt is a secondary offense, meaning law-enforcement officials cannot ticket people without stopping them for another violation, such as speeding. Also, the fine for not wearing a seat belt is only $10.

Graves' bill would allow law-enforcement officers to stop motorists simply for not wearing a seat belt. It would require all passengers to wear seat belts and increase the fine for not doing so to $25.

Supporters of the governor's proposal said it would increase the use of seat belts and, therefore, save lives.

Graeber acknowledged that he sometimes does not wear a seat belt when he is driving in town.

He said if Graves' proposal is enacted, "You can be assured that I will be wearing one no matter where I am driving."

Transportation Secretary Dean Carlson said the freedom not to wear a seat belt is like the freedom not to stop at stop lights.

Other supporters included Col. Don Brownlee, the superintendent of the Kansas Highway Patrol, and representatives of health and children's advocacy groups.

Henneberg, the lone opponent to testify, said most Kansans support the current seat belt law but oppose the changes Graves has proposed.

New RCPD center construction on time

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction for the new Riley County Law Enforcement Center is right on time, Riley County Public Works Director Dan Hardens said.

The $10.8 million project began construction in October 1998 and is scheduled to be complete by April 17.

"It's going remarkably fast," Hardens said.

The new facility, located at the junction between Seth Childs Road and Fort Riley Boulevard, will merge all RCPD departments, including patrol and records department, the investigations department and the county jail, into one building.

RCPD Capt. Brad Schoen said the new facility is better than the current one that has employees scattered in three different buildings.

"It looks like a big improvement," Schoen said. "The new center is a more modern facility. It will really modernize things, especially on the jail side "

Schoen said the center will have a new computerized security system and an in-take area for criminals.

"At the in-take area, we will decide how to group the prisoners in the facilities and decide their classification," Schoen said.

Hardens said with the new facility, the department will be able to sort prisoners by risk potential such as maximum security, minimum security and work-release programs.

Hardens said the new jail is double the capacity of the old one, which was built in 1938, and will eliminate overcrowding problems. The old jail was licensed for 19 people but housed 40 to 50 people.

Because of overcrowding, the current Riley County Jail sends female inmates to the Geary County Jail in Junction City and sends inmates to cells in other towns.

Hardens said the new jail will be using direct supervision of prisoners instead of the current straight lock-down procedure where the jailers supervise prisoners from beyond the jail cell.

"Direct supervision has been around for awhile," Hardens said. "Research has indicated that lock down causes more violence. With direct supervision, you mix jailers with the prisoners to prevent violence and vandalism."

Free-speech zone rules preserves expression

The line between free speech and litter was crossed again Monday morning.

A group of pro-choice advocates decorated the free-speech zone north of the K-State Student Union on Thursday night and early Monday. The group put up about 150 posters to recognize the 27th anniversary of the Roe vs. Wade decision.

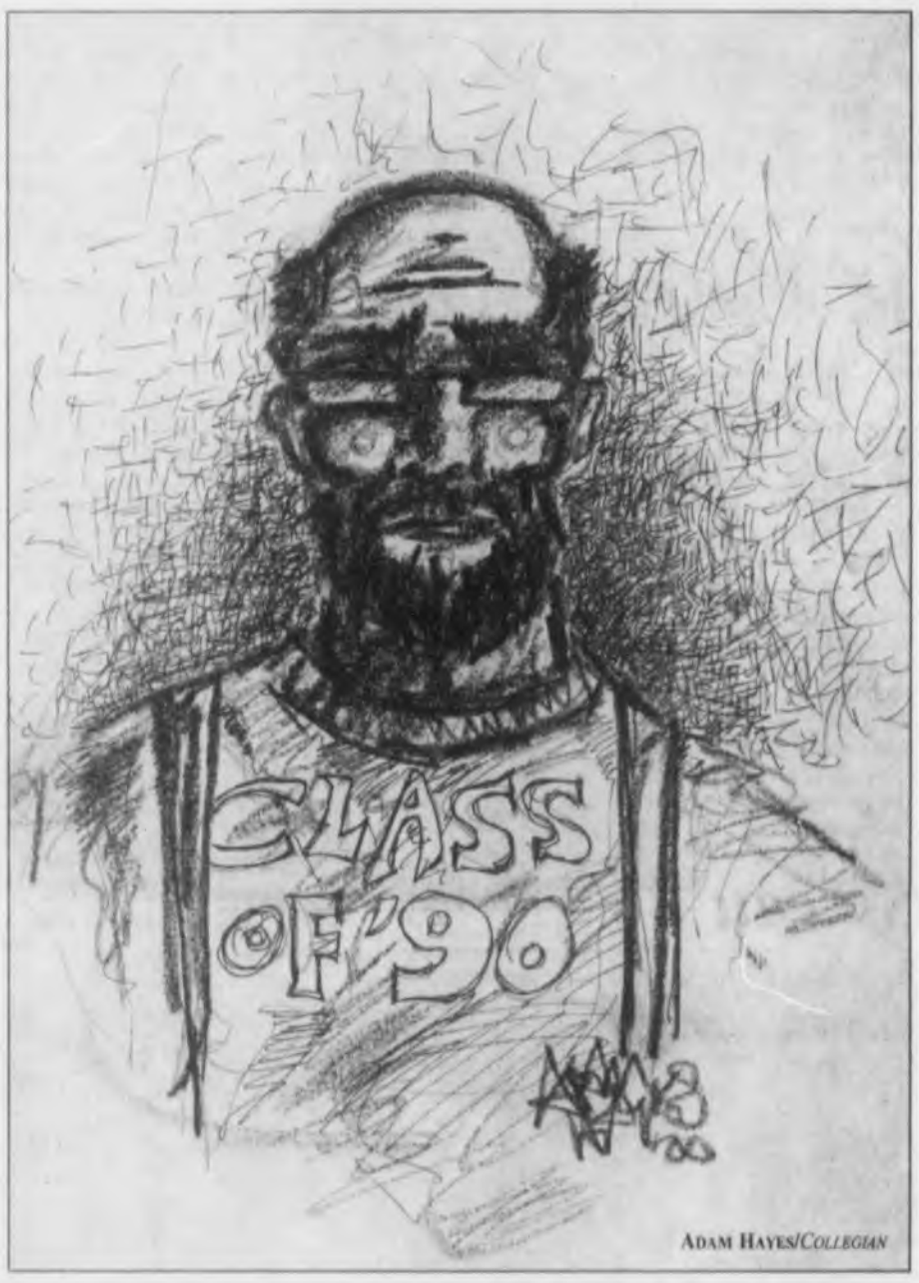
While the group's perspective on abortion is important and deserves to be expressed just as much as the opposite view, it must be done in the right manner. All groups are required to receive approval before posting materials on campus.

Some members of the group — which is not a formal campus group — expressed concern that they were required to have permission to display their materials. Holly Burmeister, graduate student in English, said it discourages the free exchange of ideas that we claim to be ideal.

Burmeister is correct in her assertion that speech must be protected. However, at the same time, other factors must be borne in mind.

To begin with, unauthorized posting quickly would detract from the appearance of K-State's campus. Signs, flyers and chalkings quickly would add up to a conglomeration of unheeded messages.

In addition, the requirement is a measure being taken to assure there will not be an influx of advertisers storming the campus anytime soon.



If the requirements in any way put limits on the freedom of speech and expression, there would be definite problems with these regulations.

However, they do not. Any group such as this can post materials on campus or express their opinions openly. These rules simply assure us that our campus will remain clean and orderly, and that we will not have to peer through a blizzard of advertising everyday on our way to the Union.

HISTORIC

Aging process not selective, though some wish it were

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

"They all have husbands and wives and children and houses and dogs, and, you know, they've all made themselves a part of something, and they can talk about what they do. What am I gonna say? 'I killed the president of Paraguay with a fork. How've you been?'" —Martin Blank, "Grosse Pointe Blank"

KEN WELLS

Maybe it's the post-1900s effect, maybe it's the winter, maybe it's the fact that Tennessee and St. Louis are in the Super Bowl. Whatever the cause, it's happening to me, finally, and it'll probably happen to you, eventually. I'm getting, or at least feeling, old.

Age here is irrelevant. Mostly. I guess it helps that I have a library card to the library in Alexandria, my first report card is chiseled in stone and I took Latin as my modern language requirement. Still, being older than snot only goes so far. There are people three times my age capable of running in marathons or swimming across large bodies of water while I kvetch about walking across the street to the K-State Student Union to drink something that doesn't cost a buck and come in a nonrecyclable bottle.

According to my last carbon-dating, I'm not fully fossilized yet, not to Bob Dole-like extremes. Then why am I falling apart faster than a 73 Chevy Nova?

My right knee locked up during New Year's and wouldn't support my own weight. Everyone thought I was drunk. No, everyone else is hurling themselves over furniture with glee, and I'm actually feeling every bruise and cursing out of spite rather than Schlitz. My cognitive ability, always a controversial attribute, has been unquestionably limited lately. I tried to feed an ATM my driver's license. I keep forgetting that stop lights mean "stop," not "go if it's all clear." My once-catlike reflexes are duller than Al Gore reading the Washington, D.C., phone book aloud. And crotchety? My squirrel-killer stare is back in full force. If I had a cane I'd hit you with it.

I think I've figured out why I've gone from Tiny Tim to Scrooge overnight, though. It's a conspiracy, or at least a coincidence (what's the difference?).

First of all, we've crossed that long-awaited, long-dreaded Jan. 1, 2000, barrier. Ever since Prince's "1999," my generation kept pondering where they'd be, what they'd be doing on that monumental moment.

Me? I never thought I'd make it. I figured a blood enemy or catastrophic spin of the karma wheel or typically colossal misstep would've tagged me out of the great ballgame by now. (Guess I've got those Yankee-Red Sox umpires). Now the overwhelming attitude, with that threshold being crossed, is, "Hrmph, now what?"

Oh, and the kicker. My high school class is having a reunion. Most of these people I've never seen since leaving quite a few years ago, and I'm pretty much glad. Some of these people just never liked me, and vice versa, and I really don't want to have to look impressed when they talk about their car dealership or pet-grooming business.

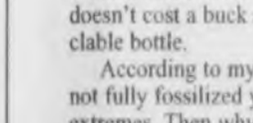
The main reason, though, is that when I knew these people, we were in what my principal called "the best years of our lives," a statement he should be paying for, through some mechanism or another, right now. We were children. Maturity, even in high school, even among the best of us, didn't surface too often.

The portraits I have of so many of these people is that of those firmly grasping their youth and brandishing it like flaming sword, fighting back every possible demon. These were people characterized, defined by limitless potential, infinite possibilities and high hopes, people with wild, fiery eyes, ready for whatever the world had to offer. Against such awesome potential, how can even the best of us survive reality?

If I don't go back, if I stay here, those children I knew survive in my mind with crystal clarity, if nowhere else. They'll never be supplanted by adults, however successful, however happy with their own little niches in life. I mean, it's bad enough that I have to bear the burdens of adulthood (not that I do a good job of it), but it seems like such a shame to force that yoke onto children who could be saved that fate simply by turning away.

So, do I turn away from those old friends lost to me for years, or do I face that gauntlet of buried hatchets and barely-repressed psychoses? Who knows? (Better question is "Who amongst us cares?" I know better than to raise my hand right now).

I think I've lost track of the key to human survival, the capacity to adapt and deal with change. I'm knee-deep in denial, wanting my cohorts to stay 17 forever.



My mind's not geared to deal with all those years of change per person hitting all at once, giving me, hrm, about a millennium of unfettered change to cope with. But the very essence of life is change and growth, and by virtue of living, they've been changing. Maybe I can't grasp that that's not necessarily a bad thing, just a little harder to keep it all straight in your head, especially if you've been cloistered in "higher education" for several eons, resisting with locked knees and angry frown against the march of time. I should know this. But fossilized brains take a while to process data.

Maybe you've already had to deal with this and survived, in which case I envy you and salute you. If you haven't, be prepared. It might not seem like a huge obstacle now, but you might be surprised that the world keeps turning even when you're not watching, and sometimes it just spins faster than you think possible. Calendars lie to the spectators of life.

Republicans, conservative white men not only source of racial slurs

GUEST VIEWPOINT

DERRICK GREEN

I am writing in response to David Levin's column on Thursday titled "Republican Racism." In his column, Levin asserts there are elite members of the GOP who have not helped the cause of racial harmony in America. As an African-American male, I want to point out that while that might be true, racist views are not the sole property of the GOP or conservative white men.

Recently, Vice President Al Gore's campaign manager, Donna Brazile, used "race-baiting" comments to describe the Republican party and partisan members Gen. Colin Powell and Rep. J.C. Watts, two African-American men. In his column Levin notes that — in the 1950s — Sen. Jesse Helms, R-NC, called reporter David Brinkley a "turn-coat Southern turned Northern radical."

Essentially, Brazile has made similar unkind remarks about Powell and Watts, whose only fault in her eyes is that they are Republicans.

As Democrats traditionally have counted on the African-American vote, Gore has been careful neither to criticize nor dispute her point. What message does this send? If you are an African-American, and a member of the Democratic party, and espouse racist views towards the dominant race in America, that's OK?

By now everyone is familiar with Atlanta Braves pitcher John Rocker and his infamous interview with Sports Illustrated. Rocker claims his comments were taken out of context and he just lost control in the interview. Rocker's words have done little, if anything, to sway public opinion.

Yet, when Philadelphia Eagles rookie quarterback Donovan McNabb indicated he believed race was playing a role in his contract negotiations with the Eagles (a team that had had two black starting quarterbacks in recent years and a black head coach) and then indicated that his remarks had "been blown way out of proportion," no one called for the Eagles to sever their ties to McNabb.

Recently, the Rev. Jesse Jackson has been involved in two situations in which he felt African-Americans had been dealt with too harshly. First, there was his well-publicized involvement in Decatur, Ill., where he said he believed several students received a punishment too severe for their actions. The punishment might have been unjustified, but would Jackson have fought so hard for those students if they were white? Jackson also has called for an investigation into the firing of Coach Ray Rhodes by the Green Bay Packers, claiming he might have been kept to a different standard because he was African-American. The Packers might have had a quick trigger, but has anyone made any significant noise about the quick trigger of Jerry Jones, owner of the Dallas Cowboys? Where was Jackson when Coach Chan Gailey was fired by Jones, despite an NFC East title and playoff appearance in 1998?

The point is that racism in America comes in all colors. No matter what the skin tone or political affiliation, the race card is always dealt from the bottom of the deck. I agree with Levin's point that to "remain silent in the face of hatred is to show passive agreement, or worse, indifference."

As African-Americans, we do not have any sort of license that allows us to espouse racist views on one hand and then abhor anyone else's racist views on the other. Indeed, if the goal for America is racial harmony, then we must speak out against all racism. Martin Luther King Jr. had a dream that his "four little children would one day be judged, not by the color of their skin but by the content of their character." If we are going to "stand vigilant against racism and bigotry," as Levin suggests, we must judge all people by the content of their character.

This includes calling any person who espouses bigoted and hateful views a racist, even if they happen to be an African-American, are affiliated with the Democratic Party or both.

Roney's claim incorrect; abortion women's choice

Editor,

I support everyone's right to their own opinion, but when the opinion of a columnist is based on seemingly no evidence and reflects his or her privileged position in society, it is unfortunate to see it in print.

Scott Roney's claim that "it is an established and recognized medical and scientific fact that life begins at conception" is blatantly false. It might be a scientific fact that at conception cells begin to divide, but the definition of life is hardly so concrete. At conception, a fetus cannot cognize or feel; as Roney pointed out, it is more than one month into a pregnancy before even the smallest brain activity is measurable. But this isn't really the issue.

Few abortions occur because the parents decide they do not want to raise a handicapped child. In fact, most states outlaw these types of abortions. Roney wrote that, if we allow fetuses with disabilities to be aborted, we have to allow grown persons with handicaps to be shot. This makes no sense. A grown person is no longer part of a woman's body, has grown to a capable age, can display intent and memory and can identify with others. These all differentiate a fetus from a grown person, making his analogy frivolous and wrong.

I find pro-life arguments from men to be valid right up until they start talking about a woman's right to choose how to treat her own body. Until men are capable of assuming the responsibility of carrying a child to term, they cannot fully understand the fear, pain and emotional and financial burdens that can accompany an unwanted pregnancy. Roney's ideals reflect an utter ignorance of a significant proportion of society that might not have been raised in white, male, middle-class America.

One last thing. Do not bash Margaret Sanger until you actually know who she is. Sanger's goal in the very early 1900s (before Roe vs. Wade) was to provide all women access to and information about birth control, such as condoms. In the 1920s and 30s, women's reproductive health was governed by their husbands, and the inability to control conception prevented many women from pursuing careers, furthering their educations and basically leading a life outside the domestic sphere.

I urge anyone who read this column to question critically what was said. With no data or source, who is Roney to say that a disproportionate number of abortions are performed on poor and minority women? And even if this is true, what is the point here? To stigmatize these women? Might you one day see beyond the halls of Durland Hall, Roney.

Colombian president cites human rights gains

■ Pastrana said violations from Colombian Army have dropped from 2,000 to 70.

BY GEORGE GEDDA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON,D.C.—Colombian President Andres Pastrana expressed hope Tuesday that a substantial decline in human rights violations by the Colombian Army will ease congressional concerns about a proposed two-year, $1.6 billion U.S. aid package for his country.

"We know we have problems regarding human rights in Colombia," Pastrana said after a 45-minute meeting with President Clinton.

Pastrana said there has been a substantial drop in the number of violations committed by the Colombian Army. Without being more specific, he said the violations have fallen from 2,000 to 70.

A State Department official, asking not to be identified, agreed that the army's rights record has improved in its struggle against both a leftist insurgency and drug traffickers. He said the paramilitary groups linked to the army are responsible for most violations, followed by leftist guerrillas.

Paramilitary groups have killed thousands of people they accuse of collaborating with the guerrillas.

Pastrana spoke briefly with reporters outside the White House, buffeted by a snowstorm.

Among skeptics about the aid package is Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who has said a concerted effort is needed by the Colombian Army to thwart the paramilitary groups.

He also said the Colombian Army must show a greater willingness to turn over personnel accused of rights violations. Other Democrats share Leahy's concerns.

Before his meeting with Pastrana, Clinton acknowledged to reporters there was no guarantee that the aid program, primarily aimed at curbing drug traffickers, would produce the desired results.

"There's always a risk when you go out on a limb to try to save a neighbor and help people to help themselves, that it won't work," Clinton said. "I believe the risk in the investment is something that we ought to do."

He said Colombia's twin challenges of drug trafficking and a guerrilla insurgency could be a microcosm of what lies ahead worldwide in the new century — enemies of nation-states forming networks of support across national borders and across otherwise discrete interests. As examples, he mentioned drug traffickers, organized criminals, political terrorists and weapons dealers.

"One of the things that we have to do is to try to help them (Colombians) gain some measure of control over their own country again," Clinton said.

Some states disagree with effort to break up Microsoft

■ Restriction on behavior favored by some officials.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Signaling a potential division within ranks that could complicate settlement talks in the Microsoft trial, some states active in the case believe the Justice Department's plan to break up one of the world's most successful companies might not be the best solution.

Although debate continues in secret among the 19 state attorney generals deciding what to recommend about Microsoft Corp., there is a risk the government might fail to bring a unified proposal on sanctions to U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson. He bluntly told government lawyers to agree among themselves before they present in court any plan for sanctions.

"I would not like to have to deal with divergent points of view," Jackson told them in a private meeting in November.

Illustrating the difficulties in achieving such consensus, Ohio's attorney general indicated she is leaning toward a ban on some of Microsoft's behavior toward others in the technology industry rather than a forced restructuring of the software giant.

Calling the dilemma the most difficult professional decision with which she ever became involved, Ohio Attorney General Betty Montgomery told The Associated Press that a breakup of Microsoft never has been her priority.

"I have to tell you that my bias is toward a conduct resolution, but again it's too early to be specific," Montgomery said. "Quite frankly, I indicated to my staff when we started this lawsuit that I was not looking out for a structural solution as much as a conduct solution."

An official in another of the 19 states, who spoke on condition of anonymity, also has hinted that a breakup — considered the death penalty among possible remedies — might be too disruptive for consumers.

Critics have suggested a court-ordered breakup could result in different — even incompatible — versions of Microsoft's dominant Windows software, which is entrenched as a de facto standard for running most of the world's personal computers.

Montgomery, a Republican now in her second and final term as attorney general, indicated the states might eventually endorse a breakup, such as Justice's idea of splitting Microsoft into three parts. She also suggested not all the states might participate fully.

"I can't tell you at this point what the resolution will be, and what I will feel about it and whether Ohio will join in that solution," Montgomery said.

She declined to discuss the ongoing settlement talks in Chicago with a federal mediator, U.S. Circuit Judge Richard Posner.

Others close to the talks said Posner wrote a letter demanding renewed secrecy earlier this month after there were leaks about the Justice Department's plan to dismantle Microsoft.

"It is a very hard negotiation, and it's very difficult to predict where it's going to end," Montgomery said.

One expert said arriving at a unified proposal without significant dissent will be difficult because attorney generals — many of whom aspire to higher elected office — are sensitive to polls showing strong opposition to government breakup plans.

"The states, because of this direct connection to the electorate, do pay more attention to the views of constituents," said antitrust expert William Kovacic of George Washington University.

He also said the increasingly important role of the states signifies the extent to which the power in this nationally important economic decision has seeped out of Washington.

Microsoft executives have dismissed discussion of sanctions as premature.

However, the company's newly appointed chief executive officer, Steve Ballmer, wrote in a letter to the editor of The Washington Post this week that breaking up Microsoft would be bad for the company, the industry and, most importantly, consumers.

"It's disheartening to see a handful of pundits and special interests campaigning for such extreme regulations against Microsoft," Ballmer wrote.

Montgomery said she was concerned that Microsoft could dominate Internet commerce unfairly.

"The reason I got into the litigation was because I did not want one tollgate at the e-commerce highway," she said.

The next round of courtroom arguments will be Feb. 22.

Unless the case is settled, which appears unlikely, the judge probably will rule by April on which antitrust laws Microsoft violated.

A hearing to decide Microsoft's fate could come by spring or early summer.

Pitchers recruited will help team ERA

BY MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finishing 9th out of 11 teams in the Big 12 Conference isn't particularly satisfying. Just ask K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark.

But that's where the Wildcats finished in team ERA last season, so Clark made pitching the focal point of his 2001 recruiting class.

"We really met our needs with this class," Clark said. "We're excited about the potential of all four of the pitchers we got."

Three of the four pitchers will come from the community - college ranks in Ricky Rooks, a 6-foot-5 inch, 245 pound southpaw from Johnson County Community College; Tyson Helsel a 6-foot, 190 pound lefty from Kansas City Kansas Community College; and Justin Williams, a 6-foot-2-inch, 200 pound pitcher from Seward County Community College. They will bring experience to a team that loses 21 of its 26 pitching victories from last season, as well as three of the top - four team leaders in ERA.

"Rooks and Helsel are both quality left-handers — we'll get a little better balance with left-handed and right-handed as well," Clark said. "Williams is also a very talented young man with the potential to be a big winner at this level."

Helsel went 6-1 at KCK Community College last year with a 5.67 ERA and 73 strike-outs in 54 innings of work.

K-State ventured into Oklahoma territory to land one of the premier talents in the Midwest, in Eric Rollins of Ada, Okla. His fastball already is in the low 90s, and Clark said he expects it to increase.

"He has a world of potential, and we really think he has a chance to become very special," Clark said.

Jared Brite of Bakersfield, Calif., a punter/kicker who has verbally committed to play football for the Wildcats next year, also is expected to pitch for K-State. He was rated as the 48th best high school prospect by Baseball America.

Clark can't comment on him

Cats work to break 4-game losing streak

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If there is a time to panic for K-State, it might be right now.

The Wildcats, who are riding a four-game losing streak, are getting set to face the No. 15 Oklahoma State Cowboys at 7 p.m. tonight at Bramlage Coliseum. With that in mind, losing No. 5 in a row is not much of a stretch.

After defeating Nebraska to open the Big 12 season, K-State has experienced a downhill slide, dropping contests against Kansas, Missouri, Iowa State and, most recently, to Colorado on Saturday.

Assistant coach Mark Fox said that despite K-State's woes, the Cowboys will be coming to Manhattan, and they like their chances at home, where they are 7-2 this season.

"I really don't think there is any time to panic," Fox said. "There is a lot of time left to do things. We just have to keep our head up and above water for now, and we'll be fine.

"Oklahoma State is coming to our house, and we've been pretty good at home this year. I really expect a good game."

The Cowboys, who were upset last Saturday by Texas A & M, have posted a 14-2 record so far, including a 3-1 mark in the conference. The Cats, on the other hand, have fallen to 8-8 overall and 1-4 in the conference with their recent plummet.

Oklahoma State features plenty of talent and a lot of scoring threats, considering the Cowboys' average margin of victory is 19 points a game. Three players average double figures, while three more average just under 10 points per game.

Leading the way for the conference's fifth-ranked squad are senior forwards Desmond Mason, who averages 18.6 points and 7.2 rebounds per game, and Brian Montonati, who averages 13.2 and 7.7 per contest.

Women netters open season with upset victory in Arizona meet

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State opened the spring 2000 tennis season in championship form with a 5-4 upset over No. 29 San Diego on Friday at the University of Arizona Invitational in Tucson, Ariz.

"It's a very good start," head coach Steve Bietau said. "To my knowledge, it's the highest ranked opponent we've ever beaten."

Freshman Petra Sedlmajerova (Usti Nad Labem, Czech Republic) led K-State with a 7-6 (5), 6-1, victory over the nation's No. 3 player, Katarina Valkyova. The win marked the highest ranked opponent any K-State tennis player has ever defeated.

"I think it was a combination of Valkyova being a little off for the game, and Petra doing a great job of exploiting that," Bietau said.

The Cats started slow, falling behind in all three doubles matches before pulling off two come-from-behind victories.

The duo of Sedlmajerova and junior co-captain Eva Novotna' (Pardubice, Czech Republic) won 8-6 at No. 2 doubles and sophomores Kathy Chuda and Vesselina Jeliazkova teamed to win 8-6 at the No. 3 doubles position.

"Our players showed a lot of composure at a critical time of the match and the result was being able to win both of those doubles matches," Bietau said.

In singles competition, sophomore Alena Jecminkova (Libusina, Czech Republic) was pitted against Zuzana Lesnenarova, the top-ranked player in the nation.

"I think, basically, Alena gave her a little too much respect in the beginning of the match," Bietau said.

"It was more a question of her asserting herself and playing more aggressively, and as she did that, the match got much closer."

Although Jecminkova lost the match, 6-1, 6-4, K-State triumphed at the No. 2, 3 and 5 slots to shock San Diego.

In Saturday's tournament action, the No. 62 Wildcats fell 5-4 to No. 27 New Mexico.

K-State won its top-three singles matches but lost two critical others to the Lobos in three sets.

"I think the important point in the New Mexico match was that their team challenged us in a much different way," Bietau said.

"They have such a wide range of great players that use a much more defensive style, basically, to keep the ball in play and wait for our players to make a mistake.

"It just presents a different challenge in attacking that — it shows us some things that have to be done," Bietau said. "That was really the whole point of this weekend, to test ourselves against three very good teams and find out exactly where we are."

On Sunday, K-State rounded out the weekend competition with an 8-1 loss to host Arizona.

"They have four very solid players," Bietau said. "Arizona probably has a combination of the best characteristics of both (San Diego and New Mexico). They had some firepower and would in no way beat themselves.

"They were clearly the best team there for the weekend. I don't think they had a match closer than 7-2."

Sedlmajerova ended her perfect start to the spring season with a 7-5, 6-1, win over Uzma Kahn.

"It was a great weekend for her," Bietau said. "These are three high quality wins. To have a freshman come in and have those kind of results, and with the room she's got for improvement, it's very encouraging."

Thomas' spinal cord not as damaged as expected

BY MARK LONG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Derrick Thomas underwent more than four hours of surgery Tuesday to rebuild part of his spine, and doctors said his spinal cord was not damaged as badly as feared.

Thomas' spinal cord was severely bruised, neurosurgeon Barth Green said.

Doctors originally thought it might have been severed when Thomas, 33, was thrown from his car Sunday after losing control on an icy highway near Kansas City, Mo. Thomas broke his spine and neck and wound up semi-conscious with no feeling in his legs.

Though the NFL star remained paralyzed from the chest down at Jackson Memorial Hospital, doctors expressed hope he'd walk again.

"There have been cases of people with similar injuries who have recovered, and there have been people who haven't recovered," Green said. "Anybody who knows Derrick knows that you don't bet against him. But it's too early to tell right now. We just have to see how he does."

The Kansas City Chiefs linebacker's operation included decompressing the spinal cord, stabilizing the spinal column with screws, titanium rods and hooks, and implanting bone grafts from Thomas' hip.

Doctors said surgery went as planned and that Thomas, who remained sedated Tuesday afternoon, could be transferred to a rehabilitation facility in about two weeks. He already has begun working with therapists.

In the meantime, he will be surrounded with family and friends. His mother, Edith Morgan, and other relatives were at the hospital along with teammate James Hasty and former teammate Neil Smith.

"Derrick is in very good spirits, he's got his usual sense of humor and he's taking all of this one day at a time," Morgan said. "One of the first things he said to me was, 'Mom, I'm going to have to have a lot of rehab.' But he's real positive and real optimistic about everything.

"We know that we have a long road ahead of us, but we're going to get through this."

Memories of linebacker bittersweet in light of career-ending accident

Super Bowl XXXIV this weekend will provide a perfect stage for one of the NFL's youngest stars, Tennessee Titans defensive end and NFL defensive rookie of the year Jevon Kearse, to light up the pass-happy St. Louis Rams for all the world to see.

The notion of Kearse capping off his rookie season with a superlative game against the favored Rams, on sport's biggest stage, is a star-making possibility so ideal that even Hollywood would reject it as being implausible. Kearse has an opportunity to reach the pinnacle of his sport and his craft — to become "the next Lawrence Taylor." In a cruel, sad irony only real life could script, he will be watched from a hospital bed in Florida, where the last "next Lawrence Taylor" lies unable to move his legs.

For the past 11 years of my life, I have been thrilled by the exploits of Kansas City Chiefs linebacker Derrick Thomas. I doubt if some events in my life, from wearing my authentic red-and-gold No. 58 jersey to my current vocation as a sports writer, would be quite the same if not for many Sundays spent watching Thomas wreak havoc on opponents.

That is why I'll feel a twinge of sadness Sunday as I watch Kearse dart across the Georgia Dome turf. His physique and his playing style could not more resemble Thomas if he were a clone. It will be sad to watch Kearse, and know that he is playing for the one prize that Thomas never got a chance to.

It is another poor irony that speed, the very thing that built and defined Thomas' career, also is the thing that ended it Sunday when his car lost control and slid off an icy stretch of Interstate 435. Since Thomas was picked by Kansas City with the fourth choice in the 1989 draft, he has made a living of doing things fast.

Like Kearse, Thomas instantly rose to stardom, earning Pro Bowl honors and winning the rookie-of-the-year award. From the start, he was something special. When Thomas' hand touched the ground at the outside-linebacker position, he was like a coiled spring waiting to be released.

His blur-fast moves enabled him to be halfway to the quarterback quicker than opposing tackles could budge from their stances. Once there, one brutal collision and one signature rip from the arm he whirled like a buzzsaw separated the quarterback not only from the football, but also from any sense of confidence in surviving an afternoon against the Chiefs' defense.

Like that, in a heartbeat, in less time than it took for Thomas to span the distance from the line of scrimmage to his next victim, he had become the most feared defensive player in football. In 1990, Thomas set an NFL record with seven sacks during a single game against Seattle, on his way to leading the league with an astronomical 20.

If fault can be found with Thomas' career, it is here, for in a way, his breath-taking ascent would plague him throughout his career. In a way, Thomas hurt himself by succeeding. From 1991-98, he averaged 11.5 sacks, forced 29 fumbles and recorded seven of his nine Pro Bowl appearances.

Women fall to Cyclones

BY CHUCK SCHOFFNER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMES, Iowa — Desiree Francis scored 20 points and No. 6 Iowa State survived its worst shooting of the season and a flurry of K-State misses at the end to escape with a 64-61 victory Tuesday night.

Iowa State (15-2, 6-0 Big 12) was not assured of its 11th straight victory, one short of the school record, until a three-point shot by K-State's Angie Finkes from the right corner bounced off the rim at the buzzer.

It was the last of five misses by the Wildcats (9-11, 2-5) in the final minute.

Iowa State got a big lift from freshman Lindsey Wilson, who drove fearlessly into the heart of K-State's zone defense for baskets or to set up her teammates. Wilson scored 12 points, including two free throws with 45.5 seconds left to make it 64-61.

K-State then had all the chances it could ask to cut into the lead or tie.

April Sailors missed a 3-point shot, and Finkes and Kim Woodlee misfired inside. After being awarded possession on a jump ball, K-State surprised the Cyclones by having 6-foot-6 Olga Firsova try a three from the right wing, and she also missed. The ball went out of bounds with 0.6 seconds remaining, enough time for Finkes to try her final shot.

The scoring by Francis, who also had 10 rebounds, and Wilson offset subpar games by Iowa State's two veterans, Stacy Frese and Megan Taylor. Frese made only 4-of-12 shots in scoring 10 points. Taylor had five on 2-for-13 shooting. Angie Welle scored 12 points for Iowa State, all but one in the second half.

Iowa State shot just 33 percent (22-for-66) despite having numerous open shots. The Cyclones missed six shots on one possession during a stretch of eight minutes without a basket in the first half and missed four shots on a second-half possession. Finkes led K-State with 16 points, Kristin Rethman scored 13 and April Sailors 12.

Sailors, a 27.7-percent shooter from three-point range, scored all of her points on 4-for-8 three-point shooting.

Sailors made three of her treys during a 4:20 span in the second half, including one she she banked in from the top of the key as the shot clock buzzer sounded to give the Wildcats a 52-45 lead with 8:30 left.

Iowa State then denied K-State on four consecutive possessions and scored eight straight points to take a 53-52 lead, Francis capping the run with a three-point play. K-State led twice after that before Wilson scored on a drive to tie it at 57 with 3:32 remaining.

A minute later, after Sailors missed the front end of a one-an-one, Wilson fed Welle streaking down the court for a layup.

Welle was fouled on the shot and made the free throw to put the Cyclones ahead to stay at 60-57 with 2:23 left.

Yet skeptics expected ever greater feats from the linebacking sensation. After he rewrote the record books so soon, what miraculous feats could be a sufficient encore?

Through double teams, different supporting casts, different positions in different defensive schemes and skeptics' criticism, always taking up slack for an offense that bordered on the inept, Thomas stayed in the same place — near the quarterback. Thanks to him, the Chiefs stayed in their place near the top of the standings.

For all of his victories, it was perhaps in the recent twilight of his career that Thomas began to gleam most brightly. Following a position switch to the strong side last season, Thomas played the most disciplined, well-rounded football of his career. Under new coach Gunther Cunningham, the Chiefs looked like a team on the rise, renewing hopes that Thomas might yet play in a Super Bowl.

Now those hopes are diminished, scattered in the ditch where his car came to rest Sunday.

Thrown from the car, Thomas escaped with his life, but not with the use of his legs, which was robbed by broken vertebrae. Though he might someday walk again, he faces a long, slow recovery, and a life forever separate from the speed and ease with which he once played and lived.

His NFL career likely over, Thomas now must be content with his place in football history.

He stands ninth all-time in quarterback sacks and will be remembered as the author of a revolution in pass-rushing, which will be visible in every snap played Sunday by Kearse, the Titans' No. 90.

While Kearse traces Thomas' steps on the road of NFL heroism, Thomas will begin negotiating a harder, more foreign road. Where they each will end is yet to be seen, but in a just world, the now-divergent paths of these kindred players will meet again someday in Canton, Ohio.

There, Thomas hopefully will be able to walk up to congratulate Kearse, his fellow Hall-of-Famer.

"You were pretty darned good," Thomas will say.

"I had to be," Kearse will reply. "It took a lot to become 'the next Derrick Thomas.'"

Fox said Mason is a contender for Big 12 Player of the Year.

"Desmond Mason is an all-league player," Fox said. "He's playing awfully well, and we have to keep pressure on him because he is definitely a player that can hurt you."

Oklahoma State's senior guards Doug Gottlieb and Glendon Alexander also have powered through opponents. Gottlieb leads the nation in assists per game with 9.6, while adding seven points per game as well. Alexander has averaged 12.2 points per contest off the bench.

K-State will need a solid defensive effort to stop the Cowboys. Oklahoma State ranks 21st in the country in scoring offense, while averaging 80.6 points per game.

The Cowboys' point total can be attributed to its 49.4—percent shooting from the field, which ranks No. 8 in the nation.

"Gottlieb doesn't get guarded," Fox said. "It's amazing to see, but teams just don't guard him. When you don't do that, he makes great passes and gets the ball to a lot of people. He's not a great shooter, but he's a great distributor.

"He has a lot of guys around him that make the plays when he gets them the ball."

The Cats are entering the game with some offensive weapons of their own. Senior forward Tony Kitt is averaging nearly a double-double per game with 13 points and 9.9 rebounds.

In the Big 12 season, guards Cortez Groves and Galen Morrison have raised their level of play, both posting double-figure scoring averages with 16.3 and 11.3 points per game, respectively.

Although Morrison opened the conference season averaging 22 points per game against Nebraska and Kansas, he since has struggled, shooting just 26 percent from the field for nine points per game.

Fox said Morrison's recent drop-off is a result of the tough Big 12 defense.

"They know he started off strong and have done things to slow him down," he said. "He may be in a bit of a slump, and until he can overcome their defense, he's going to have to do other things to help the team out."

until he officially signs a letter of intent, which he is expected to do Feb. 2.

The Cats also signed three community-college players in third baseman Justin Dehmer, shortstop Osmar Castillo and outfielder Nick Sorensen.

Dehmer hit .351 with 38 runs batted in at Central Arizona College en route to his team's berth in the National Junior College Athletic Association World Series.

"He's a real steady ballplayer and is strong defensively," Clark said.

"He hits for average and has pretty good gap power."

While playing at Dodge City Community College last season, Castillo posted a .374 batting average with 11 doubles and 13 stolen bases.

"If he could run a little better, he'd be a top—20 draft pick," Clark said. "That's really the only thing stopping the pros from going after him."

Sorensen is the brother of former Wichita State Shocker Zac Sorensen and will play his second season at Seward County Community College this spring.

"He's a very talented outfielder and has the potential to play a corner position," Clark said.

"He's extremely fast and has good power potential — just a great, great athlete."

Bishop won't play baseball

The rumors that former Wildcat quarterback Michael Bishop will return to Manhattan to play baseball at K-State can officially be squashed.

"It's something that we would have loved to have had happened," Clark said, "but he's got other commitments that he's got to concentrate on."

Clark said Bishop had contacted him a few months ago about the possibility of playing baseball for the Cats, but that he hadn't spoken with Bishop since the initial telephone call.

L.A. school board discusses future of unfinished 'crown jewel' school

■ The Belmont Learning Complex already has cost the district $170 million.

BY TOM VERDIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The fate of the nation's costliest high school was in the hands of the Los Angeles school board Tuesday as members debated what to do with the unfinished complex, built on a toxic site.

The Belmont Learning Complex was supposed to be the crown jewel of the nation's second-largest school district, with room for 5,300 students in a desperately overcrowded part of downtown. Instead, construction was halted after the district spent $170 million because of environmental concerns.

The complex was built on an old oil field, and officials fear it could be contaminated with hydrogen sulfide and methane gas that could form explosive pockets under the foundation.

The debate over Belmont is one of the biggest issues in the beleaguered district, which recently lost its superintendent, in part, because of the Belmont debacle.

In October, an expert panel set up just to decide what to do with the school voted 4-3 to recommend that it be completed, with provisions made to deal with possible environmental problems.

The commissioners who voted for completing the project said starting over at a new site would cost far more, push back the opening of a new school many years and force thousands of students to be bused from the area to other campuses.

Last week, interim Superintendent Ramon Cortines proposed transforming the school into an administrative office and warehouse, because environmental regulations for adults are not as strict as they are for children.

District employees who would move to Belmont under Cortines' plan said they feared for their safety. Neighborhood residents and students, upset by overcrowded conditions and long bus commutes to other schools, organized rallies urging completion of the high school.

The teachers' union opposed its completion based on safety concerns and criticized the district for the expense, which could surpass $200 million.

Day Higuchi, president of the union that represents 42,000 teachers, counselors, psychologists and other professional staff, said the money used for Belmont could have built four high schools or 50 kindergarten through third-grade schools to ease crowding elsewhere in the district.

Gay marriage topic of debate in Vermont

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MONTPELIER, Vt. — A raging snowstorm couldn't keep more than 1,000 people from streaming into the Statehouse on Tuesday to weigh in on the debate over gay marriage.

Fewer than half that number were able to get into the House chamber, where two committees gave people their first opportunity to comment on last month's state Supreme Court ruling that said gay couples must be given the benefits of marriage.

The debate was civil, but emotional.

People wore their opinions on their lapels, with hundreds of pink circles declaring "I Support The Freedom to Marry" mixing with hundreds of blue ovals stating "Don't Mock Marriage."

People unable to squeeze into the House chamber crammed into hearing rooms to listen to testimony as it was piped through the building.

Gays and lesbians said they no longer want to be second-class citizen and those opposed to gay marriages cited scripture and the importance of a traditional family to make their case.

"Homosexuals should be protected from attack on their personal freedom," said Chris Bixby, who said he opposed gay marriage and believed the voters should decide the issue. "Marriage is not a civil right."

Lawmakers heard a variety of suggestions, ranging from granting gays and lesbians the right to marriage, creating a domestic-partnership system or adopting a constitutional amendment defining marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

"I want to sit anywhere on the bus I choose to sit," said Laurie Morrison, referring to the conclusion of some that a domestic-partnership system would be similar to the separate-but-equal laws that grew up as blacks sought the right to vote in the 1960s.

Security was tight as the House and Senate Judiciary committees oversaw the joint hearing. In a building that normally has no more than two law-enforcement officers at any one time, at least 20 uniformed and plainclothes officers roamed around.

The court said gay couples are being unconstitutionally denied the benefits of marriage. The justices left it up to the Legislature to decide whether to legalize gay marriage or approve some kind of domestic partnership instead.

The Roman Catholic Diocese had planned a silent vigil outside the Statehouse but canceled because the chartered bus company it had hired refused to carry protesters to Montpelier during a snowstorm.

Confirming a split that many legislators have sensed since the court ruled, a new poll showed 52 percent of those surveyed opposed the Supreme Court ruling, while 38 percent agreed and 10 percent said they weren't sure. The poll of 623 registered voters had a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Rep. Thomas Little, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, expects to begin drafting a bill by early next month and hopes to get it through the House by the beginning of March.

The Schwag to perform at Silverado Saloon tonight

BY JAINA K. STUTHEIT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All dead. All night.

The Schwag, a Grateful Dead tribute band from St. Louis, will be playing at 7 tonight at Silverado Saloon. There is a $5 cover charge.

Jimmy Tebeau, bass player and vocalist for The Schwag, said even though the show starts early, the band plans to jam as long as the bar will let it. He also said the band is excited about this show because it will be for ages 18 and older.

"We've played in Manhattan four times over the last several years, and all of those shows have been for ages 21 and older," Tebeau said.

"This could be one of the best shows yet, because it will be the first one to be open to the entire student body."

Tebeau said he enjoys playing in Manhattan because he can tell the audience is there for the music.

"The audience in Manhattan is always very responsive and listens well," he said. "I can tell the people in the audience are at the show to listen and enjoy."

The Schwag describes itself as a band of musicians out to preserve and perpetuate the vibe and music made popular by the Grateful Dead.

The group has headlined more than 1,000 shows since 1992, and plays more than 200 shows a year in 15 states.

They have opened for such groups as Little Feat, Leftover Salmon, Jerry Garcia Band, String Cheese Incident, Merl Saunders and the David Grisman Quintet.

Tebeau said The Schwag has a fan-based mailing list of more than 4,000 members. The names were collected from fans who either have been to shows or visited the group's Web site. Some of these fans happen to be K-State students.

"I think they are good musicians, and I like to dance to their music," Holly Smith, freshman in open-option, said. "I think they have more experience than other Dead cover bands, because they've been together for a long time and they are always touring."

Kristina Kramer, freshman in graphic design, said she has been listening to the Grateful Dead for about a year but has yet to hear another band play its music live.

"I've never seen The Schwag, but I am very excited to see them for the first time," she said.

The next stop for The Schwag will be Salina, Kan., where they will play at 10 p.m. Thursday at Happy's Pub. That show also will be for ages 18 and older, with a $5 charge at the door.

Tebeau said The Schwag has not previously played in Salina and he hopes for a good turnout.

After Salina, The Schwag will be on its way to Colorado for two weeks, where it has 11 shows lined up.

"We are really pumped about the gigs in Colorado," Tebeau said. "It's going to be a big adventure, because we don't really know where we're going to stay. We only know where we're going to play."

Tebeau said one of his favorite things about being a member of The Schwag is that the band gets to hang out with Deadheads all over the country.

He said covering Grateful Dead songs never results in playing the same two shows in a row.

"It's a different show every night, so musically, it never gets stale," he said. "It's never really stopped since we got together in 1992. It's a job that has turned into a way of life."

Lecture covers creationism

BY REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

David Hickey is a historian, critic and professor. K-State will see the critic in him.

Hickey will present a guest lecture, "Creationism and the Arts," at 4:30 p.m. Friday in the Union Big 12 Room. The lecture is part of the Department of Fine Arts' visiting artist series.

Anna Calluori Holcombe, professor of art and art department head, said Hickey will speak on topics that probably will stir up controversy within the audience. She said his topic of creationism will relate to the recent Kansas debate.

"He likes to jazz things up when he lectures," she said. "I guarantee he will be interesting and very knowledgeable. He has chosen a very timely topic."

Hickey, professor at the University of Nevada at Las Vegas, has written freelance articles for such publications as "Rolling Stone," "Playboy," "Penthouse" and "The New York Times." One of his most recent articles, "America's Vermeer," was published in the November 1999 issue of "Vanity Fair." The article discusses the influence of Norman Rockwell's illustrations.

Along with his freelance writing, Hickey has written two books, "The Invisible Dragon: Four Essays on Beauty" and "Air Guitar: Essays in Art and Democracy." Glen Brown, assistant professor of art and history, said the books discuss the elements of art, touching on beauty and other topics related to art criticism.

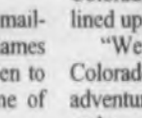
Brown said Hickey has worked as a gallery director in several cities, including the Reese Palley Gallery in New York City.

Brown said Hickey is an important contemporary art critic.

"He writes a lot about the neglected aspects of art," Brown said. "He believes art can make an important difference in society. All around, he's a great speaker."

Calluori Holcombe said that when criticizing art, only one side usually is covered. She said Hickey will discuss topics often unheard of by many artists and art students.

"He is going to cover the other side," she said. "He will discuss popular culture topics as well."



'Quest' parody of 'Star Trek'

BY KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you are vaguely familiar with the concepts surrounding the "Star Trek" series, you will love the spoof "Galaxy Quest."

If you are a nut about "Star Trek," chances are you will be offended by the friendly pokes at the genre and its fans.

moviereview

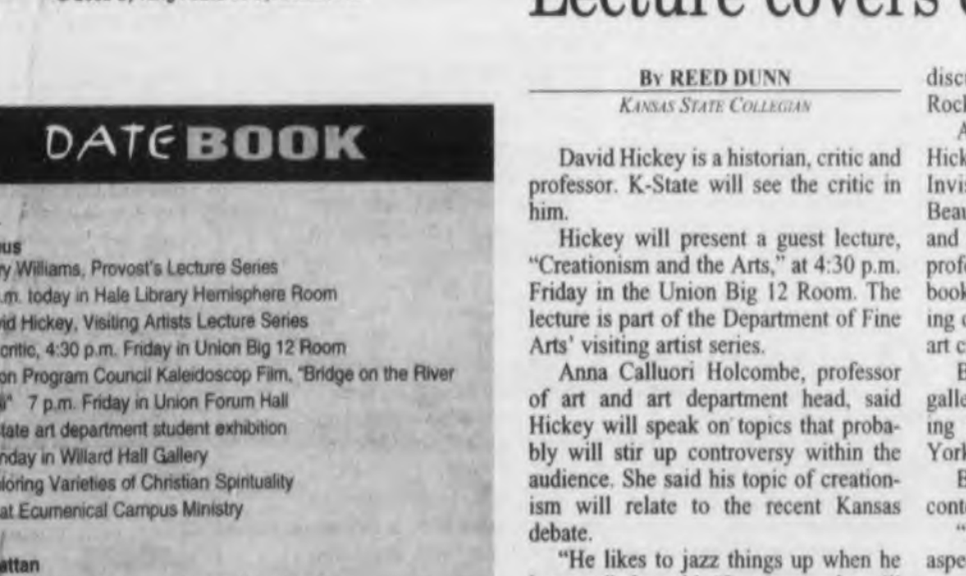
"Galaxy Quest"
Showing: Seth Childs Cinema at 7:25, 9:45 p.m.
Starring: Tim Allen, Sigourney Weaver and Alan Rickman

A friendly parody of the longest-lived science fiction saga, "Galaxy Quest" is the story of actors who are mistaken for the characters they play on television and are summoned by an alien race into space to help negotiate with a race of evil aliens.

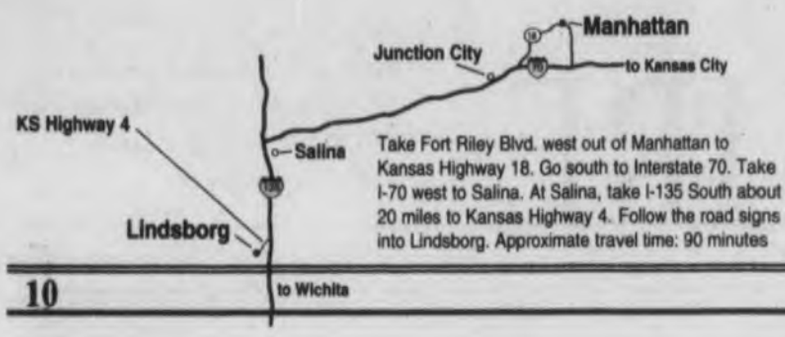
The first thing anyone notices about this movie is just how much fun the actors are having — and that fun rubs off onto the viewer. Even in the most dramatic scenes in the movie ("dramatic" being an extremely relative term here), the actors only are semi-serious. Nevertheless, they resist the temptation to really ham it up, avoiding the pitfall of some other movies of this sort.



The good humor of the actors carries well into the plot, which is fortunate. Otherwise, the viewer probably would question the plausibility of how an alien race designed an entire lifestyle (including the design and function of their space ship) around a television show.

That is the reason this movie should fall strictly into the comedy genre, not science fiction. It's another reason "Star Trek" fans might leave their Starfleet uniforms at home when they see this movie. Unlike science-fiction movies, there is no attempt at an adherence to science. Nothing in this movie could happen, and anyone who expects even an ounce of reality in this movie will be sorely disappointed.

Probably the most accurate issue in the movie is the treatment of the "Star Trek" pop culture, from the conventions to the fans, to the pigeonholed actors who can't shake their characters.



While the movie deals with these themes on a limited basis, the majority of the movie is belly-laughing fun — nothing more. Any search for deeper meaning is sorely misplaced.

Kenneth Sjogren, co-owner of Hemslojd, adds detail to a Dala horse. Thirty horses of varying sizes are made from each 18-foot sheet of sugar pine. The horses started in Sweden as toys, and have become the official symbol of Lindsborg. They hang in many doorways of community homes welcoming visitors.

Working with horses is not an unusual occupation in Kansas.

Working with the wooden painted variety is.

Hemslojd, which means handicraft, is a shop based in the town of Lindsborg, Kan. It has been making Dala Horses, as well as wooden candelabras, since 1984. Glass etching also takes place at the shop.

Dala Horses traditionally are painted reddish-orange with a brightly colored flower-patterned saddle. The horses, which originated in the Swedish province of Dalarna, have been recognized as an unofficial symbol of Sweden.

"The Swedish Dala Horse started out as a children's toy," Kenneth Sjogren, Hemslojd co-owner and craftsman, said. "The traditional color for the horse is a reddish color that came from the red pigment found in the ground from the iron and copper mines."

Sjogren said Lindsborg adopted the horse as the town's official symbol about 40 years ago.

"It became a symbol of the community and its Swedish heritage," he said.

Hemslojd has made more than 27,000 Dala Horses in its 16 years. Sjogren said they make the Dala Horses into plaques that hang in the entry of houses. Most people choose to have their last name or the Swedish words for "welcome" and "come again" painted on their horses.

Ken Swisher, Hemslojd co-owner and craftsman, said the store makes 30 horses at a time.

"We won't make just one," Swisher said. "We cut a batch of horses into four different sizes from an 18-foot-long piece of wood."

After cutting and sanding, the horses are dipped into a reddish-orange paint. Decoration and lettering is hand-painted onto the horses after three coats of the reddish-orange paint has dried.

Sjogren said he started making the Dala Horses with his family in his backyard as a hobby. He decided to take his hobby a step further.

"Ken lived across the street from me," Sjogren said. "His hobby was woodworking, and I was a graphic artist, so we became partners."

Aside from Dala Horses, Hemslojd also specializes in wooden candelabras.

Swisher said they make five different styles of candelabras. One of the more popular styles around the holiday season is called the Swedish Apple Tree.

"The base of the Swedish Apple Tree incorporates the Dala Horse. It also has four candles, eight or more red balls, or apples, and a bird on top," he said. "Years ago in Sweden, it would have sufficed as a Christmas tree."

The other styles of candelabras can be used year-round. Swisher said each candelabra has a natural finish and ranges in size. He has made some as large as 4 feet high.

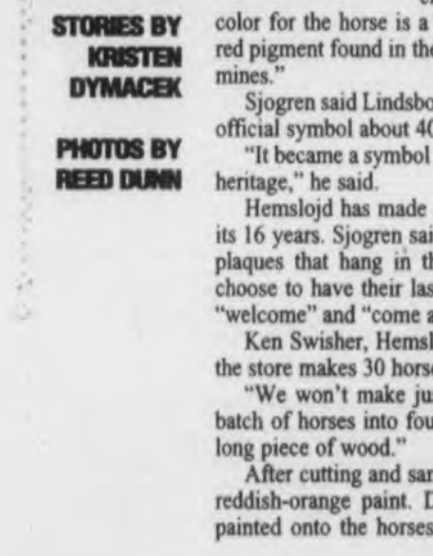
Hemslojd doesn't work only with wood. Swisher said the shop also specializes in custom-etched glassware. A selection of Scandinavian gifts is available as well.

Sjogren said visitors from all over the world come to Hemslojd and have included Bill Bradley, Jim Lovell and Marlon Fitzwater.

Visitors have the opportunity to watch Sjogren and Swisher work. They also are encouraged to sign the Hemslojd guestbook, which consists of 213 ceiling tiles.

"We have a couple stacks of ceiling tiles, because we just don't have enough ceiling for them," Sjogren said. "We usually fill one about every 10 days."

For people that can't make it to Lindsborg, Hemslojd has mail-order catalogs. People also can log on to www.hemslojd.com and place orders or take a virtual tour of the store.



Swisher said each item is different and original.

"We put a lot of time in them," he said. "When we make them, we want them to be nice."

Clusters of buildings have been brought from around McPherson County to form a community-like exhibit.

The Old Mill Museum provides much background to the Swedish history of Lindsborg and the surrounding area. Original buildings that document the town's history — including the Smoky Valley Roller Mill, a train depot, country schoolhouse and family workshop — are filled with farm machinery and other exhibits.

The roller mill, built in 1898, was considered the granddaddy of the modern milling system, said Lenora Lynam, administrative assistant of Old Mill Museum.

The Smoky Valley Roller Mill, at one time a water-powered flour mill, sits on the Smoky Hill River. The mill is now part of the Old Mill Museum.

"The mill used steel rollers to grind the grain, instead of stones like in a grist mill," she said. "There are very, very few of these types of mills left."

She said the mill originally was owned by Theodore Teichgraber. The flour made from the mill was shipped to other countries like Spain and England.

After changing owners several times and surviving the Depression, the mill closed in 1955.

Lynam said the mill is run once a year.

"We're able to give guided tours and living-history demonstrations then," she said.

Across the street from the mill is the Swedish Pavilion.

Lynam said the pavilion was pre-fabricated in Sweden and shipped to St. Louis for the 1904 World's Fair as part of the Swedish government exhibit.

"The pavilion was a replica of a manor house in Sweden," she said. "The idea was to make the Swedish-Americans homesick for Sweden."

The problem was the manor houses usually were lived in only by upper-class citizens.

"The gold color that the pavilion was painted was used for upper-class homes, because the paint would have to be purchased," Lynam said. "Peasants would have used a red color because they wouldn't have to buy it. They could get the color from the ground."

Because most of the people that left Sweden were of a lower class, the pavilion didn't work as expected, she said.

A maypole sits in the courtyard of the Swedish Pavilion at the Old Mill Museum. The Pavilion was built in Sweden for display at the 1904 World Fair in St. Louis. The building was given to Bethany College and later donated to the museum.

After the World's Fair, the pavilion was given to Bethany College in Lindsborg. Lynam said the college used the pavilion as an art museum, a women's gymnasium, a domestic-sciences department and an art department.

In 1969, Bethany College gave the pavilion to the museum.

"We've been doing major restorations on it," Lynam said. "There were a lot of shortcuts taken when it was built, because it was only built to last for six months of the fair."

Another building included as part of the museum is the Erickson Brothers Workshop.

"The workshop is where the brothers, John and Charles, invented the first workable dial for the telephone," Lynam said.

Other structures at the museum are the first courthouse, a depot and a gold-mining shack.

Välkommen.

Dala Horses around the town display this Swedish word for welcome.

Lindsborg, Kan., also known as Little Sweden, U.S.A., is the oldest town in McPherson County and was founded in 1869 by a group of Swedish immigrants.

The town still considers its heritage important and has many festivals each year celebrating the history.

Visitors come from all over the world to visit Lindsborg's museums, galleries, bed and breakfasts, restaurants and specialty stores.

Sabrina Spellman said she always wanted the Rosberg house.

After the house had served as a fraternity house for Bethany College, a bar, a pizza place and craft store, the building became available. Spellman, the Lindsborg postmaster, said she talked to her husband, David, and they decided to buy the house and turn it into a bed and breakfast.

Built in 1885 by Swedish immigrant C.V. Rosberg, the Rosberg House Bed and Breakfast has been open for less than a year. The Spellmans are putting the final touches on their almost-five-year project.

Spellman said that when she and her husband purchased the house, it needed many repairs.

"Since we bought it, we've been working on it for over four years," she said.

She said her father, Jerry Gillgannon, has done most of the reconstruction.

Gillgannon said the basement had to be redone and many walls had to be replaced or moved. He also handmade all of the woodwork in the house.

"There was a lot of unseen work," he said. "You could go on and on."

Sabrina Spellman, who did all of the decorating, said each room is decorated differently.

"It took over a year to decorate it," she said. "I put some of my own family history into it."

Some of the rooms' themes include the Civil War, a Swedish theme and a bridal theme.

The rooms range in price from $65 to $150 a night. More information can be found by logging on to www.1885rosberghouse.com.

The Lincoln Room at Rosberg House Bed and Breakfast is decorated with Civil War memorabilia.

Lindsborg's downtown area includes specialty shops, such as Elizabeth's.

"We weave all our fabric here and sew it here," Mary Patrick, weaver and seamstress, said. "There are very few places that do it."

What started out as a hobby soon became a business for Elizabeth Walker, Patrick said.

"Beth started Elizabeth's 17 years ago," she said. "It's one of the only businesses that's been on Main Street that long."

Customers are able to come into the store and watch the workers as they handweave the clothing at the loom.

Elizabeth's makes mostly women's clothing out of rayon, chenille and cotton. The clothing includes skirts, tops, jackets, hats and scarves. Patrick said one of the store's most popular items is a throw.

"The most popular throw is K-State purple," Patrick said.

People can find out more about Elizabeth's by logging on to www.hand-woven.com.

Mary Patrick weaves fabric on a loom to make a jacket to sell at Elizabeth's in downtown Lindsborg.

One of the oldest buildings in Lindsborg wasn't always a bed and breakfast.

The Brunswick Hotel Bed and Breakfast was built in 1887 as the Brunswick Hotel, a 34-room hotel.

Innkeeper Dennis Much said it was an architectural edifice for its time.

The hotel was originally three stories and was the largest in central Kansas, Much said. The third story was removed in 1977 because repairs couldn't be made.

Much said Theodore Roosevelt and several well-known opera divas were among the hotel's guests over the years.

"The hotel was the center of the community at the turn of the century," he said.

After the hotel closed, it was used as an American Legion clubhouse and a boarding house.

In 1996, Much opened the building as a bed and breakfast.

There are eight rooms, and each is decorated individually.

"At one point, we thought about decorating it in period style, but we decided to do each room differently, because the hotel had gone through so many periods," Much said.

Each room has an individual feeling and meaning, he said.

"We have people that come back and ask for certain rooms," he said.

Much said a room for two for one night costs $65. A full-service breakfast with items like Swedish pancakes, omelets and French toast is included.

The Brunswick also has a restaurant, gift shop and an antique shop. The restaurant is open to the public Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday for brunch. Groups of six or more can also make lunch or dinner reservations during the week.

Much said the Brunswick offers something different.

"It's more of a hotel style, because guests have more privacy than traditional bed and breakfasts," he said.

Heavy snows cause disappearance, 5 deaths

BY ROGER PETTERSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A surprisingly fast-moving storm blanketed the East Coast with up to 2 feet of wind-blown snow Tuesday, closing airports and schools, paralyzing the nation's capital and leaving North Carolina looking more like North Dakota.

"The snow has completely covered my car. It's gone. I can't even see it," Thomas Allen said in Raleigh, N.C.

A 5-year-old girl was missing and feared dead in Massachusetts after falling into an icy river while walking to school in heavy snow.

At least three people were killed in weather-related traffic accidents Monday or Tuesday in the Carolinas, and two people were found dead outside from exposure in South Carolina.

The storm even intruded on the presidential campaign. Most of the candidates flew to New Hampshire after the Iowa caucuses, but Republican Alan Keyes got stuck in Detroit, unable to fly into Boston.

The storm — known as a nor'easter — drove northward along the coast, with moist air from the ocean colliding with cold air over the land. During the morning, snow fell from South Carolina all the way to Maine.

The storm raced into the Northeast with a speed that surprised citizens and forecasters alike.

"We knew it was coming. It just decided to hit us a day earlier," said National Weather Service meteorologist Tim Morrin in New York.

The storm system was to press toward Maine by Wednesday morning, bringing moderate to heavy snows from Pennsylvania through New England. The Southeast was to get a break from the heavy precipitation.

Tuesday's storm was the third snowfall in a week for some states, but for much of the region it was the first strong storm in a season that has seen little snow. It also was the worst snowstorm to hit the area since the blizzard of January 1996.

Most federal agencies shut down in Washington, D.C., and were scheduled to be closed again Wednesday. Legislative meetings were called off in Delaware, New Hampshire and Pennsylvania, and Delaware Gov. Thomas Carper had to postpone his State of the State address for the second time in a week because of snow.

Schools were closed from South Carolina to Maine, including nearly all schools in New Jersey and Maryland.

Up to 17 inches of snow fell in parts of Virginia. The Baltimore-Washington International Airport got more than 7 inches. Ten inches had accumulated outside Philadelphia at King of Prussia, and New York City measured 6.

Snow up to 18 inches deep was forecast by the end of the storm in the Berkshire hills of western Massachusetts.

The storm hit hardest in the Carolinas. North Carolina got a record 20.3 inches at the Raleigh-Durham airport.

The North Carolina utility CP&L had 81,000 customers without power, Duke Power Co. reported 87,000 outages in North Carolina. More than 140,000 people were without power in South Carolina, and Virginia Power reported fewer than a thousand customers in the dark.

North Carolina Gov. Jim Hunt declared a state of emergency, activating the National Guard to help clear streets and rescue stranded motorists. Stalled cars and trucks shut down five miles of Interstate 85. Maryland Gov. Parris N. Glendening also declared a state of emergency.

The storm closed main Eastern airports, including New York's LaGuardia and Washington Reagan National Airport, and others had delays and cancellations.

BORED

students to boredom is the fast-paced society.

"The technology that we live with today makes the students expect that same type of energy in the classroom," Benson said. "Students really have to work hard to stay focused on what is going on in the classroom."

Natalie Nygaard, freshman in open-option, said she feels the amount of boredom students experience relates directly to their curriculum.

"It depended on the class to determine whether I was bored or not," Nygaard said. "In my hard classes I had to pay attention, but in the classes that are just required for graduation, I didn't try as hard."

Nygaard said the expectations students have for college might make them feel stressed and add to the pressure on them.

"You are taught that college is going to be much more difficult than high school, when in reality it is not that much of a change," Nygaard said.

Newton said he believed for many college freshmen, college really is not the transition they expect to make because of their fast-paced lifestyles.

"Because many high school students live life like college students do, college is not a transition for them," Newton said. "That may be a factor in the boredom reported in the surveys."

Bus route to be debated tonight

By DANICA COTO
Kansas State Collegian

Parking solutions are boarding the bus and coming to K-State.

Student Senate will vote today on a resolution that aims to alleviate traffic on campus, free up parking spaces and provide a transportation system.

Original plans to build multi-level garages and new parking lots have been scrapped in favor of a plan that minimizes start-up costs.

The plan proposes a shuttle run a route that makes stops at University Commons, Chase Manhattan Apartments and the K-State Student Union, among others.

Students also would have the choice of parking in one of the 1,000 parking spaces on the east side of Bramlage Coliseum and taking the shuttle from there.

"We're hoping to use it on a trial basis and see what kind of a response we have with that," Student Body President Jason Heinrich said. "As we continue to iron out all those things, we will eventually be in a position to say, 'let's go ahead and do it.'"

Included in the proposal is a tiered-cost structure, in which prices vary depending on where students park. Funds for this project will come from increasing the cost of parking permits and not from increasing student privilege fees, Heinrich said.

■ ON THE WEB
Students can voice their opinions about the proposal at www.ksu.edu/osas by clicking on Student Governing Association.

Response from students and faculty has been positive so far, but since this idea was just introduced last week at Student Senate, there hasn't been a lot of time to gauge responses, Jake Worcester, Senate chair, said.

"We feel it's a good plan for students and for K-State, especially in the long run," he said. "The university has been working on it for years. They've been talking and talking, and there has been no solution to it."

If Senate approves the resolution tonight, it will be studied by Parking Services, university officials, the campus developing planning committee and others.

Although most university officials say the hardest detail to deal with will be prices, they are looking favorably upon the proposal.

"We want to help do this," Darwin Abbott, Parking Services director, said. "If this is what the university thinks is the right answer, then press on. I'm wholeheartedly behind the concept."

Faculty Senate President Buddy Gray said most faculty members are interested in the plan because it is flexible enough to include a city transportation system if one is implemented.

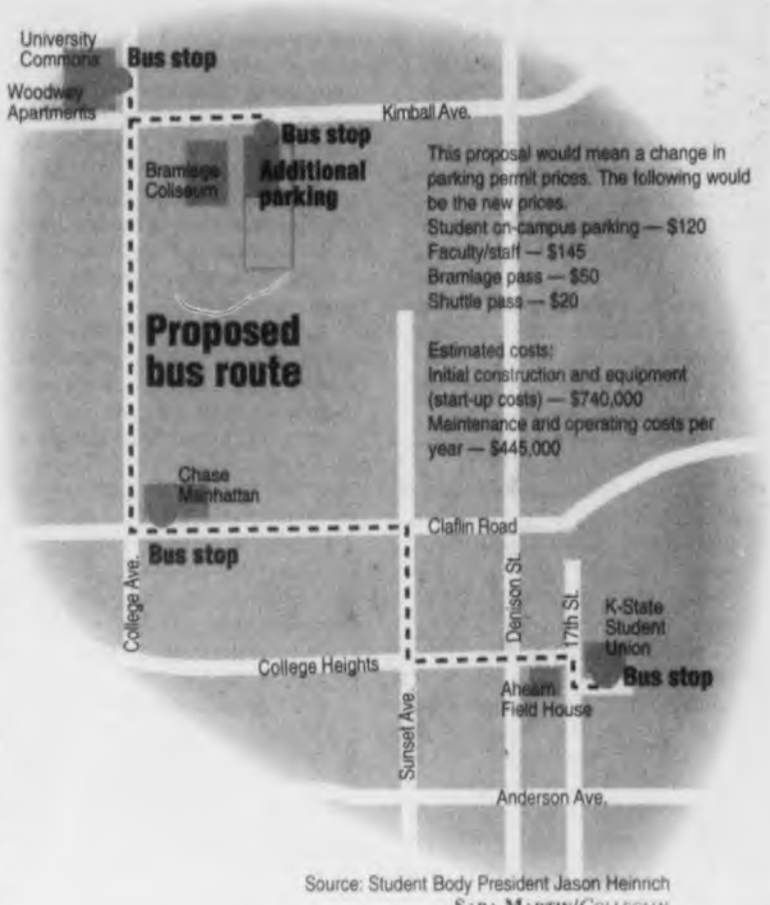
However, some faculty members already are resentful of what they have to pay to go to work, Gray said.

"I know that there'll be people with reservations and criticism. But this one has virtues that have been lacking in other plans," Gray said. "A little bit of education is necessary for all of us. We're kind of spoiled and just want to drive to the door where we work."

The plan is funded only by K-State and does not include the city in any way. This is something that possibly could change, Worcester said.

"My guess is that they want to see how it works," he said. "If the city sees it as a positive thing, then hopefully they'll take action."

The change could happen as early as next fall if there is solid support from different areas, Worcester said.



K-State's administration thinks it's a good beginning.

The plan seems like a great concept, said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance.

"I think it's a good start, but we need to give people an opportunity to comment on it," he said. "It may take a while for ridership to grow. People are used to hunting for a spot next to the building they have class in."

Heinrich said he wants to hear students' opinions and probably will have a forum on the issue.

"We're looking for a lot of feedback at this point to gain some momentum. We were really pleased to be able to come up with a plan that everyone liked," he said.

Fraternity wins courtside seats, heckling duty at basketball game

BY JENN DAVOREN

Get a large enough group of Wildcat basketball fans together, and seats in Bramlage Coliseum's nosebleed section could be a thing of the past.

Thanks to K-State Superfans, a program that operates out of K-State's basketball office, courtside seating for 50 is available during home basketball games.

For Wednesday night's K-State/Oklahoma State game, Sigma Chi fraternity was chosen to fill the folding chairs behind Oklahoma State's first-half basket.

Luke Meek, senior in nutrition science and former Sigma Chi president, said members of the fraternity entered the basketball office's drawing in late October. Notification that 50 lucky members of the house would attend the men's game came last week.

"When we got here, they gave us our free T-shirts and tickets," Meek said.

The shirts' Superfan symbol allowed the men to take their courtside seats at 5:30 p.m., a full hour and a half before the game was set to start. After that long of a build-up, Sigma Chi was ready to greet the Wildcats as they took the floor, forming a human tunnel for the team to walk through.

"I've lived in Manhattan all my life, and I love coming to the games and doing stuff like this," Meek said.

Shaun Ryan, sophomore in secondary education and public relations chairman for the fraternity, spent some of the time before the game's starting buzzer passing out copies of Wednesday's Collegian for use at critical points in the game.

"It's my job to get the house involved in as many things like this as I can," Ryan said.

Frances Russell, house mother for Sigma Chi for the past two years, said she jumped at the invitation to Wednesday night's game.

"I go to all the football and basketball games. I love it," she said. "I think I have more fun than these guys do."

■ MORE INFO?
To find out more about Superfans, contact Brent Bargen, director of basketball operations, at 532-7960.

While Meek said there are no requirements to become a Superfan besides group size, those chosen for the prime seats still had duties to perform.

"It's mostly our job to taunt the other team and give them as hard a time as possible," Meek said. "We're here to shout for the Cats."

Tentative dates set for elections

By ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State student body general elections have been set for March 6-8.

File forms and regulations will be available Monday in the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union. The deadline for filing has not been set yet.

The timeline for the elections and changes made to the regulations will be voted on in the Student Senate meeting tonight.

Travis Morgan, Election Committee chair, said the only big change to the regulations is the implementation of electronic voting.

Another change that was made last semester to the regulations was the size of the Election Committee. In past elections, the committee has comprised nine appointed members, but this year it will be made up of five appointed members.

"We just don't need the manpower now with online voting," Morgan said.

Although the committee still needs to be approved by Student Senate, Morgan said it already has some goals for the upcoming elections.

"Just to implement online voting and have everything run smoothly, that would be nice," he said. "That's a lot to ask for the first year, but that would be wonderful."

Morgan said he also would like to handle this election with more integrity than it was handled with last year.

In last year's election, Joe Ashley, Election Committee chair for the 1999-2000 election, was found guilty by Student Tribunal of tampering with the March 15 runoff. Leo Prieto, 1999-2000 student body presidential candidate, alleged that Ashley counted ballots before polls closed and released preliminary vote totals to supporters of both candidates. He also alleged that Ashley improperly dismissed other allegations filed against then-student body presidential candidate Jason Heinrich.

Morgan said he isn't going to be a stickler on rules; he's just going to be really fair.

"So is the election committee," he said. "I'll expect that from them as well."

Morgan said his committee also would help publicize the elections, but the Senate Communications Committee mostly is responsible for that.

Julie Karrer, Communications Committee chair, said senators have been visiting organizations throughout the year to inform them about student government

Chemical fertilizer suspected in blast

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS AND SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

The explosion that occurred early Tuesday morning in an apartment complex in Manhattan possibly was linked to a methamphetamine lab, said Sgt. Hank Nelson of the Riley County Police Department.

Two fire extinguishers were found by police at the apartment, located at 415 N. 16th St. The RCPD said anhydrous ammonia, a chemical fertilizer also used to make methamphetamine, might have been stored in one of the extinguishers and caused the explosion. The other extinguisher found still was intact, Nelson said.

"We believe it's anhydrous ammonia," Nelson said. "The fire extinguisher was not designed to hold that type of chemical, so it just went off."

Nelson said no fire occurred.

"It was not a bomb, it was an explosion," Nelson said.

The apartments are owned by Paul and Carol Klover of 3700 Cottonwood Circle. The Klovers could not be reached for comment.

Detective Connie Miller said RCPD has been unable to locate the residents of the apartment. They are unsure if anyone was at the apartment at the time of the explosion.

There were no injuries and minimal damage to windows.

The explosion still is under investigation.

Recall chair vows to return Ten Commandments to City Hall

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
Kansas State Collegian

Don Rose said he has an idea that could put the Ten Commandments in front of City Hall again.

Rose helped start the petition that led to the recall election in December. He vowed to regroup after the election failed to remove City Commissioner Karen McCulloh from office.

The movement to remove her began when she voted to remove the Ten Commandments monolith from in front of City Hall.

ROSE

The vote came after the American Civil Liberties Union and concerned citizens filed a lawsuit against the city for violating the First Amendment separation of church and state clause.

The $12,000 suit was settled out of court. The city paid the ACLU and signed an agreement that prohibits the city from putting up a display that depicts the Christian faith unless it is a part of a larger display about the heritage of America.

McCULLOH

Although Rose said his group has not met to finalize any plans since the recall election, he said his idea is viable because it would fit within the agreement made between the city and the ACLU.

The idea would put the Ten Commandments, though not the monolith, back on city property.

"I'm thinking about a display, which would include the Ten Commandments and an essay that involves an idea about what society can accomplish when it adheres to the principles of faith," he said.

He said the essay could be written by a high school student or civics group in the United States as part of a contest. The winning essay would be displayed along with the Ten Commandments on city property, and the winner would receive a monetary prize.

"We do have money, about $5,000, left

TAKE note

Capitol legislation. A bill to restrict what state law calls partial-birth abortions won the endorsement of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee on Wednesday.

The bill would ban the procedure except when two physicians determine it is necessary to save a woman's life.

The proposal now goes to the entire House for consideration. Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, said he expects the chamber to take up the bill next week.

State law bans partial-birth abortions except when needed to save the woman's life or when continuing the pregnancy would substantially and irreversibly impair her physical or mental health.

Gov. Bill Graves has said he wants to restrict the procedure, but he continues to oppose any bill that would do that unless it also allows women to obtain other types of late-term abortions to protect their mental health.

"The governor has no desire to sign a piece of legislation without that clarifying language in the late-term statute," Graves' spokesman Don Brown said Wednesday.

Rep. Tony Powell, the committee's chairman, said he thought the House and Senate would pass the bill, although he wasn't sure whether they could override a Graves veto. That requires two-thirds majorities in both chambers.

Powell staved off several attempts to change the bill, including an amendment to add a mental-health exception to the law on late-term abortions, which Graves has requested.

"The only thing I care about is the restricted access of a woman to be in charge of her own health matters," said Rep. Thomas Klein, D-Wichita, who offered the amendment. It failed on a 9-12 vote.

Powell said the bill wouldn't limit abortions during the first six months of a pregnancy.

"The bill is not a frontal assault on a woman's right to an abortion," he said.

Student suspended for art files lawsuit against school

LEON, Kan. — Attorneys for a Bluestem High School girl suspended for artwork declaring "I'll kill you all" have filed a lawsuit claiming school officials violated her constitutional rights.

The suit filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court at Wichita asks that Sarah Boman be reinstated immediately and seeks a determination on whether she is entitled to damages and attorneys fees.

Paul Rebein, an attorney asked by the American Civil Liberties Union to represent Boman, filed the suit and read a short statement scolding the board for its actions.

Dick Kurtenbach, executive director of the Kansas City, Mo., branch of the ACLU, said attorneys had hoped for a hearing Wednesday on a request for a temporary injunction.

The hearing is scheduled for 10 a.m. Friday, according to a spokeswoman for U.S. District Judge Wesley Brown.

On Monday night, the Bluestem School Board voted to reinstate Boman, provided she first undergoes a mental health evaluation.

Boman, a 17-year-old senior, was suspended earlier this month for posting artwork on a school door with the words, "I'll kill you all!" She defended the drawing as conceptual art that depicted the deranged thoughts of a fictional madman.

The lawsuit alleges that Boman was denied her right to freedom of speech and that, during an appeal hearing, the district never met the burden of proof necessary to justify requiring her to undergo psychological tests.

School attorney David All said the district was within its bounds.

"In this climate of violence in schools, I think the administration acted appropriately," All said.

All said the courts have determined that a student's constitutional rights are not equal to an adult's rights. He said that students cannot create messages with threats of violence without expecting consequences.

All also blamed the news media for drawing attention to the incident.

4-month-old boy suffocates on Burger King Pokemon toy

INDIANAPOLIS — A 4-month-old boy suffocated in his crib on a Burger King Pokemon ball — the subject of a nationwide recall after a similar death last month.

Zachary Jones was found dead Tuesday of what an autopsy determined was asphyxiation, said Deputy Police Chief Lana Schneider of suburban Lawrence, Ill.

The toy — a hollow plastic ball that opens clamshell-style — had been left in Zachary's crib by his step-grandmother. She later came back to find him with half the ball covering his nose and mouth, Schneider said.

"A 4-month-old baby cannot move things from their face, and basically it suffocated," Schneider said.

The balls, given away by Burger King in children's meals, measure about 3 inches in diameter and contain a Pokemon toy.

Burger King recalled millions of the balls Dec. 27, after the Dec. 11 suffocation death of a Sonora, Calif., girl found in her playpen with half a ball over her nose and mouth.

Schneider said Zachary's family knew nothing of the recall.

Burger King spokesman Charles Nicolas said the Miami-based restaurant chain is investigating.

Hearing on trial prospects for Topekan sheriff slated

TOPEKA — A preliminary hearing will be conducted March 30 to determine whether Shawnee County Sheriff Dave Meneley should face trial for 20 criminal charges.

Jonathan Phelps, one of Meneley's attorneys, made a first appearance for the sheriff in Shawnee County District Court on Wednesday, when the hearing date was set. The sheriff did not attend the brief proceeding.

Earlier this month, Attorney General Carla Stovall charged Meneley with 17 counts of theft, two counts of misuse of public funds and one count of personal use of campaign funds.

The charges represent one of three cases against Meneley. An ouster trial, a civil proceeding to determine whether he will be removed from office, is scheduled to resume Tuesday.

Meneley also faces two counts of perjury brought by District Attorney Joan Hamilton.

Club dances way to top of competition

■ Ballroom Dance Club wins 1st, 2nd in Lawrence swing-dance competition.

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Swing dancing is not to be taken lightly.

At least not by the K-State Ballroom Dance Club.

The dance club won first and second place at the Swinger's Ball in Lawrence on Dec. 17.

Joshua Hernandez, dance club coach and graduate student in speech communications, said he made it a goal to have the dance club sweep the competition.

"We didn't get first, second and third, but we did get first and second," Hernandez said.

The pairing of Suzie Rogers, sophomore in music education, and John Jasso earned first place, and the pairing of Rachel Koch, sophomore in communications and Jason Baldridge, sophomore in health, won second place.

Hernandez said he participated in the competition in December 1998 and decided that K-State needed to have students enter.

"The students that won the competition have only been dancing for about two semesters," Hernandez said. "They were all taught from scratch, so winning the competition is a real accomplishment."

Hernandez said there were three areas in which they were judged.

"Dance technique, overall presentation and creativity were the three areas the judges focused on," Hernandez said. "The most difficult was technique, because in order to have correct technique, you have to understand the dance fully."

Hernandez said the key to being a good swing dancer is possessing the ability to understand the dance.

"I would not be a good teacher if I did not teach the understanding," he said. "I have taken lessons at places where the dances originated, so I am able to teach the club how to really understand the meaning and feeling of the dance."

Koch said she began taking the dance lessons because she felt dance was a weak area for her.

"I had been in musical theater in high school and always felt as though dance was one of my weak points," Koch said. "I began the lessons in January 1998 and love the way learning dance has made me have more confidence."

Hernandez said the competition was a huge accomplishment for the dance club because it won first and second places the first time it competed.

"The kids have a good understanding of the different styles of swing, and that is the main factor in the win," Hernandez said.

Stephanie Higgins, sophomore in speech communications, said she enjoyed the competition because it was a time for the dancers to showcase their skills while competing against other dancers.

"It was a great opportunity to show off what we had accomplished and learned," Higgins said. "I have never competed like that before."

Hernandez said the dance club owes its success to the International Student Center because it gave them a place to have the lessons and practice.

"We are only able to have the classes because of them," Hernandez said.

The club meets at 7 p.m. Tuesdays and 3 p.m. Sundays at the International Student Center.

Hernandez said anyone is welcome to come and take lessons.

"The great thing about dance is that anyone can do it and it is fun," he said.

Debaters face busy semester

BY DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They claimed the Gulf War never happened.

They said people weren't starving unless someone actually saw them starving. Their argument was that nothing is real unless one actually experiences it.

"It's something called hyporeality," Kyle Wilson, junior in chemical engineering, said.

Wilson represented K-State at William Jewell College in Liberty, Mo., at the invitational debate tournament earlier this month. He and his partner, Ben Sharp, freshman in philosophy, reached the semifinal round in the junior varsity division at the tournament.

"It's a really great learning experience," Wilson said. "When I really do well, I enjoy myself. But win or lose, I've always learned something."

This spring, the team will participate in at least seven tournaments, some of which will be at Northwestern University and the University of Kansas.

Kevin Zollman, junior in philosophy, has been debating for three years. This year, he tied for third place at the Missouri tournament with his partner, Katie Hatziavramidis, senior in humanities.

"I was, unfortunately, sick for part of it," Zollman said. "I just think we were consistently good, which is occasionally a problem."

Most debate tournaments are on the weekends and last three days. More than 100 teams participated in the Missouri tournament, but the most prestigious ones are the two national tournaments at the end of the year, Zollman said.

The most unusual subject debated at this tournament was Dadaism, he said. This art movement was used by one debate team to show how they could create new space for different forms of discussion. The team read poetry and ended up winning.

The topic for this year, however, is economic sanctions. The teams keep building their arguments as they find new research, but it takes a lot of work, Zollman said.

Students can access e-mail on the road with introduction of WebMail program

BY STEPHANIE J. BONNELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Staying in touch with the K-State community through e-mail now is easier during breaks and when away from school.

WebMail became available to K-State students and faculty Jan. 13.

Several campus groups were used in testing the new WebMail product. The test period ran from November to December.

The groups involved helped give feedback to pinpoint any problems before WebMail became available to the public, said Rob Satterlee, Computing and Network Services Lan administrator and WebMail project leader.

Satterlee said 400 people logged onto WebMail during the testing period. The number of users has risen to more than 2,000 since the program was made available.

Anne Davidson, freshman in agribusiness, was one of the students chosen to test the WebMail system. She said she uses it more than Pine.

WebMail will allow students and faculty to get their e-mail while traveling or off campus. Unlike Pine or Elm, WebMail provides easier handling of file attachments, spell checking and a search function, Satterlee said.

"The WebMail offering may suit some people better than others," Satterlee said. "We are not marketing WebMail as a primary e-mail client. It is just another option to Pine."

WebMail requires users to have Internet Explorer 4.0, Netscape 4.06 or better in order to run the program correctly, Satterlee said.

Users need to know their K-State Computing ID and password. Satterlee said WebMail will not work if the K-State Computing ID has been forwarded to another address such as a departmental network or a commercial Internet service provider.

WebMail is a little slower than other K-State e-mail methods and has other usage requirements.

Not all students believe WebMail will be an advantage over the current system.

"I personally don't think it matters which e-mail you use," Liz Griswold, junior in elementary education, said. "You could run Telnet or Pine on any computer with a modem."

WebMail is a product of Infinite Technologies, and it provides encryption for privacy and security of e-mail.

Laura Boyd, junior in public relations, recently tried the new system.

"It was much more convenient to use than Pine," Boyd said. "I will be using it a lot more now."

Education should reflect new interactive methods

Students have moved into the 21st century — now teachers need to do the same.

A record 40 percent of college freshmen who participated in a recent survey said they frequently were bored as high school seniors, compared to only 25 percent when the question was first asked in 1985. This increase reflects the degree to which technology has permeated youth.

Only in the past 10 years has the Internet come into widespread use. Video games continue to rise in popularity. "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" is a hit. Not only are these new phenomena, they are interactive.

As children increasingly are raised with and by these interactive media, teachers must realize they must change, too. They must adapt and allow their students to provide more feedback in the classroom.

While much of the duty will fall on teachers, they are not the only ones who are culpable. Parents should not rely solely on television, the Internet and video games to raise their children. They need to remember more traditional means of helping their children learn.

Unfortunately, for the children, this could mean torture by reading.

The technological advances should not frowned upon. Indeed, they are of great benefit to society. But until teachers, students and parents alike learn to adapt to the new culture, the quality of education will suffer.

Everyone involved with the education of children today needs to consider what is making high school students say they're bored more than ever.

They will find moderation is the key. Parents need to expose their children to the Internet and television in moderation. Children need to stare at them mindlessly in moderation. Teachers need to push traditional education methods in moderation.

When everyone adapts to their new role, students will be able to learn as usual.

Pro-life response should be LOVE

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

A crisis of the soul became a political fight Jan. 22, 1973.

The legalization of abortion dealt a defeating blow to the pro-life movement.

The response was to organize in a manner that would convince officials as well as the nation that legalized abortion was equal to murder. Grassroots lobbying efforts began, as did picketing of abortion clinics, public-service announcements and pamphlets that read, "To abort is to kill."

The sad truth remains that a child is killed whenever an abortion is performed. However, few realize the lives of two people can stop — the mother and the child.

Pro-life advocates defend the life of the child. We call it precious and wanted.

What about the mother? Do we call her precious and wanted, or do we call her a murderer, tell her she will suffer eternal damnation and extend only coldness and judgment to her?

Many pro-life advocates, whose passions and beliefs come from the Bible, do not realize they contradict those beliefs as they judge the post-abortive woman who walks out of the abortion clinic.

Instead of arms of love, a woman walks into a mob of protesters, secured by a barrier, yelling "murderer." She sees posters telling her she will go to hell.

What purpose do pro-life advocates accomplish by these actions? If a woman is at the abortion clinic, she is confused and doubtful. Research shows that 63 percent of women who have abortions know it is immoral. Will the hate she sees outside a clinic clear her mind and offer different choices, or will the hate drive her deeper into confusion and guilt?

We do not need to compound pain by our actions. She will suffer the rest of her life.

Post-abortion syndrome is a term used by professionals to describe a range of symptoms that are intimately related to, and expressions of, a previous abortion experience.

Not every woman who has an abortion experiences the psychological and physiological effects of the syndrome, but many do.

The effects of an abortion on a woman can be appalling. The psychological effects include, but are not limited to guilt, mourning, withdraw, desire to remember the birth date, loss of sexual desire, low self-esteem and anger. The physical effects can include fevers, pain, exhaustion, weight loss, nervousness, bleeding, infection and even infertility.

If we, as pro-life advocates, believe all life is sacred, our acceptance and love of women who have abortions will follow. In doing this, it is not forsaking our belief that abortion is wrong, it is applying our beliefs instead.

Pro-life advocates are notorious for being judgmental and hypocritical. Our actions and statements do not back up our beliefs that all life is precious and wanted.

A woman suffering with Post-Abortion Syndrome would be reluctant to share her pain and grief with a pro-life friend for fear that she would be labeled immoral and selfish.

Countless times I have heard people say, "How can someone murder a child?" This self-righteous attitude exemplifies the lack of understanding this person possesses.

Few realize the fear and circumstances that make a woman believe having an abortion is the only way out.

Yes, abortion is wrong, but judgment is wrong, too.

Instead of judgment, women need the truth. Instead of hatred, women need love. Women need someone to show how to receive forgiveness. Her pain needs to be validated. A woman who has an abortion will realize the baby she lost cannot be replaced. She needs someone to go through that loss with her.

I believe pro-life advocates truly desire to be compassionate; unfortunately, we lose this message as we communicate. May we change our actions so that people may be set free.

Time past due for Confederate flag to be lowered

The Civil War was fought over the issue of slavery, and the Confederate battle flag is — and always has been — a racist symbol.

In my last column, I mentioned that the Confederate flag is a racist symbol. Since publication, many have argued the Confederate flag is a symbol of Southern pride and heritage, and moreover, the Civil War was not fought over the issue of slavery but over economics and states' rights.

My response is to look at the history.

Among all the difficulties that troubled this nation prior to 1861 (tariffs, economic crises, wars), it was the tension between slave and free states that tore it apart.

Nearly every acquisition of new territory and every admission of a new state between the years of 1819 and 1861 involved a heated and passionate debate between free and slave states.

Granted, the morality of slavery was not always in question. At first, slave states argued that the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, which guarantees that no person shall be deprived of property without due process, gave slave owners the right to bring their human property anywhere. Free states feared if slavery spread into the West, with every slave counting as three-fifths of a person, the interests of the free-states would be under-represented in Congress. No matter what the disagreement was about, slavery always was the underlying issue.

The spread of transcendentalism and the idea that man and society can be renovated created the fertile environment for abolitionism. At the height of the anti-slavery movement, there were 2,000 local abolitionist societies in the North with a combined membership of 200,000.

The abolitionist movement sent many anti-slavery settlers to Kansas. This led to Bleeding Kansas, the birth of the Republican party, the dissolution of the Whig party, the fracturing of the Democratic party and — ultimately — the Civil War.

Opposition to the abolitionist movement created in the slave states the attitude that this anti-slavery sentiment was incendiary agitation.

To say the South felt put upon by the federal government and thus seceded on the issue of state's rights is partly true. When Abraham Lincoln was elected president, the South not only disapproved of the aspect of the Republican platform that opposed the extension of slavery into the new territories but also the proposed protective tariffs.

However, the free states also felt put upon by the federal government. The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 compelled local law enforcement to help capture runaway slaves.

Then, in 1857, the Supreme Court handed down the Dred Scott decision, which stated Congress has no power to prohibit slavery from the territories, thus making slavery legal in all territories.

Many, including Lincoln, believed this decision was politically motivated to prepare the way for a second decision, which would prohibit anti-slavery laws in all states.

Thus was the standing of affairs at the time of secession.

Further proof that slavery was the cause of the Civil War can be found in the speeches made by Confederate leaders just after secession and prior to the war.

Sen. Robert Toombs of Georgia opened his "Speech on the Subject of Secession Delivered in the United States Senate, Jan. 7, 1861," with, "Mr. President and Senators: The success of the abolitionists and their allies, under the name of the Republican party, has produced its logical results already. They have for long years been sowing dragons' teeth and have finally got a crop of armed men. The Union, sir, is dissolved." The rest of the speech is about how the free states are culpable for not abiding by the Constitution and Supreme Court decisions on issues of slavery.

The "Cornerstone Speech," given March 21, 1861 in Savannah, Ga., by Alexander Stephens, vice president of the Confederate States of America, was an explanation of the new Confederate Constitution. In the speech, Stephens said, "The new constitution has put at rest, forever, all the agitating questions relating to our peculiar institution — African slavery as it exist amongst us — the proper status of the Negro in our form of civilization. This was the immediate cause of the late rupture and present revolution."

Later Stephens said, "Our new government is founded upon exactly the opposite idea (the opposite idea being that slavery is socially, morally and politically evil); its foundations are laid, its cornerstone rests upon the great truth, that the Negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery — subordination to the superior race — is his natural and normal condition. This, our new government, is the first in the history of the world, based upon this great physical, philosophical and moral truth."

From these excerpts, it is clear that the Confederacy was founded on the principles of slavery and the idea that black people are of an inferior race.

Being that the Confederate battle flag was designed during the Civil War to represent the Confederacy makes it a racist symbol. To deny the historical facts and claim the battle flag is a symbol of Southern pride and heritage is equivalent to denying the Holocaust and claiming that the Nazi flag is a symbol of German pride and heritage.

It's time to put the Confederate battle flag to rest.

Too many people sustain big losses at KC casinos

Editor,

I read Jeff Elliott's column in Wednesday's paper. I am a graduate of K-State and am living in Overland Park, Kan. Since we are much closer to the riverboats than Elliott, I have found it all too easy to go to the casinos.

I hope everyone reads his column and takes it seriously. I have observed many people hitting ATMs and cashing checks for money they did not appear to have to spend at the casino.

I have two friends who have lost quite a bit of money. In one case, the person netted a $7,000 loss at one riverboat last year. He did have some good trips to the boat. We all heard about them.

I also have met another person who had a net loss of about $30,000 in one year. I verified this when I saw the letter from the casino stating his winnings and losses.

Can these people afford it? Probably so. However, can our economy afford it? That is, could this money have been put to better use? The people I am talking about justify the expenditures for the sake of entertainment. I think movies and popcorn provide entertainment for a lot less cost.

Think about it before you go to the casinos. Be sure to set a loss limit. Consider other uses for the money you spend. Remember, the riverboat casinos are owned by big businesses, and they are in business to make a profit and pay dividends to their shareholders.

This means marketing skills to get you to come back and spend more money than you intend to spend.

Building confidence and vocabulary and practicing situations are tactics people want to learn before visiting Spanish-speaking countries, Spanish instructor Ines Ugarte said.

Faculty and staff who want to expand their knowledge of Spanish are offered a course to do just that.

"Spanish for Faculty is a class that has been offered the last three semesters," said Doug Benson, supervisor of the program and associate professor of Spanish.

The non-credit class is offered through the Department of Modern Languages in conjunction with the Office of International Programs and the Division of Continuing Education.

"The courses focus on the appropriate use of Spanish in everyday activities," Benson said.

They learn how to ask directions, understand the culture and how to greet people, Ugarte said.

The classes are divided into three levels: beginners, beginners plus and intermediate. The beginning level focuses on initial contact, specifically how to greet people.

"It teaches you how to get through the first few minutes of conversation in Spanish," Benson said.

In beginners plus it is assumed students have had the basics of initial conversations. It focuses on describing places, asking questions and just broadening survival in Spanish-speaking countries, Benson said.

The Intermediate level emphasizes conversation only, Benson said.

"Faculty is interested for a number of reasons, from personal research and working with graduate students to doing work in western Kansas," Benson said.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean of the College of Human Ecology, said the class helped to refresh her social etiquette.

"I had a project in Paraguay and needed to learn Spanish for the project," Moxley said.

Caroline Tetschner, radio producer for KSDB-FM 91.9, took the beginners' class last fall because she said she thinks Spanish is the language for the 21st century.

"It is the international language behind English," she said. "It is a really popular language."

There are no exams and no lessons to study in the class. All students need to do is a 10-minute mental preparation before class, Benson said.

The preparation was not too tough, Tetschner said.

"The preparation was to know the date, day of the week and how you're feeling," Tetschner said. "The atmosphere is relaxed."

Ugarte said the class is completely dramatized.

"The classes are fun. If we pretend we are going on a trip we talk about what to bring," Ugarte said. "We pretend to go to the airport and get on the airplane."

The courses will be Jan. 31-April 14 and cost $200. Those interested in the program should e-mail Benson to learn the location of the classes.

Benson said the Dean's Council has offered to share the cost with faculty members. Deans or department heads will allot the money according to what each department can afford.

Not only is this an opportunity for faculty members to learn Spanish, but it also allows them to meet other faculty members from across campus, Benson said.

"We are not all alike, and it is very rewarding to work with different people," Benson said. "They learn more about each other and about the world."

When classes begin, Ugarte said students are shy and have a difficult time communicating.

"I tell them not to worry and to relax," Ugarte said. "I explain little by little, and by the end of the semester they talk more."

Lindsborg father found incompetent

BY ROXANA HEGEMAN

McPHERSON, Kan. — A Lindsborg father accused of killing his three young children is not mentally competent to stand trial because he is unable to help his lawyers prepare a defense, District Judge Carl Anderson ruled Wednesday.

Christopher Jones sat silently between his lawyers as Anderson ordered him sent for 90 days to the Larned state security hospital, where he will undergo treatment.

After his 90 days are finished, the judge will revisit the issue of Jones' mental competency for trial. All court proceedings were suspended until that time. The hearing did not address whether Jones was insane at the time of the Oct. 6 killings.

Jones, 47, has been charged with murder in the deaths of his children, Christopher, 7; Joshua, 5; and Sarah, 2. Jones also is charged with attempted murder for allegedly stabbing and choking his wife, then hitting her with a baseball bat.

The attacks occurred at the family's home in Lindsborg.

Jones, who was in the courtroom this morning, stared straight ahead and did not speak.

Family members declined to comment after the decision. His wife, Catherine, was not present in the courtroom.

The sole witness was Newton psychologist Larry Hays, who was appointed by the court to examine Jones. He testified that Jones suffers from an unspecified psychotic disorder.

"It was too emotionally upsetting for him to explore those events," Hays said.

The psychologist recommended that Jones receive treatment until he is found competent to stand trial.

Few details of the crime, which shook the small community of Lindsborg, came out at the hearing. However, Hays said Jones was delusional and thought he was poisoned on the day of the killings.

Crowds break barricade at Mexico university

BY WILL WEISSERT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEXICO CITY — Students and professors tore down a barricade at Mexico's premier university Wednesday to confront striking students who have occupied the campus for nine months.

Crowds forced open a gate at the 280,000-student National Autonomous University's campus in Mexico City and tore down wires and poles, allowing scores of people to enter. There were scattered skirmishes but no reports of serious injuries.

Strike leaders elsewhere on campus maintained their barricades, blocking thousands of students and teachers.

As police helicopters circled overhead, some strikers wearing ski masks and bandanas screamed obscenities at students trying to get in. Those who managed to get through the barricades spoke with the strikers, urging them to end the standoff, which has paralyzed Latin America's largest university.

"This will end only if individual schools of students and faculty sit down together and work things out," said Estella Sanchez, a chemistry professor who spoke with striking students from her department. "Most of us on both sides don't want the strike to continue, but we can't proceed without an exchange of ideas."

But the strikers maintained the walkout is far from over.

"We can't end the strike without a consensus, but what we can do is reopen the dialogue," said Alex, a chemistry student involved with the strike who declined to give his last name.

The strike at the university, popularly known by its Spanish acronym, UNAM, began in April to protest a plan to increase annual tuition from a token few cents to the equivalent of $140. Administrators backed off the fee increase, but strikers' demands grew to include sweeping policy changes and a call for greater student control.

Wildcats drop win to Oklahoma State Cowboys giving team 1-5 record in Big 12 Conference play

Frustration says it all for the K-State Wildcats and head coach Tom Asbury.

After losing to the Oklahoma State Cowboys 71-56 Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum, Asbury wasn't in the mood to discuss the attitudes or frustrations of his squad, which lost its fifth consecutive game and fell to 1-5 in Big 12 play.

"I'm frustrated about losing," Asbury said. "Who isn't? It is not where we have been, but rather where we can go."

After another reporter asked Asbury if he was frustrated, the head coach appeared to be a little disgruntled.

"I'm not happy," Asbury said. "Let's get off the frustration questions, OK? Who wouldn't be after losing five games in a row?"

One of the reasons Asbury could be upset was the Cats' inability to hold on to a lead.

With 6:31 to go in the first half and after trailing the entire time, except for the opening bucket of the game, junior point guard Galen Morrison made two free throws to put the Cats up by one at 21-20. Unfortunately for the Cats (8-9 overall), that would be the last time they had the lead.

In the last six minutes, anchored by senior forward Desmond Mason, the Cowboys (15-2, 4-1) went on an 18-5 run to close out the half and to take a 38-26 lead. Mason scored 9 points on the run, including the three-point basket that gave Oklahoma State the lead it would never relinquish.

Senior forward Tony Kitt, who scored 8 points and grabbed 11 rebounds in the game, said losing the lead in the first half can't be blamed on any one player.

"I think it was just mental lapses," Kitt said. "It's not just one person. It was a team thing."

As a team in the first half, K-State shot just 30 percent from the field. That performance was followed with a 35-percent effort in the second.

Despite being out-shot, out-rebounded and out-played by the Cowboys in front of 10,278 fans, the largest crowd in attendance for a men's basketball home game this season, Morrison said the team still believes it can win.

"I think the belief is still there," Morrison said. "It's just a matter of going to do it. We can sit there all day and say, 'we're good' and 'we're going to win,' but if we're not doing it, it doesn't really matter."

Tensions began to rise after the contest when Morrison, who had a team-high 21 points against the Cowboys, said focusing is becoming a problem. He attributed some of his frustrations to the K-State coaching staff.

"Coaches, plain and simple. Coaches," Morrison said. "I'm just getting fed up with a lot of stuff. I don't know what the problem is.

"I don't like people saying after games that we're losing, that I'm pointing fingers and saying that we're losing because of other people. After we lose, I just sit there by myself thinking what I could have done to help us win the game."

Morrison said he also was frustrated.

"It's frustrating for me especially," he said. "I went into this game feeling that I had to play a good game, otherwise I might not be starting or might not play. So there is a whole lot of things that are frustrating."

Morrison also said that despite the recent losing trend, attitudes on the team have remained positive.

"No one is pointing fingers at anyone," Morrison said. "We go out and try to use a team effort to win. Everyone is staying positive."

K-State will try to rebound from the loss when the team travels to Nebraska on Saturday to take on the Cornhuskers. Nebraska is the only conference opponent the Cats have beaten this season, when they won 97-79 on Jan. 8.

Injuries

The Cats entered the game without the services of forward Josh Reid. Reid watched the game from the sidelines, and he is expected to be out until late January or early February.

Reynolds is back

Forward Travis Reynolds entered the K-State line-up with 15:17 left in the first half. It was the first action he has seen since the KU game Jan. 12. Reynolds played 14 minutes. Asbury said Reynolds is still not 100 percent.

"The decision for him to play did not come until he warmed up. Yesterday he hobbled around at practice, and generally, if he has done something at practice, he is worse the next day," Asbury said. "He is healing, but he is playing at 50 or 60 percent right now."

Defending Bramlage

The K-State men's basketball team entered the game needing just one victory to pick up a winning season at home. The team has had a winning record at home for the past 53 seasons. The Cats will have to wait until Feb. 5, when they are host to Colorado, to make history.

Free-throw confusion

With 1:38 remaining in the game, guard Cortez Groves went to the foul line, but he shouldn't have. Instead, it was center Kelvin Howell who was supposed to be shooting. Chaos ensued, but after a brief huddle, Howell shot the one-in one.

Morrison leads team with 3-point shots, struggles 2nd half

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two players who live and die by the three-point shot had a shootout Wednesday.

One left the building excited and in the heat of a conference title race, and the other left frustrated and looking for answers.

K-State guard Galen Morrison in the first half of the game was having one of those nights that any basketball player dreams about.

He was igniting the Cats' offense with his downtown touch, and he was 3-of-4 from three-point land. He was leading the Cats against the nationally rated Cowboys. At one point in the first half, K-State led 21-20.

The bad news for K-State fans is that Oklahoma State had three players shooting well from behind the arc, and after falling behind for the first time, they took control.

"I think we got more aggressive," Oklahoma State guard Desmond Mason said.

Mason was 3-for-6 from three-point range in the first half, and guard Joe Adkins was 2-for-4 from downtown. Mason said the Cowboy guards did a good job of getting him the ball.

"They were getting me open and giving me the ball in the right spots," Mason said. "It's not me by myself. I have got four other guys out there working just as hard."

The Cowboys shot 50 percent from the field in the first half, and it proved to be too much for Morrison and his downtown touch to overcome. K-State head coach Tom Asbury said Mason posed a difficult matchup.

"We don't have anybody to match up with Mason, except Travis," he said, "and he's not able to guard anybody right now. The only way Travis could play was in a zone."

Throughout the game, Mason was the player Oklahoma State head coach Eddie Sutton turned to to silence the Cats' attempted comeback. He also silenced the crowd of 10,278 fans, who jumped to their feet throughout the game to cheer, only to sit back down.

Mason said he isn't necessarily a one-man machine.

"I have faith in all my teammates whenever guys step out on me and it doesn't open," Mason said. "The big guys are stepping in the hole and taking it up strong."

Football team receives 4 more player prospects

■ Coaches cannot comment until designated signing day of Feb. 2.

BY MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State received four more non-binding oral commitments to play football for the 2000 season this past week, bringing the number of orally committed Wildcat recruits to 15.

Wildcat coaches cannot comment on recruits until the official signing day, Feb. 2.

Chris Boggas, a 6-foot-4-inch, 315-pound offensive lineman from Irving, Texas, is considered by many recruiting analysts to be one of the best players at that position in the country.

He chose K-State over Texas and Hawaii.

"I feel I can get a national ring faster there, and that's what I want to be a part of."

— Chris Boggas, offensive lineman Irving, Texas

"They really recruited me well, and I was comfortable there," Boggas said at his press conference Tuesday. "I feel I can get a national ring faster there, and that's what I want to be a part of."

Boggas paved the way for highly touted running back Tyson Thompson, who rushed for more than 2,000 yards last season at Irving High School.

Jerry Togiai, a 6-foot-4 inch, 295 pound defensive lineman, played for Ricks College the past two seasons, both of which included national community-college title runs.

Last season, Togiai was part of a defensive line that held opponents to 71.5 rushing yards per game. He finished the season with 43 tackles and five sacks.

Togiai is a distant cousin of current K-State junior defensive tackle Mario Fatafehi, and he said Fatafehi's successful transition to K-State was a factor in his decision to become a Wildcat.

"He's like me in that we're both married, and he's done pretty well there," Togiai said.

Despite Togiai's dominance at the community-college level, Ricks head coach Ron Haun said Togiai still needs to work on some things.

"Junior college transfers always have a tendency to play high," Haun said. "Jerry's not going to be the biggest kid out there anymore, and he'll have to learn to play every down."

Togiai said the biggest adjustment he will face at K-State will be the shift in defensive schemes. At Ricks, Togiai played head up on the offensive guard on every snap, but K-State plays a gap system, where he will line up off-center over the offensive guard.

"I'll have to learn to use my hands a lot better because of that," Togiai said.

He picked K-State over Mississippi State, Oregon State, San Diego State and Texas Tech.

K-State is expected to sign between 15 and 17 players Feb. 2.

Sports more than just show of physical abilities, serves as teaching tool

VIEWPOINT

SARAH CRAIG

Derrick Thomas' serious injuries make a person wonder whether the high value that sports place on physical perfection, or near perfection, really is a positive influence in society.

To answer this, we must look beyond that particular value to see what values remain when physical abilities become limited or nonexistent.

Perhaps the best approach is to look at sports not on a professional level, but on the level that many or most Americans experience sports: as beginners, as students learning the art of sport.

As a student beginning in a sport for the first time, one quickly learns a number of things. One learns that authority figures, though during school hours they might not offer the kind of insight we prefer, are a necessary part of sports. There must be someone to lead the team, someone to diagnose what the players need to know and a person to find the right combinations of athletes. There must be someone to guide the team through the trials and tribulations it will face.

Sports teach us that at times, authority figures can be all right.

Students of a sport soon learn that the weird boy from third hour really can run, shoot or throw, and that it really doesn't matter that he looks different than everyone else. They learn that differences often mean different abilities, ideas and perspectives. They learn to find what people have to offer and to compensate for what they lack.

Sports teach acceptance.

The lesson that sticks out most to people who have played or now play a team sport is the simple fact that a game cannot be won by one person. One learns there is a time to go for the final shot and there is a time to pass the ball to a teammate with a better chance, and that sharing the weight of the game does not make one weak but strengthens the team as a whole.

Sports teach people to give and take.

Soon after beginning a sport, athletes notice the people around them are not only teammates but also competitors. They see that in striving to become better players, they must strive to be as good or better than their teammates — without bitterness, anger or frustration.

Sports teach the art of competition.

Athletes also learn how to shake hands after a game, regardless of the winner or loser. An athlete learns that everyone who comes to compete has something to offer and possibly a new trick to teach.

Sports teach respect for one's competitors.

From the beginning, sports also show athletes that there are moments when a person shines, moments that bring joy and awe. These moments are priceless, and each team member wants to share that moment with the one who gave it to them — congratulations are part of the game.

Sports teach us to revel in life's glorious moments.

With a few outstanding exceptions, the student of sport also soon learns that we can't always win. But a loss does not mean an end to a career, it means we are inspired to work that much harder for greatness.

Sports teach us humility, and more importantly teach that people don't fail unless they quit altogether.

Perhaps that lesson in itself is the one Thomas is thinking about right now. As a professional athlete, he knows these lessons well. He has, to some extent, learned the game of life from football.

Think about it for a minute. How many institutions in American society teach so many lessons to willing students? How many activities embody acceptance of authority and peers, acceptance of loss, how to share and how to win? How many people would lose out on these lessons without sports?

And how could Thomas continue with hope without knowing that every setback or loss is a chance to become stronger?

Super Bowl Fiesta

STORY BY JENNIFER LAKE

K-State meat lab offers variety of choices for football parties

Two ingredients used in creating one of the most anticipated athletic days each year are football and food.

Enter Super Bowl Sunday.

As one of the reigning days for parties and fun, planning food for the Super Bowl party does not have to be complicated. Options range from sub sandwiches to a roasted hog.

Wayne Becker, senior in interior architecture, ordered a smoked luau hog, whom they named, from the campus meat lab last year when his roommate worked there.

"It was awesome," Becker said. "His name was Gary. It took four of us to carry the tray into the house."

Becker also served dips and had an open bar. The year before, Becker and his roommates had grilled burgers outside.

"Grilling was OK, but the hog was much more of a hit," Becker said. "Plus, it was nice because we didn't have to do anything. It came to us already prepared and ready to go."

Matt Mead, junior in kinesiology, works at the campus meat lab and said smoked hogs are just the beginning of the choices people can get.

"Besides smoked luau hogs, you can get a whole roast cooked with barbecue sauce or a smoked hog loin," Mead said. "We have just about anything you want. We have an industrial-sized smoker, and it's great because you can order it and come in the day you need it, and it's hot and waiting for you."

Roger Baldwin, senior in wildlife biology, and his roommates Mark Howard, senior in open-option, and Greg Legleiter; senior in agribusiness, had a different idea for the Super Bowl.

"We're using a family recipe to make chili," Legleiter said. "Roger's going to make his salsa, also. It's really good."

Howard said they probably will make a cheese dip also, and guests can bring chips or pretzels.

Dillon Stores' deli departments offer prepared food for the championship game. Kristie Crile, deli clerk at Dillons Superstore, said none of their options are more popular than another.

"We have 3-foot subs, layered bean dip, chicken tenders and drummette — similar to buffalo wings — trays," Crile said. "All are popular."

Dillons also offers sandwich trays, cheese trays or vegetable trays. Crile said no one had ordered food for the weekend yet but said people would order items closer to Sunday.

Pam Soeken, K-State Student Union food service catering manager, said finger foods are popular for parties.

"We offer a wide variety of food," Soeken said. "Everything from spinach-artichoke dip to barbecued meatballs."

Stuffed mushrooms, finger sandwiches, an assortment of trays and punch are offered.

"You want it — we can make it," Soeken said.

Union Food service specializes in tea-sized homemade cookies. They come in three assortments and range from chocolate chip or chocolate macaroon to apricot oatmeal bars.

Becker said whatever the choice — healthy, fattening, homemade or bought, the key to remember for Super Bowl Sunday is to be prepared for many hungry people.

"We ran low on food and drinks one year," Becker said. "We only had to learn that lesson once — that's why we ate Gary all semester after that."

Liquor stores offer reduced prices on alcohol for Super Bowl Sunday

BY TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beer apparently is the way to go.

Super Bowl parties are as prominent this weekend as tailgating is on a K-State football day. They are becoming an American tradition to honor one of television's most-watched sporting events.

The need to satisfy the guests of a party is done by providing food and alcohol, said Scott Schneider, co-owner of Nespor Wine and Spirits.

Super Bowl weekend falls into a month that is relatively slow for most local liquor stores. However, it is the one weekend in January that most local liquor stores sell as much as they do on a K-State football game day.

Schneider said the championship game is the store's biggest event in January.

"Although we are primarily a wine distribution, we have a noticeable change in beer sales for the Super Bowl weekend," he said. "The major distributors almost always have nationwide sales for this particular weekend."

Dean Liquor and Rickel-McMillin Retail Liquor also have sales changes for this weekend. Both stores have keg sales as well as other sales on liquor.

Eric Hutchinson, sales associate at Rickel-McMillin Retail Liquor, said beer is the most popular alcoholic beverage for the Super Bowl.

"We sell lots of beer for this weekend. We have Coors Light kegs that are significantly lower priced," he said. "Rum is probably the other most popular alcohol sold for the Super Bowl. We usually run sales on both as we are this year."

Kyle Barker, sales associate for Dean Liquor, said the store notices a large increase in sales for the upcoming weekend. He said a variety of alcohol products will be on sale in celebration of the game.

"We have Coors Light kegs on sale this weekend as well," he said. "Almost all of our 12-packs are about $2 off. We have lots of champagne and rum and vodka products on sale, too."

Since the Super Bowl is Sunday, kegs must be purchased and picked up by Saturday night. Some liquor stores allow reservations and some allow kegs to be ordered at random. Most reservations can be made over the phone.

Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel-McMillin Retail Liquor, said although they do not accept reservations, kegs can be purchased until 11 p.m. Saturday. He said the keg and deposit can be paid for when picked up.

"We keep our kegs in stock here at the store," he said. "The danger of running out of kegs for the Super Bowl is very slim. Keeping them here allows us to have immediate access when a customer comes in to order a keg."

Travis Poland, sales associate of Dean Liquor, said they do accept reservations.

"We can reserve kegs if it is needed," he said. "If the keg has not been picked up by 9 p.m. the night that it was reserved on, then we allow them to be purchased at random. Anyone can come in and buy what is left over. It's first come, first serve."

The deposit for a keg can be made by writing a check.

"As long as everything for the keg is returned in working order, the check is immediately given back," Rickel said.

Liquor stores have employees who will help with the transportation of the keg or kegs into a vehicle.

Elian reunites with grandmothers

By ALEX VEIGA
The Associated Press

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. — Elian Gonzalez was reunited with his grandmothers Wednesday at a neutral site that had to be arranged by the U.S. government because of the personal and political passions swirling around the 6-year-old Cuban boy.

Elian was driven to a nun's house in Miami Beach to see his grandmothers, who had flown in from Washington, D.C. The visit lasted about an hour and a half.

"They just came to him, and they hugged him, and they sat down at a table, and they were seeing an album of pictures," said Elian's cousin Marisleysis Gonzalez, who was at the reunion.

The grandmothers did not comment as they left the meeting and were driven to a helicopter.

As Elian returned to his relatives' home in Miami, a crowd waiting outside roared with approval. Elian's great-uncle Delfin Gonzalez faced the crowd while holding a crucifix above his head.

"Tomorrow they're going to make me an American citizen," Elian said in an interview broadcast over the Spanish-language Radio Mambi while driving back to his relatives' home.

The grandmothers came to the United States last week to appeal to the American people and Congress to send the boy back to his father in Cuba. Elian's relatives in Miami want him to stay and are fighting a U.S. government order sending him back.

The Justice Department had said the grandmothers would see Elian privately, with the boy's Florida relatives nearby in the house. Elian's father, in a letter printed in the Communist Party newspaper Granma, asked to be included in the reunion by telephone.

The grandmothers also had flown to Miami on Monday but left town without seeing Elian. The Miami relatives insisted that any reunion take place at their home in the Little Havana neighborhood, but the grandmothers said they were uncomfortable going there. Anti-Castro Cuban immigrants have been protesting around the home.

After long negotiations, the Justice Department ordered Elian's relatives to bring him to the nun's house. The agency said it had the authority to do so under the arrangement letting the boy stay in this country pending further immigration proceedings.

Mariela Quintana and Raquel Rodriguez had not seen their grandson since before he left Cuba for the United States with his mother, who died along with 10 other people when their boat capsized. Elian was found clinging to an inner tube off the Florida coast Nov. 25.

The reunion took place at the home of Sister Jeanne O'Laughlin, president of Barry University. O'Laughlin, 70, has a history of helping immigrants and had said she would serve as welcomer and hugger.

As the grandmothers drove up to the house, a few people tossed flowers at their car. About 200 demonstrators were waiting outside the house; some cheered and others booed as the grandmothers passed.

On Capitol Hill, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott indicated he has no solid plans for handling legislation next week to give Elian U.S. citizenship. That would remove the boy from the jurisdiction of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the agency that ordered him back to Cuba.

"There are a lot of extenuating circumstances," Lott said. "Obviously, it could come up next week. But there are a lot of people looking at this issue, and there may be developments between now and then."

President Clinton supported the grandmothers' cause, hinting he might veto the citizenship legislation if it passes. Senators seeking Elian's return to Cuba suggested they might use delaying tactics to keep the Senate from debating the measure.

Holocaust gathering aimed at education

By KIM GAMEL
The Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — In the first international gathering of its kind, world leaders and activists came together Wednesday to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive in the face of rising neo-Nazism.

Prompted by a lack of awareness among youth, the Swedish government organized the forum as part of a Holocaust education campaign in its own country. Six million Jews and 5 million others, including Gypsies and homosexuals, were killed during World War II at the hands of Nazi Germany and its supporters.

"In another few years, the generation of the Holocaust, the living witnesses, will be gone," Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak told some 600 delegates. "Even now, Holocaust deniers and neo-Nazis ... are operating in the open."

As he spoke, three neo-Nazis were on trial in the southern Swedish city of Helsingborg, charged with distributing racist videos and compact discs.

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said education was imperative so that ordinary people shall never again turn ordinary places into execution chambers.

Schroeder warned against the spread of neo-Nazism in Europe and said increased international cooperation and the use of police and the judiciary were needed to fight racism.

The three-day conference opened with Holocaust survivor Tana Ross, who read a poem about the need to speak out.

The meeting was the first of its kind to bring together world leaders and activists to discuss the Holocaust, and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel suggested Sweden make it an annual event.

"Why not declare that this is only the first," he said. "From now on, have an annual Stockholm conference on humanity and conscience."

Swedish Prime Minister Goeran Persson, who was applauded by the forum for inroads he has made in World War II education, agreed to work to create an annual forum.

The conference comes at a time when Sweden is reevaluating its wartime role and confronting increasingly visible neo-Nazi activity. A 1997 survey showed that nearly one-third of youths between the ages of 12 and 18 did not believe the Holocaust happened. However, questions recently have been raised about the survey's numbers and the way it was conducted.

The forum coincides with Holocaust Remembrance Day — marked on Thursday in several countries — and ceremonies were to take place at Stockholm's largest synagogue and in parliament.

The World Jewish Congress ended two days of meetings in Stockholm on Wednesday that focused on the distribution of funds from legal settlements over slave labor for Holocaust survivors and their relatives.

The congress honored Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who saved up to 20,000 Jews in Budapest, Hungary, from deportation to Nazi death camps.

MORRISON

Mason entered the game averaging 18.8 points and 7.3 rebounds per game. He finished the contest with 23 points, 5 above his season average. After the game, he said when he takes the court, he plays to win.

"I play hard, that's all I try to do when I go out there every night," Mason said. "If I am not playing well, and my teammates are playing hard and enthusiastic, I like that. It rubs off on me."

Unfortunately for Morrison, his night didn't end as well as it started.

He struggled to regain his first-half touch until late in the game. He spent the first part of the second half on the bench before entering, with the team down double digits. Asbury said his time on the bench had to do more with his conditioning.

"He was out for five or six minutes. He was really tired," Asbury said. "He probably played a few more minutes in the first half than he should have, but I didn't feel like I was getting major contributions from the other guys, and he was playing well. He was scoring and playing pretty well, playing hard defensively."

K-State's Tony Kitt lays in an easy two points over Oklahoma State's Fredrik Jonzen in the second half of Wednesday's game.
JUSTIN HAYWORTH/ COLLEGIAN

As time ran out, Morrison hit two three-pointers. Despite his strong performance, after the game Morrison said he just was looking for a way to help the Cats get a victory.

"We want to win games. Me personally, I am tired of losing," Morrison said. "No one is pointing fingers. We just want to win games."

DISPLAY

Angela Hubler was a plaintiff in the ACLU's case against the city of Manhattan. She said Rose's idea doesn't sound any more legal than the Ten Commandments monolith.

"It seems to me still to violate the Constitution, which is what the suit was brought on by in the first place," Hubler said. "It still seems to want to publicly establish a religious set of values."

But she said she didn't think there would be a need for another lawsuit, because the city and citizens would not allow it to happen.

"Clearly, public opinion has been expressed, and it will be doomed," she said.

McCulloh she said she couldn't comment on plans she hasn't seen, but said she wouldn't oppose anything that was legal.

She said there might be a more appropriate place for Rose's display.

"Rose's church is right down the street from City Hall," she said. "I think that if you wanted to do a religious display, that would be a very good place for it, too," she said.

However, Rose said his group probably will not meet again until summer to finalize any plans. He said whatever those plans might be, they won't include another recall election.

"We're in a box," Rose said. "The voters did not see fit to recall Karen McCulloh, and we don't see fit to run another recall."

He said a reason the recall election failed is because it involved a personality. It's a mistake he doesn't plan to repeat.

"We'd like to get the personalities out of it," he said.

and the upcoming elections.

When it gets closer to the actual elections, Karrer said her committee will visit organizations to tell them how to run, when elections are and inform them about electronic voting. Her committee also will send out a newsletter to the residence halls.

"We want to reach freshmen voters who may not be aware of what elections are," Karrer said.

With the implementation of electronic voting, Karrer said she thinks there will be a better turnout for the elections.

"This will allow people to log on and vote rather than going to the Union and filling out a ballot," she said. "It will be easier for them."

Senate meeting turns into election dispute

High school students spend day as interns with K-State senators

By TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

Area high school seniors had the opportunity to experience college-level student politics Thursday at the K-State Student Government Leadership Experience.

Twelve local high schools were invited to send two delegates to the clinic to meet with Student Government Association interns and learn about the governing process.

"I wanted to see the differences and similarities between our student council and K-State's student government," said Jesse Roddy, senior and co-president at Junction City High School. "We wanted to learn how K-State handles its parliamentary procedure."

Organized voting runs rampant, according to a concerned student who attended Thursday night's Student Senate meeting.

"The sad part about this problem is that everybody recognizes it," said Heath Schroeder, senior in finance.

Schroeder presented his voting-issue concerns, fueled by the Senate's election-regulations bill.

Schroeder said a large majority of students are not voting, and the Senate holds much of the blame. Schroeder presented a graph that showed that greeks comprise 55 percent of Senate.

"When we have an SGA who's not representative of the student body, you guys are not exactly seeing what's going on in the average student's life," Schroeder said.

Schroeder told Senate he tried to become a senator last spring. Although he wasn't elected, he said he would run again.

He said he noticed the problem when he tried to get some of his friends to run as well. He said they told him if he wasn't greek, he wouldn't get in.

Schroeder told Senate the solution to the problem was simple. He said both now and with the bill on the agenda for the evening, a student in the College of Arts and Sciences votes for 18 people to fill the 18 seats.

He said more students would have the opportunity to get elected if students only voted for one student to represent them, and then the top-18 vote-getters would become senators.

"You cast one vote, and you allow the majority the opportunity to choose," he said.

Bill Muir, Faculty Senate representative, said he didn't agree with Schroeder's proposal.

"I find that the sentiments offered by our speaker are undemocratic and unrepublican," he said.

He said Schroeder's idea of a more representative Senate could be achieved by people who want to serve running for office.

Senate passed the election-regulations bill.

Student Body President Jason Heinrich brought up the K-State SGA Transportation Proposal to Senate. During his speech, Heinrich said the proposal is just that — a proposal, not a plan. He said the proposal is just an idea the Senate wants to pursue, not concrete. The transportation bill was passed by unanimous consent.

In other business, Senate approved the Black Student Union's funds proposal. BSU was granted $6,500 to have speaker Sister Soldier come to Manhattan and speak during Black History Month. Not all senators were completely enthusiastic about the cost of $6,500 for Sister Soldier.

"When we have an SGA who's not representative of the student body, you guys are not exactly seeing what's going on in the average student's life."

Mall owner decides to sell local property

By GINA KOHAKE
Kansas State Collegian

Forest City Enterprises of Cleveland officially has decided to sell the Manhattan Town Center due to location reasons.

Although they refused to comment on a price tag for the property, mall manager and Forest City spokesperson Allen Raynor did provide a reason for the decision in a press release from the company.

"Geographically, Manhattan, Kansas, no longer fits the company's retail and development strategy," Raynor said. "Forest City Enterprises has the highest regard for the Manhattan business community and the people of Manhattan, Kansas.

"This decision has simply been a factor of the geographic location of the property in relationship to the rest of the Forest City portfolio," he said.

Forest City has owned the mall since its development in 1987. The building covers 380,000 feet and includes more than 60 small shops in addition to the large department stores of Dillard's, JCPenney and Sears.

"The mall sales continue to increase, and we have added some exciting new tenants in the last few months, which makes the decision to sell the mall even more difficult," Raynor said.

There is not a lot of concern about the change in ownership, said Angie Short, store manager of Kansas Kollection in the mall.

"I don't think it will impact businesses," Short said. "Most people don't even know about the management of the mall anyway."

Brad Streeter, owner of Kansas Kollection and Vista, also said there would not be any negative effects of the mall being sold since business is determined by the public, not by the management.

"I heard the rumor on the radio, but I am not really worried. Business is only as good as the local people, so as long as the people are here there is no challenge," Streeter said.

In the press release, Raynor said there has been some interest in the mall but he is unable to give further information.

"Any discussions are in the preliminary stages and I am not at liberty to comment on confidential negotiations," Raynor said.

A.J. Cecil, freshman in history, applauds one of the more generous bids during Thursday night's student auction. All proceeds from the event were donated to Manhattan's Women's Crisis Center.

STORY BY NANCY FOSTER ■ PHOTOS BY MICHAEL YOUNG

Students contribute hundreds in Goodnow Hall date auction for Crisis Center

Couples in leopard print, students sharing pick-up lines and eager bidders all set the scene of the date auction Thursday.

Goodnow Hall sponsored the auction on its second floor lobby to raise money for the Manhattan Women's Crisis Center.

"We wanted to do a date auction to bring in a lot of money," said Devin Schehrer, sophomore in secondary education.

In order to bid for a date, the money had to be in hand in either cash or check form. All proceeds from the auction went to the crisis center.

Twelve people were auctioned off to the crowd. Those being sold were divided into couples so purchasers could go on double dates.

Each couple dressed in costume with a matching theme, such as Tarzan and Jane, and each offered a different date.

Four "mystery dates" participated in the auction. The mystery dates each had a spot in Goodnow where a description of their personalities were posted, along with other information about them and their interests. Their names and pictures were not posted.

"Our focus is not people being sold, but dates being sold," Schehrer said.

The bidding began at $10.

After a back and forth two-man battle, Classy Cat Sara Evans was auctioned off to the highest bidder for $165.

Eric Moffit, sophomore in pre-veterinarian medicine, lost the chance for the date by only $1. He said the reason he stopped bidding was because he ran out of money.

Moffit said he would've raised the bid even higher if he had had the money.

"It's a good donation," Moffit said. "I would have ran it up more, because it's a good cause."

Judy Davis, executive director of the crisis center, spoke about the clinic before the auction and addressed issues related to battery and assault. She said respecting one another is the key to combating the problem of battery and assault.

"No community is immune," Davis said. "These problems are pervasive here, just as they are in society. What we need to do first and foremost as men and women is respect each other."

Area businesses also donated certificates and coupons for the event. Depending on the couple bid, one would have the opportunity to go out to eat, go to a movie, or attend a production of "Picasso," sponsored by K-State Theatre.

"It is a good cause so I can see good things happening," said Bonnie Brown, sophomore in animal science and agribusiness. "I've been to the crisis center, I've been someone they've helped. That's why I'm here."

Andrew Kennedy, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, and his brother, Aaron, sophomore in interior architecture, perform a skit for the crowd at the student auction on Thursday evening. The auction was in the lobby of Goodnow Hall's second floor.

Wal-Mart gives K-State grant to train engineers

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

An equipment grant from the Wal-Mart/NCR Program will offer those working toward a career in information systems, computer science, software engineering and management information systems training for the future.

Virgil Wallentine, professor of computing and information sciences, said the multimillion-dollar equipment grant of computer systems and software will be beneficial not only to students in computer-related majors but also to researchers at K-State.

"This system will support instruction in computer science and digital library technology," Wallentine said. "It will also support the research programs in digital libraries and data mining."

The proposal, "Data Knowledge Management, Mining and Warehousing: Integration of Research and Curricular Processes," was written by Wallentine, William Hsu and Daniel Andresen, both assistant professors of computing and information sciences.

The grant includes an NCR 5100 parallel processor equipped with 1.7 terabytes of disk storage. Wallentine said the system is capable of handling the needs of many large businesses and Fortune 500 companies at this time. A system of similar capability would carry a list price of almost $7 million.

Melissa Berryhill, spokeswoman for Wal-Mart, said this is the first year for the program and that Wal-Mart has awarded six grants throughout the United States. She said the program was established to give students training on

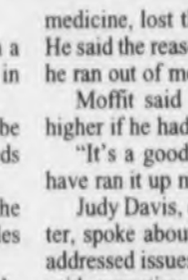
Clinton delivers his 8th, final State of the Union address

By TERENCE HUNT
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton proposed a $350 billion tax cut, big spending increases for schools and health care and photo ID licenses for handgun purchases Thursday as he offered the final agenda of his presidency.



"The state of our union is the strongest it has ever been," he said.

At the start of an election year, Clinton issued a stinging rebuke in his last State of the Union address.

"For too long this Congress has been standing still on some of our most pressing national priorities," he said.

The president noted that next month the United States will achieve the longest period of economic growth in the nation's history and called on Americans to set great goals.

The president offered a long litany of initiatives, many of them sure to be rewritten or ignored by Congress. His tax-cut proposals were intended primarily to promote educational opportunities and expand health insurance and child care for lower- and middle-income Americans. The initiatives included relief from the "marriage penalty" — an idea first championed by Republicans — and a new program of retirement savings accounts.

CLINTON

Most of the proposals were released in advance, but the White House withheld Clinton's gun-licensing measure until the last minute to build suspense. Similar to a plan offered by Vice President Al Gore, it would require handgun purchasers to first obtain a state license showing they have passed a background check and a gun-safety requirement, such as a training course or

TAKE note

Fort Riley program. A new program installed at Fort Riley will help families deal with the deployment of soldiers.

The Family Readiness Center, a service of the Soldier and Family Support Center, is opening at 11 a.m. Monday.

Deployments are generally long-term separations, and many people need resources to keep in touch with their loved ones, which the center will provide.

The center also will provide pre-deployment classes and support for soldiers and family members left behind.

Eisenhower awareness. The Official Eisenhower Center launched a two-year nationwide campaign to increase awareness of Dwight D. Eisenhower and the Eisenhower Center in Abilene, Kan.

The campaign includes a film on the center, which premiered Thursday, a traveling exhibit and several speakers. The exhibit will travel to several cities in the country including Washington, D.C.

Female applies for vacancy on Citidel's school board

GREENVILLE, S.C. — Five years after the first female cadet was admitted to The Citadel, a woman has applied to be the first female member of the military school's board.

Allison Dean Wright, a nonvoting advisory member of the board since 1997, has applied to fill a vacancy on the panel. She is one of five candidates for two seats on the board that will be filled by the state General Assembly this year.

"I feel like I would be making a difference if I could vote, and I haven't been able to do so for three years," Wright said.

She and Ann Elish were added as advisers after the school began admitting women.

Wright, 35, the director of the South Carolina Insurance News Service in Columbia, received a business degree from The Citadel's evening college in 1993.

She said she does not consider herself a trailblazer.

"I don't think I'm radical in my thinking," Wright said. "I appreciate the discipline, the atmosphere and the leaders who are created there."

Off-duty policeman shoots himself after gambling loss

DETROIT — After losing thousands of dollars in a day of gambling at Detroit's brand-new casinos, off-duty police Sgt. Solomon Bell tried one last high-stakes hand of blackjack.

He lost.

The decorated officer abruptly stood up from the table, cried out "Noooooo!," drew his gun and put a bullet in head as other gamblers scrambled for safety.

The death — believed to be the first suicide inside a U.S. gambling hall — has highlighted concerns about casino gambling in a city pinning much of its hopes for revival on three new casinos.

"I predicted this is the kind of problem we would face because of the addictiveness of gambling," City Councilwoman Maryann Mahaffey said.

Bell's death on Wednesday was shocking to people who knew him. They said the 38-year-old officer was a jovial fellow with few visible problems — gambling or otherwise.

He joined the Oak Park force about 12 years ago and rose from uniformed patrol officer to investigator, sergeant and patrol supervisor. His service record was unblemished.

In 1988 and 1990, he got merit awards for arrests in stolen-vehicle cases, said Bob Bauer, the department's deputy director.

"I just describe him as a good guy," Bauer said.

Away from his $63,675-a-year job, the unmarried Bell kept mostly to himself and took meticulous care of his house in nearby Southfield. He owned a 1995 Cadillac Seville and roller skated.

Co-workers said they knew he occasionally gambled, but never saw signs of a problem.

Then, on his day off, authorities said he lost $15,000 to $20,000 at the MGM Grand Detroit Casino, which opened in July, and the 6-week-old MotorCity Casino.

At MotorCity, spokesman Jack Barthwell said, Bell tried various blackjack tables in the high-stakes VIP room before losing roughly $4,000 on a single hand at a $100-minimum game.

Bell then pulled his gun and fired a shot into his temple so abruptly the few players and about 20 casino workers on the fourth floor had no time to intervene, Barthwell said.

As his body lay on the floor near the table, gamblers on lower floors continued playing. The VIP room where Bell died reopened five hours later.

"We felt it was important to get it opened and return things to normal," Barthwell said.

On Thursday, a 37-year Detroit firefighter threatened to kill himself at the MGM Grand Detroit while playing blackjack. Police, alerted by the dealer, took the man into custody for treatment at a crisis center.

City Councilwoman Kay Everett said the suicide should not cast a pall over the casinos. "One person deciding to have their own demise should not be the demise of the casino. That's ludicrous," Everett said.

Carol O'Hare, executive director of the Nevada Council on Problem Gambling, said she knows of no previous suicide committed inside a U.S. casino, though there have been suicides associated with gambling halls.

In August, a German tourist jumped to his death from the roof of the nine-story Resorts Atlantic City parking garage in New Jersey, making him the third suicide at a casino building there in eight days.

STUDENT coaching

STORY BY LYNNE HERMANSEN

Senior's love for athletics leads her to Luckey Junior High

One thump, followed by another, and then some more balls bouncing on the floor. A graceful Michael Jordan jump in motion, soaring through the air. Swish. Sneakers smacking the hardwood floor, lap after lap. These images and sounds accompany basketball practice in the afternoon at Luckey Junior High.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

Debi Whitaker jumps off her seat while coaching the Luckey Junior High girls' basketball team. The Cardinals won the game 51-4.

Passions for secondary education and athletics have led one K-State student to involvement in youth sports.

After hearing about an opening position for a coaching assistant job at Luckey, Debi Whitaker, senior in secondary education, pursued her ambitions. Since Nov. 1, Whitaker has been coaching fifth- and sixth-grade girls' basketball.

Whitaker has played basketball since she was 9, and now participates in intramural sports.

She said she hopes her experiences as an assistant coach will help her find success in future coaching endeavors.

She said coaching has helped her perfect her own basketball skills. If given the opportunity, Whitaker said she also would enjoy coaching youth soccer.

"Coaching makes you stop and think," she said. "You learn from your own words."

Whitaker said she was inspired by coaches at an early age. Since then, Whitaker has wanted to coach her own team. She credits her past coaches for pushing her in the direction of coaching youth sports.

"Marvin Harvey, my basketball coach in seventh and eighth grade, taught us basketball, but he also taught us about ourselves," Whitaker said. "Terry English, my basketball coach in ninth and tenth grade, showed us how to be great leaders."

Gale Hammerschmidt, athletic director at Luckey, said that in order to be a coach, a person must have an outgoing personality, friendly attitude and the ability to enjoy children's company. Most college students have these qualities, which makes them more sought after and easy to hire, she said.

"There are not enough teachers or willing teachers to coach at Luckey middle school, so the positions are open to anyone," she said. "College students happen to be more willing, have more flexible schedules and are great with kids."

Whitaker said she coaches for the sole purpose of the rewarding experience, not for the money.

"The satisfaction of teaching and knowing they understand you, and seeing the girls happy, is a benefit in itself. The money is not all that important to me," Whitaker said. "It's not the reason I am doing this."

Low GPAs, dismissal can be avoided

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A common thread that binds many students together is the fear of having their grade point averages fall below the minimum requirements set by the university and being forced to leave K-State.

Don Foster, university registrar, said the probation and dismissal policy is based on a student's cumulative grade point average. First, a student who has a GPA below a 2.0 will be placed on academic warning. Students then are dismissed if they have been on academic warning the previous semester or depending on the total number of hours they have accumulated.

Foster said falling below the minimum requirement depends on the number of hours completed.

For example, a student with 20-29 total hours would be dismissed for having less than a 1.5 GPA. As the hours increase, so does the minimum GPA requirement.

"It is most important for students to not wait and see they are having trouble in school," Foster said. "If intervention is done early, it helps in dodging the dismissal bullet."

Foster said another category is only for first-time students.

If a first-semester freshman receives a GPA of less than 1.0, he or she is subject to immediate dismissal with no opportunity for an academic warning semester.

He said once students are dismissed, they are required to stay out of K-State for two semesters. After that period, students have the opportunity to petition their college for reinstatement.

The petition then goes to the Reinstatement Committee of the college. Those reviewing the petition evaluate what the student will do to improve his or her academic standing in the future.

"The committee will look at what the student has done during their time away from K-State and the reasons for the dismissal," Foster said. "They can then decide if the student can perform at an acceptable level and get back onto the track to graduation."

Foster said students can attempt an appeal to reenter the university earlier, but he said there must be extraordinary circumstances, and appeals are rarely granted.

"Students do have the option to appeal to the Reinstatement Committee," Foster said. "However, the application must have exceptional circumstances and reinstatement is not automatic. Appeals are not granted very often."

Jackie McClaskey, assistant dean in the College of Agriculture, said 130 students, or 6 percent of the college, were dismissed last semester. However, she said the number is misleading because it included not only students who were dismissed, but also those who were immediately reinstated because of class retakes and department policy, and those who never attended class last semester.

dismissal policy

Students are dismissed if (1) they have been on academic warning the previous semester, (2) they have accumulated a total of 20 or more semester hours, and (3) their K-State grade point averages are at the following levels:

Total hours	Cumulative GPA less than
20-29	1.50
30-45	1.75
46-60	1.80
61-75	1.85
76-90	1.90
91-105	1.95
greater than 105	2.00

SOURCE: REGISTRAR'S OFFICE

"Because of the new university policy of not dropping a student's schedule when they have not paid their tuition, there are students dismissed who never attended class or were on campus in the fall," McClaskey said. "We did not spend a lot of time on this situation in the beginning, so it is hard to tell how many students fell into this category."

McClaskey also said that because the College of Agriculture does not have a minimum GPA requirement like other colleges on campus, some students who already are in academic trouble transfer into the college to avoid being dismissed. If they are dismissed, these students are included in the college's percentage, which she said makes it somewhat inaccurate.

"The College of Agriculture does not have minimum standards because we want to be a place where students feel comfortable," McClaskey said. "We understand that things come up or students have a bad semester, but at the same time it may not be to the student's benefit to not have minimum standard requirements."

McClaskey said many faculty members have expressed a desire for GPA requirements, and the possibility of a change could be discussed in the future.

"We need to figure out how to best serve our students and maybe look at putting them in a situation where we expect some higher standards," McClaskey said. "By not having the minimum standards, we are not serving the students by allowing those into the college who are already on academic warning."

Foster said the largest number of students who are dismissed from K-State are freshmen. He said the key to avoiding dismissal is to get a start early on correcting bad habits and learning proper time management and study skills.

"There is significant adjustment for freshmen between high school and the college setting, which could be why the dismissal rate is so high for incoming freshmen," Foster said. "It is a matter of students learning how to manage their academic life in order to stay in school and have a prosperous career while at K-State."

Judith Lynch, director of the Academic Assistance Center, said there are several options at the center students can use to help them before they are dismissed.

Lynch said the first thing the center recommends to all incoming freshmen is the Enhanced University Experience course. She said this orientation and study-skills class introduces students to all services offered at K-State, as well as teaching them study and time-management skills.

The last part of the class allows students to apply what they have learned to two of their other courses as supplemental help. Free tutors are also available upon request.

"Students need to sit down and evaluate exactly how much time they spend studying," Lynch said. "Generally, they are not putting in the hours needed to be successful. It is important to catch a problem early because it is a lot easier to prevent a problem than to fix one."

Wefald, K-State officials should approve parking solution

K-State has a parking problem.

Committees have been formed, surveys conducted and studies done. All have pointed to this parking problem, but all have lacked one thing — a viable solution.

Such a solution now has been presented by Student Body President Jason Heinrich and the concept was supported formally by Student Senate on Thursday. The burden now falls on President Jon Wefald, Faculty Senate and Parking Services to approve the plan and move the university closer to solving its parking headache.

The plan proposes a bus-shuttle route that stops at University Commons Apartments, Chase Manhattan Apartments and the K-State Student Union, among others.

Students also would have the choice of parking in one of the 1,000 parking spaces on the east side of Bramlage Coliseum and taking the shuttle from there. Funds for this proposal would come from an increase in the cost of parking permits, not from raising student privilege fees, Heinrich said.

While this plan is not perfect — it raises the cost of permits, does not allow parking next to the buildings students have class in and has some start-up costs — it is the closest thing to perfect that has been brought up for some time. And it is realistic — it does not shoot for the stars and make it impossible to push through. But it could become something bigger.

"We feel like we've got a good starting point," Student Senate Chair Jake Worcester said. "If we do something like this, it could be the beginning of what could become a large-scale transportation system."

Plans examined previously that suggested building parking garages or new parking lots were unrealistic, primarily because their start-up costs are high and unused land for new lots or garages is scarce.

This plan, however, has a minimal start-up cost. It would begin with only three buses and a few stops, trying to combine timeliness and availability.

"With only three buses, you can't run an elaborate route and still be on time," Worcester said. "If the buses aren't on time, no one's going to ride it."

Worcester said the resolution approved by Student Senate does not specifically support Heinrich's proposal. Instead, it simply urges its recipients to take action of some sort in creating a bus system to improve the parking situation. He also said, however, that most members of Student Senate showed support for Heinrich's plan.

Heinrich, meanwhile, has not closed the door on other ideas. He still is accepting ideas and suggestions that could improve on his present plan and help it to gain support in the process. His proposal is being sent to other committees, he said, as a guideline from which to start when trying to create the plan that is right for K-State.

"We're looking for a lot of feedback at this point to gain some momentum," Heinrich said. "We were really pleased to be able to come up with a plan that everyone liked."

Heinrich devised this plan with efficiency in mind, and appears to have done very well in that respect. It would be of use to many students when it first begins running routes. Its potential, however, is what makes it impressive.

If students take advantage of the system, it could be expanded not just to include students, but eventually include all of Manhattan.

The resolution approved by Student Senate will be sent not only to Wefald, Faculty Senate president Buddy Gray and Parking Services director Darwin Abbott, it will also be sent to Mayor Roger Reitz in hopes of eventually expanding the plan.

It might appear that Heinrich is looking too far ahead. He actually is showing foresight.

Now it is time for Wefald, Gray and Abbott to show that same foresight.

Approve the proposal and put K-State's parking problem in the garage — permanently.

Censorship out of hand, danger to our individuality

VIEWPOINT

TRAVIS WEIGEL

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

A teen-age boy shackled in a dungeon ... Kids lined up before a South American firing squad ... Innocent victims bombarded by buckets of oozing slime.

These all were trademarks of the classic Nickelodeon program, "You Can't Do That On Television." Although this show would seem somewhat mellow and mundane today, it was on the fringe of acceptable television in the 1980s and caused many parents to worry about what it was doing to their children.

By the time "Die Hard" was released in 1988, most Americans were desensitized to the violence and language that filled the Bruce Willis film. As the crime rate began to increase in the early 1990s, the information and entertainment industries were made the scapegoats. According to the so-called experts, mass censorship of the media would be the fastest and easiest way to counter the epidemic of crime plaguing our country. Unfortunately, the solution has become far worse than most of the crimes it is trying to prevent.

Instead of simply censoring materials that promote illegal and unethical ideals, its focus has turned to silencing what some consider different or threatening.

Picture yourself at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. You happen upon a plain white canvas that is inscribed in black with "You know who killed my dog. I'll kill you if you don't tell me who killed my dog. Tell me who did it. Tell me. Tell me. Tell me." Should this be censored, regardless of whether one considers it to be art? According to Bluestem High School, it should. As a result Sarah Boman was expelled, because some individual found it to be threatening in nature.

According to the Bill of Rights, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech." Nowhere does it say, "unless some individual finds it to be different or threatening." If it did, we could no longer criticize the president or other political leaders.

Then, as a citizen with this grand privilege, if I believed that black trench coats were in some way threatening, then, by law, they automatically would be made illegal.

Under this grand privilege, every aspect of our lives would strictly be regimented and dictated to fit a certain mold. In this cookie-cutter world, everything from our hair and eye color to our morals, ideals and religion would be prescribed by what was thought to be normal and acceptable by everyone else. This would prohibit any form of progression born from new and different ideas.

Fortunately, we do not yet have the grand privilege to dictate what other people should think, say or do. However, if we do not stop censoring the so-called different and threatening aspects of this society, soon books like "The Grapes of Wrath" and "Lord of the Flies" will suffer the same fate as Cosmopolitan magazine. Furthermore, parents only are perpetuating the use of the privilege by using censorship to do their jobs of raising their children.

Sadly, part of being human is our individuality. We have the grand privilege to think, say or do whatever we like, as long as it does not infringe upon someone else's privilege to do the same. When individuals cross this line, they are guilty of violating someone else's inalienable rights, and their actions are deemed illegal. Just because something might be thought of as different or threatening does not mean it is illegal.

There still are things you can't say or do on television or print in this newspaper, including George Carlin's seven dirty words. These are only a few words in the English language — out of thousands — that have the potential to be deemed different or threatening and, thus, fall to the whims of censorship.

If allowed to progress, what has started out as V-chips, Internet filters and magazine blinders have the potential to be bastardized into a threat upon the freedom of speech.

'Rules' book's guidelines on dating, relationships with men full of bad advice

VIEWPOINT

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

It was on the bargain table at a local bookstore. I figured for $.99 that "The Rules II" was worth a good laugh.

Instead of being a good laugh, it was a terrible feeling in the pit of my stomach that there are women out there who actually believe this nonsense, women who believe that if they follow these strict guidelines men will flock to them and drop to their knees. The book makes it sound like women will have all the power in the relationship. Yet following its advice will lead to the loss of power and of having an opinion or a voice, and a feeling of confidence.

The book suggests the following advice:

Rules for turning a friend into a boyfriend: "Don't call him. When he calls, get off the phone in ten minutes ... Don't talk to him like a friend — like Elaine on "Seinfeld" — but be light, feminine and mysterious."

Another piece of advice was not to see him at the last minute or all of the time.

Several times they suggest that if he doesn't call you by Wednesday to ask you out for Saturday, then you should refuse plans with him.

What is wrong with making plans at the last minute if you have nothing else to do? There is no reason to live your life on a schedule and miss out on opportunities to have fun.

Rules for getting back an ex: If you do agree to meet up with an old flame, they offered the following advice. "Look good, very good, when you meet him. Extra care with your makeup, pretty outfit ... Try to be the girl he originally fell in love with. "

Don't waste time on fantasy relationships: "Being a Rules girl doesn't mean you can' t have obsessions, it means you don't act on them."

After all, if you acted on your obsessions then that would mean you would have a mind of your own and a backbone. We can't have that now, can we?

Long distance relationships. Part II : Making it work — "You don't call him. He calls you. He can call you often, but make sure you don't spend endless hours on the phone. Get off the phone in 15 to 20 minutes. You can talk longer than the standard 10 minutes, since it is long distance."

Too bad this book didn't come with a list of words that you can use, advice on when to giggle, and when to say, "Whatever you think, dear."

Show up even if you don't feel like it: These are suggestions on how to meet men. It basically says to get involved in activities, not because you want to, but instead as a golden opportunity to meet men. "Focus on doing something — anything — to increase your chances of meeting men so you can practice 'The Rules' and get married."

Money isn't supposed to buy love, but you couldn't tell by this book. "When a man is truly in love, he'll work extra hours or borrow from his parents or friends to come up with the money to impress you."

The book states that after three months you can buy or make him dinner.

Maybe they need a college edition. There are very few college guys who can afford to pay for meals every time they go on dates. When they borrow money from their parents or friends it usually is to keep a roof over their heads, food in their stomachs and heat on in their apartments.

Other rules: "Be quiet and mysterious, act ladylike, and cross your legs and smile and don't talk too much" on the first few dates.

Only see the man, before you are engaged, two to three times a week.

Let's say that this idiotic book actually works. When will their mates discover who they truly are? On their honeymoons? Will there be a book that offers advice on how to convince your husband to stay married to you?

If I do meet the man with whom I want to spend the rest of my life, there should be no need for a book, for techniques to make him fall in love with me.

I don't want to spend my life pretending I am someone I am not.

My husband shouldn't think I like to watch ice skating, when I would much rather be watching ice hockey.

No, I don't want to be the wife making the appetizers for the football and baseball games and waiting on my husband hand and foot, when I would rather be watching it with him. I want to be the one on the couch drinking my Bud Light and cheering for my favorite team.

Maybe I will remain single, but at least I won't live my life by a book.

There is nothing wrong with a woman who takes pride in herself and makes her own standards, but there also is nothing wrong with a woman taking initiative. Make that her own initiative.

It is "Rules," not women, that are made to be broken.

Sprinkler system to be installed in 3 residence halls over 7 years

BY DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sprinkler systems will be installed in three K-State residence halls in the next seven years.

Moore Hall will be the first residence hall to have a sprinkler system, a project that will begin this summer.

Haymaker and Ford halls will be next in line.

"It's a big project, and I don't know if we'll get it all done this summer," said Skyler Harper, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

These three residence halls, along with suites and renovated areas in every hall, will have sprinkler systems. Harper said there are no plans to install systems in every residence hall because of the materials the halls are made of and their height. This will not violate fire code, he said.

The cost will be about $100,000 per building, funded by student fees and money made from summer conferences. The residence halls are not state-funded and do not receive state dollars, Harper said.

All residence halls have fire alarms, extinguishers and emergency lighting, which all are up-to-date. Harper said they are just trying to upgrade the buildings, and that the sprinklers are not being installed as a response to the recent fire at Seton Hall University in New Jersey.

"I looked at that article and dread it, but they had a major procedural problem," he said. "We have a good procedure. This would not happen at Kansas State University."

There is a fire alarm evacuation every semester and they are methodical about it, Harper said.

Fire Marshall Don Francis said sprinkler systems have to be installed if the buildings are more than three stories tall and have more than 12 sleeping rooms. He said sprinklers are a good safety measure.

"The Seton Hall fire building shows you how after a couple of false alarms, people don't react to them," Francis said. "That's where the real safety measure is: You don't have to rely on people to react to the alarm. The water that comes down, that's going to give them more of a clue that they need to leave the building."

Although the Manhattan fire department has been to some residence halls for a few false alarms and for a fire in a trash chute that occurred January 1999, they do not have jurisdiction over K-State. The code requirements are set by the State Fire Marshal's Office in Topeka.

Meanwhile, life at Moore is uninterrupted, said Michael Pennington, the hall's residence life coordinator.

"It's not really a disruption. They did as much as they could before people got back from break," he said. "Everything is ready. They just have to put it in now."

KSU Shuttle helps disabled students

BY LINDA BYRD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As Student Senate votes on resolutions to free up parking spaces and limit excessive campus traffic, one K-State service has proven beneficial in offering students the convenience of shuttle transportation.

Disabled Student Services makes it possible for disabled and temporarily disabled students to get around campus by offering them an opportunity to ride on the KSU Shuttle. Many of the college's disabled students are independent but find it necessary at times, especially during cold weather, to use the shuttle service.

The shuttle started in 1980 with a few people driving students in their cars. It has grown since then. During fall 1999, the shuttle made a total of 2,288 pickups, operating Monday through Friday between 7:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m., and traveling nearly 40 miles per day on campus alone.

During the day it is not unlikely for the bus to make stops at McCain Auditorium and Boyd, Umberger, Eisenhower, Throckmorton and Kedzie halls, all within 30 minutes.

"It's a great service the university has offered," Sara Buller, sophomore in music education, said.

Buller found herself in need of quick transportation to and from classes after she injured her ankle playing racquetball at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Gretchen Holden, director of Disabled Student Services, said the shuttle is a user-friendly, non-bureaucratic service and is one thing the students do not pay for.

The service genuinely is funded by administration through institutional advancement.

Although her budget is limited, Holden said she would like to purchase another van equipped with a rear access hydraulic lift and expand the shuttle's services to include off-campus transportation with evening and summer hours of operation. Holden said other schools, including the University of Kansas, have a lot of buses and offer more extensive service.

Holden said she feels K-State's diversity goes well beyond race and the shuttle allows K-State's disabled population to get to class since other public transportation is not available.

Priscilla Wendt, freshman in business, was disabled in a car accident four years ago. She said she is a daily passenger on the shuttle and is grateful for the service. However, she said the traffic on campus sometimes delays the shuttle, making her late to class.

"It's embarrassing coming to class late — everyone stares. Professors are pretty cool about it though," she said.

John Evans, full-time shuttle driver, said he works very hard to be punctual while driving safely in congested traffic. As Evans transports Wendt and other students, he puts his patience to work for him. Evans jumps out of the shuttle's driver's seat and, with a smile, helps Wendt off of the bus.

Today, she is on time.

"I have a whole new respect for people with disabilities and give them a lot of credit," Evans said. "I'm glad the university offers this service, and knowing I am helping people is very satisfying."

Speaker says WTO's actions not always admirable

BY CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The World Trade Organization's actions might not be considered sensible or humane.

Associate Professor Robert Schaeffer of San Jose State University gave examples of laws that were in the interest of the environment, local economies or human health that were opposed by WTO in his speech in the Manhattan Public Library on Thursday.

Schaeffer was invited to Manhattan by the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice.

WTO began as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1947. That organization mainly dealt with tariffs, which are taxes imposed on imported products.

WTO, which has much more far-reaching power, was organized in 1994.

One of the things that WTO is trying to end worldwide is subsidies.

WTO has a far-reaching definition of subsidy: U.S. fisherman complained that Canada was subsidizing lobster fisherman because they were eligible for unemployment in the off season. The case ended in changes that made it harder to get unemployment benefits in Canada.

Restrictions on exports can have unexpected results as well.

Under the free-trade agreement, it would be illegal for Thailand to make restrictions on lumber exports even though deforestation is leading to erosion in that country.

Schaeffer said it also would be illegal for countries to stop exports of food or fuels even if there are shortages at home.

"Canada would have to keep pumping natural gas to the United States, even if they are freezing in Quebec," Schaeffer said.

The United States exports puppies to Canada, but there were problems with the puppies being ill. WTO said Canada had to drop laws that would have required more humane treatment of the animals.

WTO has been charged with creating universal food standards, but those standards tend to be a fraction of what is required by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

WTO allows the chemical DDT to be in much higher levels in food than allowed in the United States.

"We expect some protections from the government of what is safe and what is not, but the WTO makes you do it on your own," Schaeffer said.

Extending patents all over the world means poor countries can't knock-off expensive American drugs like those for AIDS.

"It means people may die sooner and the disease spreads more quickly than if people were able to knock-off drugs," Schaeffer said.

Schaeffer said he was most concerned about WTO's lack of control of monopolies. He said monopolies and free trade can't exist together.

"The WTO needs to adopt an anti-trust foundation or just get out of town," he said.

Opposition by farmers, labor and environmentalists to WTO as seen in the riots in Seattle this past fall has brought together groups that under other circumstances would be antagonists, Schaeffer said.

Sean Noonan, graduate student in sociology, said he thought WTO did not work in the interest of labor or the environment.

Free trade allows low safety standards and low wages in Third World countries, he said.

Whitham serves as leader for women throwers

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Anna Whitham wants to go out in style.

She is a senior thrower in the weight and shot put, and she is looking to finish with a strong final season.

This season she is the unquestioned leader of the K-State women throwers; gone is Renetta Seiler, who graduated last season and pushed Whitham to excel.

"It is a different role for her this season," throwers' coach Steve Fritz said. "With Seiler gone she is now the leader, and she has the pressure of leading the team. People look to her to score and start us off."

Whitham said she does not feel the pressure much because track is individualized and is more about self-motivation.

It is a sport that spans the entire school year, and she said the team works hard to condition and improve.

Whitham continues her season this weekend in a triangular meet with Kansas and Missouri. Whitham said the meet will be a chance for her to progress. She also is looking for a personal record.

"I still haven't PR'd in the weight," She said. "I have thrown 60 a couple of times, but I need to do better than that. There are other throwers in the conference that are above 60, and my goal is not 60."

Whitham won the hammer competition at the Iowa State Open last weekend, and finished fifth in the shot put.

Fritz said Whitham's performance at this point in the season is where it needs to be.

He said he expects her best performances to come down the road.

"She has been making good progress," Fritz said. "We want her at her best for the conference and national meets."

Fritz said the team makes strides to see that the different throwers are peaking at the right time.

"We try to have them peaking later in the year," He said. "It is not an exact science, because you have to factor in stress with classes and stuff."

Whitham said she hopes to be throwing well at the Husker Invitational, in a couple of weeks.

"The Husker Invitational — it's a big meet — all the throwers in the nation come, a lot of schools come and the west, so its kind of like a pre-national," Whitham said.

This is her final season — Whitham didn't redshirt the outdoor season of her freshman year — and she said she is excited to be a part of the program.

"The weight and the shot will be the end of my college career," Whitham said.

Whitham graduates in May with a double major in marketing and political science.

She said she likely will leave her throwing career behind to concentrate on graduate school.

For now, though, Whitham said she will worry about the future later. Right now she is focused on the upcoming track meet.

"I enjoy it a lot. You spend a lot of time in here — it really is, it's a lot of fun," Whitham said. "You get to know everybody, so it will definitely be hard to leave. That's why I need to be throwing better."

Whitham said she would not necessarily mind not having bigger crowds at her meets, but instead she throws for her self and her teammates.

"That's not why I do it — I enjoy it, I look to get better every year. It's good to go to nationals and do well," Whitham said. "It really doesn't bother me.

Wildcats trek to Nebraska to battle Cornhuskers, improve conference record

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/Collegian

Cortez Groves drives to the basket and shoots over Oklahoma State's Jason Keep during the second half of the game in Manhattan on Wednesday night. The Wildcats travel to Nebraska on Saturday to take on the Huskers.

Revenge will be a big factor for the Nebraska Cornhuskers (9-10 overall, 2-4 Big 12) when the Wildcats (8-9, 1-5) travel to Lincoln on Saturday. Tipoff is set for 7:05 p.m. at the Bob Devaney Sports Center.

Nebraska fans probably still remember K-State's 97-79 shellacking of the Huskers in Manhattan on Jan. 8.

Players should have a still-vivid memory of junior Galen Morrison's 27 points on 7-of-9 shooting from beyond the three-point arc, and the 25-point half-time deficit they faced at Bramlage less than three weeks ago.

"I'm certain that they'll be hungry for revenge, and that may be some motivation for them, but we're hungry for a sweep — that's what we're shooting for," K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said.

NEXT MATCHUP
Saturday
Tip-off at 7:05 p.m.

"Both teams need a win so it'll be a battle," Fox added. "I think there are similarities in the fact that both teams have a lot of new players this year that are having a difficult time adjusting to conference play. This is a big game for both teams."

However, the Huskers might have an advantage on their home floor.

K-State hasn't won a conference road game this season. In fact, the Cats' only road win this season came in a 74-61 victory at Georgia State on Dec. 29.

"Most road games are difficult places to play," Fox said. "In road performances, we haven't gotten off to very good starts because of turnovers. If we can avoid that problem and hang in there until we relax — then we'll be fine.

"You can't dig holes on the road, and we've had a tendency to do that. So we have to avoid that situation on Saturday."

Nebraska's post players, led by 6-foot-11-inch center Kimani Ffriend, will be a focal point for the Wildcat defense on Saturday.

Ffriend, a transfer from Gulf Coast (Fla.) Community College, has been named the Phillips 66 Big 12 Rookie of the Week three of the past four weeks.

The Kingston, Jamaica, native scored 23 points and grabbed 14 rebounds at No. 8 Kansas Jan. 15. Ffriend also set a Big 12 record earlier in the season with 21 rebounds against Oral Roberts on Dec. 22.

"He's a very quick big man — we've got to adjust to his quickness and his speed and compensate accordingly," Fox said. "He's someone that's played well — he's got a lot of confidence right now, and it'll be a big key containing him."

Ffriend teams with 6-foot-6-inch junior Steffon Bradford down low for the Huskers.

"Their two front line players have played pretty well in conference play, so we need to do a good job on them," Fox said. "I think if we can contain their inside game, that will be a huge key."

However, the Wildcat defense will resemble a MASH unit with senior Josh Reid still out of the line-up and forward Travis Reynolds playing at 50-60 percent.

"We've been a little bit limited on how we can play defense just because of our injuries, quite frankly," Fox said. "We haven't been able to be very flexible."

Reynolds, although still suffering from a high ankle sprain, played 14 minutes in the Wildcats 71-56 loss to Oklahoma State on Wednesday.

Reid remains side-lined after undergoing surgery Dec. 27 on a broken foot.

"There's a chance he could be ready Saturday, but I would say it's less than likely," Fox said.

Women's starting lineups might see more change

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team has improved.

That's the word from head coach Deb Patterson heading into a 1 p.m. matchup Sunday with Nebraska at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats were able to claim improved play from the wreckage that remained Tuesday after yet another close loss to a ranked team, this time a 64-61 setback to No. 6 Iowa State.

"I think our team stepped up and performed against Iowa State," Patterson said. "I told them I was very proud of their effort and execution and intensity and that was the way we expected to play.

"And if that means we're not quite good enough to get a win, we'll deal with that."

The Cats' success against the Cyclones was partially due to a shake-up in the starting lineup, with regular starters Angie Finkes, April Sailors and Kim Woodlee sitting the bench to start the game. They were replaced by Morgan Finneran and Marshela Webb, who made their first career starts, and Olga Firsova. The changes were prompted by a 63-52 loss at Missouri.

Tennis team to face tough competition this weekend

By RICHARD SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State tennis head coach Steve Bietau is proud of his team.

Although, at a glance, the Wildcats' 1-2 record following their first weekend of play might not seem overly impressive, Bietau said he considers the showing no small feat given the level of competition.

"One of the things that came out this weekend that I was really happy about was the fight of the team," Bietau said. "This weekend was probably one of the best efforts I've seen in a long time."

The Wildcats, whom Bietau said rarely showed the determination to match their talent last season, showed plenty of grit in hanging tough on the road against schools like No. 27 New Mexico, No. 29 San Diego and No. 31 Arizona to open the spring season.

Leading the way for the Wildcats, who travel to Springfield, Mo., this weekend for a match against Southwest Missouri State, is Petra Sedlmajerova. The freshman won all of her matches on the weekend, including a defeat of San Diego's Katarina Valkyova, the No. 3 player in the nation and the highest-ranked player ever beaten by a Wildcat.

As impressive as Sedlmajerova's strong start might be, Bietau said (and Sedlmajerova agreed) that she has yet to near her peak.

"It wasn't the best I could play," Sedlmajerova said. "I can improve for sure on my play in the net, because it is terrible, and my serve, because it wasn't so good."

Also off to a quick start for the Cats is junior Anna Pampoulova, who lost only once in singles play. Bietau praised Pampoulova for setting the tone for the Wildcats' scrappy play.

"She got in some trouble in both of her first two matches, and really did a good job of fighting her way back in those matches," he said. "She stayed out there and fought and figured out adjustments and broke those two players down. It required a great deal of effort."

Now Pampoulova and Sedlmajerova will lead the Wildcats into a Saturday matchup with unranked SMSU, whom Bietau said could be an upstart team during this young collegiate tennis season.

"They're not (ranked), but they probably should be," Bietau said.

Roy Williams' recent harsh words toward KU's fans remains mystery

VIEWPOINT

BALMER

Has someone run off with the real Roy Williams?

I mean, seriously, what has become of the enthusiastic Kansas basketball coach who used to high-five the Allen Fieldhouse fans gleefully chanting his name before home games? This was a man who used to scowl at fans singling out rival players and who honestly believed "heck" was one of the dirtier words in the English dictionary.

In case you've been out of the loop of Big 12 basketball lately, allow me to extrapolate:

Coming off a border-war beating at the hands of Missouri last Saturday, Williams' Jayhawks responded with a nationally televised 89-74 victory against Colorado Monday night in Lawrence. Following the game, the old Roy probably would have addressed a few concerns, singled out players who stepped up, discussed the Hawks' upcoming opponent and left it at that. But not the new " Ragin' Roy."

Spewing piping hot crimson-and-blue venom, Williams ripped KU fans for a less-than-spirited effort in the stands, and he also dared the media. "I don't care how you print it, and I don't care how many fans write me letters —I'm going to throw those suckers in the trash."

Not to let his blazing tongue rest, Williams added, "If you're not going to cheer for us, keep your big butts at home."

Not since ex-Kansas City Royals manager Hal MacRae addressed a losing streak with a string of profanity and a flying telephone, have local members of the media been privy to such an outburst. But this wasn't a struggling skipper.

This was Roy Williams, an even-tempered model of class in college basketball.

This was a man who is worshiped two hours east of Manhattan and was respected amongst his coaching peers. Instead of the model citizen Kansas fans are used to, Williams gave them a model Bob Knight performance Monday evening.

The saga of "Ragin' Roy" could have ended here, but it got even stranger the following night when Williams apologized for his fan-skewering episode. In front of an unusually hostile "Hawk Talk" radio show crowd Tuesday, Williams threw himself on the mercy of the fans by explaining, "Ol' Roy has done some dumb things, and last night was one of them."

Sincere, yes. But does Williams really want to reference himself in the third person as "Ol' Roy?" If knowledge serves correct, that's the name of a brand of dog food.

Furthering the confusion, Williams said, "Sometimes you have to say you are wrong. I don't watch a lot of TV, but Fonz couldn't say he was wrong. Ol' Roy can say it. I was wrong."

For a man who possesses the highest winning percentage of active coaches, Williams probably could have used a better analogy than Henry Winkler to explain his desire to put water under the bridge.

This isolated incident will fade into the background as the season rolls on, but it remains a mystery for now. Is the pressure of 11 seasons with talent-laden teams, and no national championships starting to eat away at Williams? Have the tears of frustration Williams' sheds at what is becoming an annual KU upset in the tourney, starting to change to bitter tears of anger? Nothing can answer these questions now, but keep an eye on Roy's boys when March rolls around. His next outburst might signal a one-way ticket from Lawrence to Chapel Hill.

QUICK HIT: Tom Asbury has become a regular inhabitant in the Collegian's Reader Fourum for all the wrong the reasons, but there's something angry fans need to consider before phoning in another insult: Asbury is the lowest-paid coach in the Big 12. More so, the recruiting budget Asbury has to work with pales in comparison to the funding other conference coaches have at their disposal.

Fans who cite Asbury's lack of bringing in highly-touted players would address the situation better by complaining to athletic director Max Urick and president Jon Wefald. The two K-State power players committed money and resources to Bill Snyder when he arrived more than a decade ago, and the investment paid off. It's time to direct some of that commitment to a program that continues to distance itself from successful basketball teams of the past.

complex systems such as the Teradata system K-State is receiving.

The system is similar to what Wal-Mart uses in its everyday business operations.

"We are helping prepare tomorrow's leaders today," Berryhill said. "This is giving students the opportunity to work on a system of this size now so that they may get good hands-on experience before they enter the workforce."

Wallentine said the system will be located in Nichols Hall, but will not be installed for a few more weeks. He said one of the main benefits of receiving the equipment grant is it gives students the opportunity to train as they are learning the material in their classes.

He said lacking the equipment required to train students on the systems they will encounter after they graduate has been a problem for the university.

"Students in 10 different courses will learn how to program and manage a large, complex system," Wallentine said. "This will give them a real opportunity to work with state-of-the-art equipment."

Wallentine said the system also will serve as a computational infrastructure for the Institute for Computational Research in Engineering and Science, a research center that enables computational research in the College of Engineering. He also said the system will benefit research in the data mining and digital library areas.

Ron Trewyn, vice provost for research, said receiving the grant is an exceptional opportunity for students because it will give them the opportunity to train on more complex systems. He said this will give them post-graduation advantages in the long run.

"This is clearly one of the largest database systems in the world," Trewyn said. "For the students, it will give them the added benefit of being able to be trained and taught while in college. It will be a great asset to them in their future career goals."

Trewyn also said the university will receive some benefits from acquiring the system because it will let K-State compete at a higher level for other grants and open doors with other colleges and the private sector in the future.

"This moves K-State to the next level," Trewyn said. "We will be able to compete at a higher level in national competitions, but also be more competitive in recruiting other students to the university."

Berryhill said it was uncertain if the equipment grant program would be continued in the future. She said they will monitor the progress of the program at the various universities and evaluate students and faculty responses. At that time, a decision will be made about future grants.

INTERNS

The high school leaders were taught Senate etiquette, the proper way to speak at meetings and how to address remarks from the Senate chair.

Amy Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, is the intern coordinator who helped the senate interns organize the clinic.

"We wanted to help them learn about the legislative process in the senate and the committees," Metzinger said. "Hopefully, this will help build awareness at the high school level. We wanted to let incoming freshmen know that student government is there for them."

Every year, the Senate interns have a project they decide to work on, Metzinger said. They develop the project themselves and organize the event. The clinic for high school students was the interns' project this year.

Heidi Durflinger, freshman in open-option, is one of 25 interns who helped with the clinic.

Planning for the event began in November. The interns wanted to give ideas to high school seniors that they could take back with them to their schools, Durflinger said. The clinic she took part in would have helped in understanding the student government when she first arrived at K-State.

"We really didn't know a lot about student government when we first got here," Durflinger said. "We wanted the seniors in high school to have a better idea of student government, whether they come to K-State or not."

Although this was the first time the student interns had sponsored a student government clinic, there are hopes that next year's intern class will do it again in the future.

"K-State's student government is really organized," Roddy said. "This is really helpful for us because we can see a good stable government in operation."

CLINTON

an exam.

States could choose not to participate in the program. The National Rifle Association condemned the plan as pointless and unworkable.

"Every state in this country already requires hunters and automobile drivers to have a license. I think they ought to do the same thing for handgun purchases," Clinton said. "I hope you'll help me pass that in this Congress

Clinton called for passage of a patients' bill of rights to strengthen consumer protection, gun-safety legislation, campaign finance reform, an increase in the minimum wage and votes on long-stalled judicial nominations.

Republicans ridiculed Clinton's proposals but did not rule out working with him on such issues as education and health care.

"If we enacted all the new programs the president has talked about, we'd spend just about the entire surplus on bigger and more expensive government," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said.

Clinton was greeted by applause and handshakes by Republicans and Democrats alike. His wife, Hillary, and daughter, Chelsea, were in the audience.

His speech will go into the record books as his longest State of the Union address: 89 minutes, besting his 1995 record of 81 minutes.

Many of the proposals were repackaged from earlier years and, in some cases resubmitted with spending figures double or triple the original amount.

Clinton boasted that the nation has been lifted from economic distress, social decline and political gridlock.

"We begin the new century with over 20 million new jobs. The fastest economic growth in more than 30 years. The lowest unemployment rates in 30 years.

The lowest poverty rates in 20 years. The lowest African-American and Hispanic unemployment rates on record. The first back-to-back surpluses in 42 years."

In offering his gun licensing plan, Clinton said, "We've all seen what happens when guns fall into the wrong hands." His words recalled the tragedy of the massacre at Columbine High School.

The president boasted of the nation's upbeat times.

"Never before has our nation enjoyed, at once, so much prosperity and social progress with so little internal crisis or so few external threats," the president said. "Never before have we had such a blessed opportunity — and therefore such a profound obligation — to build the more perfect union of our founders' dreams."

Clinton's tax program includes marriage-penalty relief, tax deductions of up to $2,800 annually per family for college tuition and fees and retirement savings accounts for low- and moderate-income families. He also proposed steps to encourage charitable giving.

The president's tax package joined a mix of proposals urged by Republicans and Democrats as both sides battle for control of Congress and the White House. Smarting from Clinton's veto of their $792 billion tax-cut package last year, House Republicans are drafting their own version of educational tax breaks and marriage-penalty relief this year.

Presidential candidates have their own proposals, too.

Rep. Bill Archer, R-Texas, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, called Clinton's tax cuts too limited. "We think all Americans deserve tax relief, not just the handful the president picks," Archer said.

The president's tax package would cost $350 billion over 10 years. However, his plan envisions cutting that price tag by $100 billion by closing tax havens, shelters and loopholes. Congress previously has rejected many of those ideas on grounds they are tax increases.

There were no big foreign policy announcements, although Clinton urged Congress to give China permanent normal trading relations with the United States. He also asked for $1.6 billion for Colombia to fight narco-traffickers.

Clinton said the United States must help Russia and China become strong, prosperous democratic nations.

"Both are behind held back from reaching their full potential — Russia by the legacy of communism, economic turmoil, a cruel and self-defeating war in Chechnya; China by the illusion that it can buy stability at the expense of freedom."

The booming economy and swelling tax revenues give Clinton and Republicans a big purse for any tax reductions or spending increases. Both sides claim they are dedicated to protecting Social Security and eliminating the national debt.

Clinton also:

■ Called anew for Medicare to include a prescription drug benefit and to let people as young as 55 buy Medicare coverage — this time with a 25 -percent tax credit.

■ Proposed $1 billion in tax incentives for drug makers to develop vaccines for malaria, tuberculosis and HIV/AIDS.

■ Called for doubling spending for after-school and summer school programs and to expand the Head Start program for needy children to cover 950,000 kids.

■ Offered tax breaks for college costing $30 billion over 10 years.

■ Expanded the earned income tax credit for the working poor by $21 billion, and offered a tax credit for long-term care costing $27 billion.

■ Proposed a 10-year, $110 billion proposal to provide health coverage to the parents of children protected by the state Children's Health Insurance Program. If approved, it would be the largest increase in health coverage in 35 years.

UNEXPECTED

Unlikely teams to compete in unlikely Super Bowl

See page 10 for sports columns

BY DAVE GOLDBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

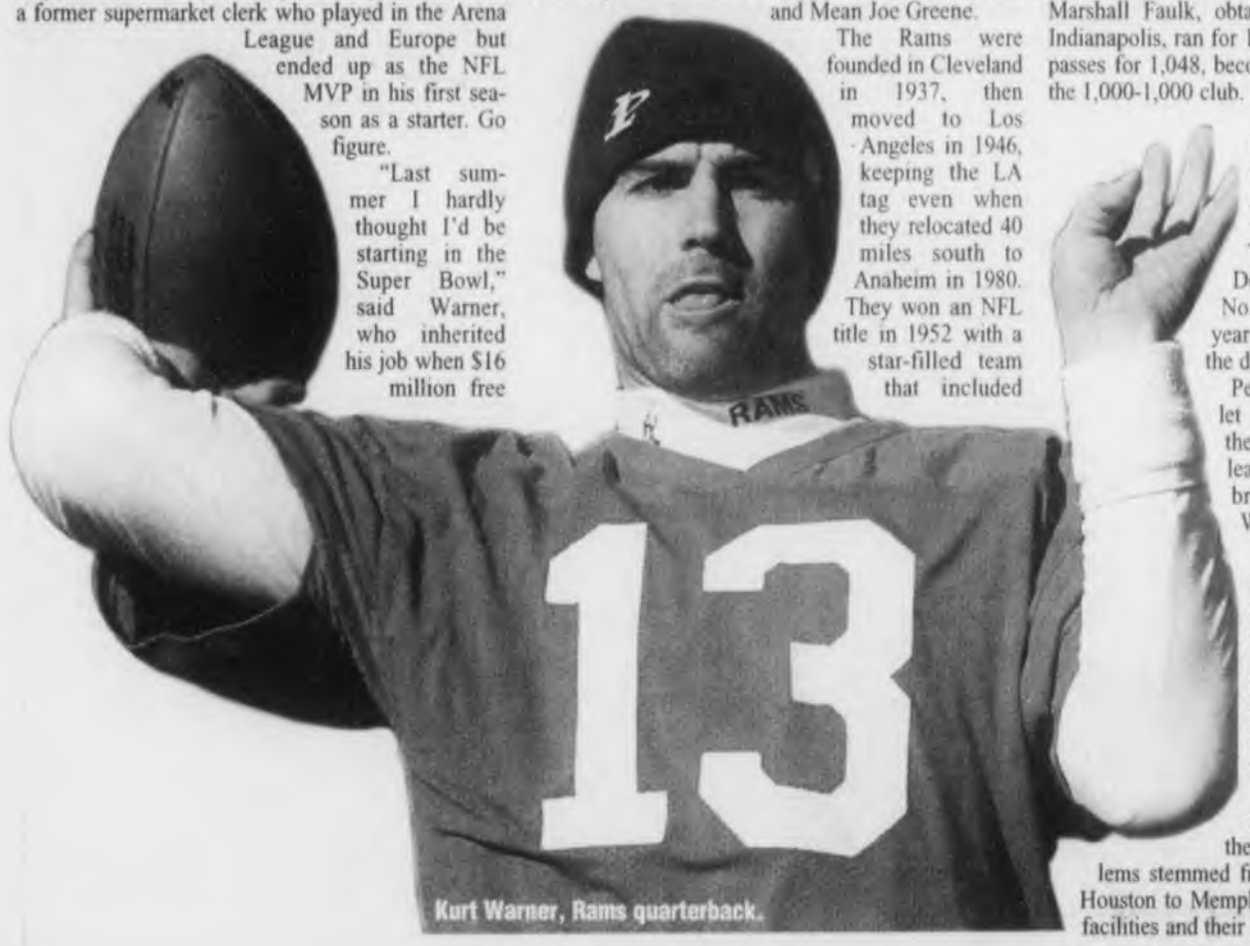
ATLANTA — This sure ain't your normal Super Bowl — no Cowboys, no Broncos, no Packers, no 49ers.

Just the Tennessee Titans and the St. Louis Rams, teams with shallow roots and little tradition in a matchup that no one envisioned five months ago. Heck, they were a combined 12-20 in 1998.

The Titans were the Tennessee Oilers last year and the Houston Oilers before that. They've played in three different cities and four different stadiums the past four years, finishing 8-8 in three of them.

The Rams were in Los Angeles until 1995, when they moved to St. Louis. They're led by Kurt Warner, a former supermarket clerk who played in the Arena League and Europe but ended up as the NFL MVP in his first season as a starter. Go figure.

"Last summer I hardly thought I'd be starting in the Super Bowl," said Warner, who inherited his job when $16 million free agent Trent Green wrecked his knee in the preseason.



"I was questioning whether I was capable of being a backup. I was just hoping that I would get an opportunity and show people what I could do."

That's what both teams did to earn a trip to Atlanta for a frigid Super Bowl week in which they were forced to practice for an indoor game on freezing outdoor fields.

On Sunday, they will play for a national audience largely unaware of their existence while they toiled in mediocrity and worse.

Both teams have done wonders for their history.

The Titans were founded as the Oilers in 1960 as a charter member of the old AFL. They won the first AFL crown, but the closest they came to a championship after that was in 1978 and 1979, when Earl Campbell led them to AFC title games against the Pittsburgh Steelers of Terry Bradshaw, Lynn Swan and Mean Joe Greene.

Kurt Warner, Rams quarterback.

The Rams were founded in Cleveland in 1937, then moved to Los Angeles in 1946, keeping the LA tag even when they relocated 40 miles south to Anaheim in 1980. They won an NFL title in 1952 with a star-filled team that included the likes of Bob Waterfield, Norm Van Brocklin, Tom Fears, Elroy Hirsch, Tank Younger and Deacon Dan Towler.

They reached the Super Bowl in the 1979 season with a defense led by Jack Youngblood and Hacksaw Reynolds and lost in the NFC title game in 1989. That was their last winning season until they finished 13-3 this year under Dick Vermeil, who returned from 14 years in a broadcast booth in 1997 and went 9-23 his first two seasons.

They had the NFL's best offense, scoring 526 points, about 33 a game, the third-most ever. They were 8-0 at home and outscored opponents by an average of 25 points.

Warner threw 41 touchdown passes to join Dan Marino as the only quarterbacks to throw 40 or more. Marshall Faulk, obtained in a trade with Indianapolis, ran for 1,381 yards and caught 87 passes for 1,048, becoming just the second player in the 1,000-1,000 club.

The other main additions to 1998's 4-12 team were two free agents, guard Adam Timmerman and linebacker Todd Collins.

Defensive end Kevin Carter, the No. 1 pick in 1995, and second-year linebacker London Fletcher led the defense.

Perhaps most important, Vermeil let up on the Rams after working them as hard as any team in the league in his first two seasons, and brought in Mike Martz from Washington to run the offense.

"All the hard work we put in last year led to what we did this year," said defensive tackle D'Marco Farr, one of five Rams left from the team that moved from Los Angeles after the 1994 season. "We were a lot closer last year than most people thought."

The Titans weren't as big a surprise. Football people knew they had talent and that their problems stemmed from their nomadic course from Houston to Memphis to Nashville, the changes in facilities and their lack of a home field..

Bars offer reduced drink prices, free prizes all day

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If spending Super Bowl Sunday in an armchair with a bag of chips doesn't sound appealing, the drinking establishments of Aggieville can provide specials for football fans.

Mike Trout, co-owner of four Aggieville bars, said he is planning on plenty of deals for his businesses.

At the semester-old Joe's Tap Room, patrons will receive free chips and salsa during the game and can take advantage of 10-cent wings and $1 bottles. Prizes will also be distributed throughout the day.

"It's kind of like our grand opening all over again," Trout said. "We've got so many T-shirts and prizes, everybody should get something."

Margaritas will be on special at Porter's, with free Jose Cuervo T-shirts for customers.

"There's a big party at Porter's," Trout said. "We've also got people from one of the wine companies coming out with free samples."

Rowdy Trouty's will pass out T-shirts as part of its Super Bowl Sunday celebration, Trout said, and bottle beers will be on sale for the entire day.

Trout's fourth bar, O'Malley's Alley, also has a deal for the stingiest of bar-goers.

"Just come on in and enjoy plenty of free peanuts," Trout said.

Pat's Blue Rib'n will have specials on Sunday that will allow football fans to party in Aggieville with friends or host a party of their own.

"We've got two platters for carry-out," manager Chris Downs said. "One serves 10-12 people, with a pound each of beef, ham, and pork, a slab of ribs and a whole chicken for $42.95. The other platter serves 20-24 people, with two pounds each of beef, ham, pork, and a double order of ribs and two whole chickens for $84.95."

Pat's will run a Super Bowl special for those that stick around the bar, Downs said. For $4.50, dinner and a drink is taken care of by a turkey leg and a domestic bottle.

Burgers and beer aren't the only things on sale at Scoreboard, manager D.J. Bruce said.

"We're going to have $1.50 burgers, $1.25 Busch Light bottles, and $2 screwdrivers and bloody marys," he said.

'Let the Hustlers Play' to open 5-city tour at Manhattan Arts Center on Saturday

Master P described the group as St. Louis' best-kept secret.

DCR Records Inc. and Alliance Music Group are joining to bring the "Let the Hustlers Play" tour to the Manhattan Arts Center at 8 p.m. Saturday. The beginning of the 5-city tour will feature Family Tiez, a rap group from the St. Louis area.

Following the Manhattan show, the tour will make stops in Columbia, Mo.; St. Louis; Chicago, and end the tour in Cincinnati.

Deandrea Robinson, DCR Records promoter and tour organizer, said the show will bring a mix of hip-hop and rap to Manhattan.

"The show will have a hip-hop type feel," he said. "We're trying to bring more of the hip-hop and rap community to the Manhattan area."

Robinson said the show will be a mixture of singing, rapping and comedy. Black and Mild, a comedian traveling with Family Tiez, will be part of the opening act, as will SES, a new rap group from the Kansas City area.

MORE INFO? Tickets for the show are available in advance at Streetside Records or Manhattan Arts Center for $12. Tickets also will be available at the door for $15.

SES will be playing tits first concert as part of this show. Robinson said it will give DCR Records a better idea of what the group can do.

"It is a trial run," he said. "We are going to use this to see if we want to sign them on."

Ebonie Baker, sophomore in business administration, will sing as part of the opening act. Robinson said this will add more diversity to the show.

"We decided to bring a mix so it would be a universal event," Robinson said. "People can come hear music and get a laugh at the same time."

Baker said the show will be good for Manhattan. She said it will be a change of pace from the Aggieville club scene.

"It will be well worth the money," she said. "It's something besides Aggieville, so people should get out of their rooms and come to the show."

Mack Dennis, executive producer of Ghetto Records, said Family Tiez mixes a variety of aspects to bring the sounds of Midwest rap together.

"What we're going to bring to the table is originality, soul and lyrics," he said. "Family Tiez delivers with a hypnotizing beat and bass lines."

Family Tiez appears on the "Rappers to Riches" compilation CD with Master P, E-40, Too Short and Dayton Family.

The group was the opening act for a 7-show summer tour with Master P.

Dennis said Family Tiez will be playing new material from their upcoming CDs, "Dawn of a Dynasty" and "Still Hustlin'," at the Manhattan concert. He said the first CD will be released later this spring, and the second this summer.

"You can expect a spring and summer full of Family Tiez," Dennis said.

Robinson said the group's sound could be compared to 2Pac. He said their rap is a unique mixture of several styles.

"It has a smooth R&B beat with kind of hard lyrics, but not too hard," he said. "It's a mixture of East Coast, West Coast and the South."

Family Tiez will be at Streetside Records at 1 p.m. Saturday for an autograph-signing session. Robinson said he encourages students to go meet the group and get tickets for the concert.

"It will be a good chance to meet the members of the group," he said. "While you're at Streetside, you can get your tickets too."

Robinson said he expects the concert to be a success. He said from what he has heard on the street, people are excited about an event of this kind.

"If people come to the show, I guarantee they'll have a good time," Robinson said. "I got positive feedback when I went out to promote it."

Dennis said the concert will be a good time for K-State students.

"K-State is going to be entertained, that's for sure," he said. "We've done a lot of things in the Midwest, and it's time to take it on the road."

Local artists' exhibition opens today

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Valentine's Day is just around the corner, and finding different means of expression is on the minds of many. For local artists, expressing themselves is not done through talking, but through their art.

At 5 p.m. today, the Strecker-Nelson Gallery will open the doors to its exhibition, "Art From The Heart."

The debut show will feature the work of 11 artists.

"Most of the artists are local or have ties to K-State," Jay Nelson, co-owner of the gallery, said. "We have familiar people, but are also introducing new people."

The artists involved use a variety of media-ranging from photography to ceramics to painting.

"There's all kinds of mediums," Deborah Burtnett, gallery manager, said. "It's a variety."

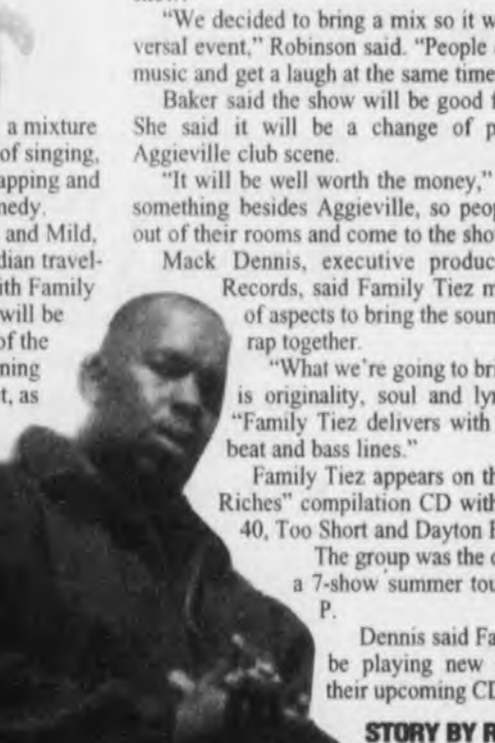
Clive Fullagar, associate professor of psychology, will be featured in the gallery for the first time.

Fullagar creates his pieces by using a combination of photography and colored pencil or watercolor to portray landscape from surrounding areas.

"What I'm trying to do is get people to look at the relationship between art and photography," Fullagar said. "Many people try and make paintings look like photographs. I try to take a photograph and move it towards looking like a painting."

Fullagar said being an artist is a significant part of his life.

"It's a very important part of me," he said. "It enables me to express a different side of my nature. I find that my art makes me look at the land and people in a way I probably wouldn't do if I weren't an artist."



Many other media will be on display and on sale.

Deb Flower, a Junction City artist, will be showing various pieces of jewelry ranging in price from $95 to $2,000.

"They are very small, delicate pieces," Burtnett said.

The pieces are made of gold and silver and contain precious and semi-precious stones.

Harriette Janke will have a number of wall hangings and quilts on display.

CAPITOL VI & MY TALISMAN FOR KEPRO LUCTION/ STEPHANIE MUÑOZ-O'NEIL

"She is a well-known local quilter," Nelson said.

Artist Sally Johnson of Lindsborg, Kan., uses egg tempera to create pieces that primarily represent England. Egg tempera is a high-class tempera mixed with egg yolk, which Nelson said gives the painting a glowing effect.

Nelson said these and other local artists have created a statement within the art scene in Manhattan.

"There is an active art scene in Manhattan because all of these people are local artists," Nelson said. "We don't feel you have to go to the East or West Coast to find that there is great art."

The opening reception is free and open to the public. Wine, punch and refreshments will be available to those in attendance.

Kaleidoscope Films brings art-house films to campus

BY REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Forum Hall will be transformed into the Manhattan arts theater for nine films this semester.

"Bridge on the River Kwai" is the first in a series of nine movies to be shown as part of the Union Program Council Kaleidoscope Films Committee's spring schedule. A classic historical film about a group of British prisoners of war who build a bridge for the Japanese, "Bridge on the River Kwai" was an award-winning film in 1957.

Tyler Adams, sophomore in marketing and committee chairman, said the purpose of the art-film series is to add diversity to the movies offered for students.

"Kaleidoscope tries to show more arts films," he said. "It's just to bring more diverse entertainment to town. We try to find stuff that wouldn't normally be found in Manhattan."

Ryan Caviglia, sophomore in geography, said the spring series will offer a variety of art films. He said the films are probably movies students know about, including a selection of comedy, drama and foreign films.

"This semester's series will appeal to a wide range of students," Caviglia said. "They are not the average, run-of-the-mill films. They are films students have heard of."

Caviglia said he thinks the Kaleidoscope series is a good thing for Manhattan and K-State.

"It's like an artistic service to the community, especially the campus," he said. "Us showing art films adds enlightenment to the community."

Finding movies that are different from the new releases in other Manhattan theaters is the goal of Kaleidoscope organizers, Adams said.

"We try to find stuff that wouldn't normally be found in Manhattan," Adams said.

"Bridge on the River Kwai" will be shown at 7 p.m. tonight and Saturday. The movie will be shown at Forum Hall with an admission of $1.75.

Vermeil's little lost Rams out of place in Super Bowl; Titans deserve victory

VIEWPOINT

JOE BALMER

Somewhere, at this moment, Dick Vermeil is crying.

That's not a bad thing. Vermeil's compassion and honest concern for his players is a rare trait in the NFL these days. Witnessing Vermeil's ascension from downtrodden coach of the St. Louis Rams to architect of a championship-caliber team has captured the media and fans for all the right reasons. The Rams' seventh-year coach has proven that nice guys can finish first.

For that reason amongst others, Vermeil and the Rams have been miscast as the symbol of perseverance in Super Bowl XXXIV. This distinction justly belongs to the team on the other sideline, the Tennessee Titans.

Vermeil's tears might capture the fans' sentimental vote, but no franchise has endured more hardship and tribulation heading into the 21st century than the former Houston Oilers.

Think about it. When owner Bud Adams decided to move the franchise, the team still had to finish out the 1996 season before a less-than-enthusiastic Houston Astrodome. As attendance dwindled, the "House of Pain" quickly became the "House of Lame" as the Oilers finished 8-8 and wrapped up a chapter in Houston with a 21-13 loss to Cincinnati in front of 15,131 fans.

One would think the Titans' ruins-to-riches story would dominate the media-centric week preceding Super Bowl XXXIV, but St. Louis has swept up America with its brand of high-octane offense and tear-happy coach.

The Oilers' transition to Tennessee in 1997 wasn't greeted with red carpet and champagne wishes, either. Without a permanent home due to the ongoing construction of Adelphia Stadium in Nashville, head coach Jeff Fisher's troops opened their assault on new soil in Memphis to the roar of 30,171 Liberty Bowl fans, a good crowd by University of Memphis standards, but far from healthy NFL attendance figures.

You see, Memphis isn't exactly a stone's throw from Music City. Imagine K-State's home football games being held at Arrowhead Stadium and you've got a comparative distance. The NFL's gypsies grinded out another 8-8 record through what equated to a 16-game road trip as frustration continued to build.

The 1998 season moved the Oilers closer to home, but a permanent stadium still eluded Tennessee. As Adelphia Stadium continued to rise in the background, the team adjusted to life as a glorified college program, entertaining visitors at Vanderbilt Stadium, where capacity never rose above 42,000. A third consecutive 8-8 season followed.

More than anything, the creation of the Tennessee Titans in 1999 included a lot more than a name change and spiffy new uniforms — namely, two years of preseason play on the road and a lot of doubt concerning Fisher's future with the franchise and the team's true identity.

Running back Eddie George and quarterback Steve McNair showed flashes of promise, but Tennessee remained the Bermuda Triangle of the NFL. End up there and you might never find your way out.

Then, all the anguish endured was ceremoniously removed before the 1999 season with the removal of Tennessee's personal scarlet letter. The derrick that had embodied the sting of the past was cast into the fire for a symbol more in tune with the Music City. Although the Titans' "flaming T" logo might take a lot of flack from media and fashion experts across the land, it represents more than haute couture. Simply put, these are not the powder-

Rams' heart, childlike play inspire memories of school-recess football

VIEWPOINT

NICK BRATKOVIC

It's hard not to like Dick Vermeil's St. Louis Rams.

There are a thousand different reasons to watch and cheer for them. The first is that they play the game in a fun way.

The Rams have played a game more akin to two-hand touch this season, an "everybody go deep and we'll see what happens" brand of football we all loved to play growing up.

A buddy and I perfected the game in fifth-grade recess by igniting for four touchdowns in a single period. Watching the Rams air it out every week conjures up those elementary school memories.

The Rams are an exciting team led by quarterback and NFL Most Valuable Player Kurt Warner, who just happens to be a former arena league quarterback.

Warner recently was r named the Miller Light Player of the Year, and during the season he threw 41 touchdown passes.

This is a real-life story of a player who refused to give up on a dream, and it seems to get better every Sunday. They just chuck it and go.

Heart is the quality that I like the most about the Rams, and they have a ton of it ... let's just hope they enjoy the dance as much as they do the preparation.

This approach really opens the running lanes for Marshall Faulk, the team's leading rusher. Faulk has developed into a great runner, and one of the games best running backs. He is a player who has been reborn in St. Louis.

The Rams, with Faulk running the ball and Warner dropping back in the pocket, have helped Vermeil develop one of the NFL's most prolific offenses. More importantly, a refreshing offense, the kind you don't often see as a Chiefs fan.

Maybe I am used to watching the Kansas City Chiefs play football every week. I am used to the ball control offense and the tough defense, the style of football that is good for a team without a dominant running back, without a quarterback who can win a game with his arm consistently.

The Chiefs run the ball hard, throw when needed, hit hard, strip the ball, and tackle harder (if you omit the Oakland Raider game) than anyone else. It is a simple formula that has packed Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City for more than a decade.

But watching the St. Louis Rams play this postseason is like going to a foreign country. The Trans World Dome in St. Louis is as far as you can get from Arrowhead in atmosphere and environment. It would be like living your whole life in Kansas, and then traveling to Italy.

The two are worlds apart. Just like it would be fun to visit Italy, it will be fun to be a Rams fan for a week. Then I'll go back to being a Chiefs fan. I hear Italy sucks after a week, too.

So become Rams for a week, but please don't be the guy who wears a Rams shirt to class on Monday. Trust me, you don't want to be that guy. It's like wearing your letter jacket after high school. It's absurd.

Cheer for the Rams because Vermeil is another great story.

He has coached in the "Big Show" before. You also have to jump on the Rams bandwagon for the weekend because of who Vermeil is, and how he approaches his job.

He left the Philadelphia Eagles due to burn out in 1982 after guiding the team to Super Bowl XV in 1980.

His team was quite different than the one he coaches today. Those were the Eagles, a team that was built on toughness and good defense. Vermeil was the definition of a workaholic, and he loved it. Then he burned out. It just got old for him.

Now he is a new-and-improved coach who enjoys what he is doing. He isn't quite Bobby Bowden yet. I doubt he will be conducting interviews while his team runs a flea flicker, but then he isn't exactly Bill Snyder, either.

He has changed, and he is mellower than he once was. He is also very emotional. Vermeil is a man who doesn't care if the public sees him cry either tears of joy, or droplets of pain.

The passion he illustrates on the sidelines and in interviews is phenomenal. You get the feeling you truly know Vermeil.

Connecting with Vermeil is easy. Maybe I am just stupid like that, but if I am a fan paying big bucks for a seat, an order of chili-cheese nachos and a glass of stale beer, I want a coach with a heart.

Heart is the quality that I like the most about the Rams, and they have a ton of it. Now the Rams are two games away from playing on the world's biggest stage, and let's just hope they enjoy the dance as much as they do the preparation.

Let's hope all the Rams great stories and offensive prowess translate into a victory.

Honestly, I don't know if heart wins championships, or if when the two teams embark on 60 minutes of play, that will translate into a Rams victory, but let's hope it does. Just leave your Rams attire at home on Monday.

blue boys of Houston anymore.

Never has such a simple makeover resulted in a reversal of fortune like the Titans. Under the steady guidance of Fisher, Tennessee rolled to a 13-3 mark in the AFC Central, a record that included two triumphs against Jacksonville, the Jaguars' only losses this season. The Titans' postseason run included one of the best playoff games ever, the infamous "Miracle in Music City" win against Buffalo (Note to all Bills' fans: The lateral was legit), and a third victory against the mighty Jags to earn a ticket to the Georgia Dome.

One would think the Titans' ruins-to-riches story would dominate the media-centric week preceding Super Bowl XXXIV, but St. Louis has swept up America with its brand of high-octane offense and tear-happy coach.

Don't get me wrong. Vermeil has just as much scar tissue to bear as anybody. This is the man who believed with all his heart that Lawrence Phillips was a good kid. A Rams' victory Sunday evening would complete one of the best Cinderella stories of all time. Sports aficionados live for this kind of thing.

Still, the question of perseverance is an open and shut case. When it comes to horror stories and trials and tribulations, the hardest path tread to Atlanta runs through Nashville.

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.
1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income
The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.
First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with over $7,000 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.
Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $1,500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.
Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,600 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call: 539-7243

Legislators review beer-registration bills

By TIM RICHARDSON
The Associated Press

MANHATTAN — Nick Stanberry had a party in his apartment in mid-November. He brought in a beer keg.

But the K-State sophomore now says he might think twice before his next party — at least if some members of the Legislature get their way.

Bills reviewed by legislators Thursday would require retail stores to place an identification number on any container of beer with four gallons or more. A record that includes the buyer, date of purchase, address and keg identification number would have to remain on file for six months.

Police then could use that information to catch underage buyers and perhaps hold retailers responsible for selling to underage drinkers.

"I think it's good to get underage people not to drink," Stanberry said. "But the liquor stores are doing all they should have to do right now."

The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee and its House counterpart had hearings on separate beer keg registration bills.

The city of Emporia began requiring keg registrations last year, as did Lyon County. Chase, Coffey, Marion and Morris counties also have registration requirements.

"The registration of beer kegs does not present a cure-all," Jim Barnett, an Emporia physician, told the Senate committee. "It's just one small step."

Randy Rogers, who spoke for the Kansas Sheriffs Association, said without a state law, beer kegs could be purchased in neighboring counties where keg identification is not required.

"This will deter and serve as an investigative tool," he said.

Opponents of the bill said it would hurt small liquor retailers and give police too much power.

Response to the legislation is mixed among liquor store and tavern owners, as well as students on the campuses of K-State and the University of Kansas.

Bill McCarthy, manager of Candlewood Retail Liquor in Manhattan, said current laws are effective.

McCarthy said the proposed bills would allow government to impose on small businesses and force liquor retailers to become law-enforcement agents.

"I don't feel like we are the police," he said. "I don't feel like we should be the ones enforcing part of the program."

The bills would require that the information be available for law enforcement inspection. Retailers in violation of the legislation would receive a five-day liquor license suspension.

McCarthy said the bill would change buying habits at liquor retailers and that students would purchase untraceable forms of alcohol, such as bottled beer.

He said the bills could increase profits for liquor retailers because it would reduce expenses associated with kegs.

"It will make them buy case beer or something we can't track," he said. "These kids aren't stupid. They will beat the system one way or another."

At Fatso's Bar and Grill in downtown Lawrence, manager Chad Trease said the proposed changes are a good idea, "if it's going to keep minors from drinking."

But he added: "But why can't you just buy a case? You could get a lot of bottled beer, and what's the difference? If they want to get around it, there'll be ways."

At Myers Retail Liquor in Lawrence, owner Jim Myers said he always writes down driver's license numbers and birth dates of keg purchasers. He is not concerned about one of the bills passing.

"We always want to make sure the keg didn't end up in the wrong place," he said.

The following counties have beer registration requirements:

- Lyon County
- Chase
- Coffey
- Marion
- Morris

The requirements for retail stores include placing an identification number on any container of beer with four gallons or more.

The registration record remains on file for six months and includes:

job because we weren't taking positive steps forward," Patterson said. "We were sort of stuck where we were at."

Against Nebraska on Sunday, the Cats possibly could field another different starting lineup. Patterson said for the remainder of the season, their starting lineup would be dictated by the two or three days' preparation leading up to the game.

When the Huskers travel to Manhattan, the Cats will see more difficult matchups caused by Nebraska's aggressive play.

"I really don't think there is a more aggressive team in the league than Nebraska," Patterson said. "There is no one that will knock you on the floor as frequently and as hard and with as much consistency as the Nebraska team."

Nebraska is led by two talented guards. Senior guard Nicole Kubik is second in the Big 12 in steals and assists, and is sixth in scoring, with a 15.6 points-per-game average. Senior Brooke Schwartz averages 13.9 points per game.

Nebraska's size presents matchup problems for the Cats, Patterson said.

"I think the key question is who are we going to put on Kubik," she said. "And who are we going to put April on when she's in the game, again, because of that size mismatch."

"Somebody like SMS — who is going to have a pretty good team here, but weren't in the rankings before — they usually get overlooked, just because nobody knows them."

Saturday will be SMSU's season opener, which Bietau said will make it more difficult for his squad to assess the competition before it steps onto the court.

"It's a typical first matchup kind of thing, where you really don't know," he said. "I've heard some good things about the new players they have. My sense is that they're a dangerous team.

"Our concern is more with how we're playing. I feel like if we do a good job of taking care of our own business, we'll be able to recognize and adapt to anything special that we see out of them."

Merck research narrows search for better AIDS drugs

By LAURAN NEERGAARD
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Scientists have become increasingly frustrated in the hunt for novel ways to attack the AIDS virus, but now they're getting some encouraging news: Drug giant Merck & Co. has mapped the way toward a long-elusive target.

It will take years of additional research to turn the finding into a usable medication, experts said.

But the research gives scientists another — and long-awaited — place to aim at in fighting HIV, important as today's AIDS drugs slowly lose their edge with few options in sight.

It's called integrase, an enzyme carried by the AIDS virus that causes a crucial step in HIV infection: It melds HIV's genetic material with the patient's own DNA inside their cells, essentially hijacking cells. Only then can HIV begin reproducing at its infamously furious rate.

Scientists long have known about integrase's crucial function and tried to create integrase-inhibiting drugs to block its effect, much like the popular AIDS-fighting protease inhibitors block the action of a different HIV enzyme called protease.

Attempts to create integrase inhibitors have failed so far.

Merck's advance, reported in today's edition of the journal Science, was to uncover the exact spot in the enzyme's action that must be blocked for an integrase inhibitor to work.

Merck researchers screened 250,000 samples in the company's library of chemicals and found two compounds known as "diketo acids" that hit that spot. In laboratory tests, the compounds successfully inhibited integrase and fought HIV.

In an unusual move, Merck executives refused to allow the lead scientist — Daria Hazuda — to discuss her discovery with reporters.

But a Merck spokesman said the compounds described in Science have certain problems that prevent them from being pursued as drugs, so the company is hunting better candidates.

Other AIDS researchers welcomed the news.

"It's opened up a third target, a target everyone knew was out there but ... that no one's been able to hit," said Cornell University's Dr. Jeffrey Laurence, senior scientist for the American Foundation for AIDS Research. "It's nice to know it's doable."

"They have now developed methodology, which is a critical step in developing drugs against this target," added Dr. Douglas Richman of the University of California, San Diego. "It's very exciting."

Doctors today have two ways to attack HIV: Drugs like AZT and ddI block an enzyme called reverse transcriptase that is vital to early HIV infection, while protease inhibitors work at one of the latest stages of HIV replication.

Recent agreement to bring U.S., China relations back to normal

By ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States and China have agreed to resume normal military ties, Defense Secretary William Cohen said Thursday after two days of meetings at the Pentagon between U.S. and Chinese officials.

China broke off military relations with the United States last May after the mistaken U.S. bombing of its embassy in Yugoslavia. Relations also are strained over disagreements on Taiwan and U.S. missile defense projects.

"I think we are on track to getting military-to-military relations back at a normal state of affairs," Cohen told reporters during a photo-taking session in his office with British Defense Minister Geoffrey Hoon.

Cohen said he had a cordial meeting Wednesday with People's Liberation Army Lt. Gen. Xiong Guangkai, and that the Chinese officer extended an invitation for Cohen to go to Beijing. Cohen had to cancel a visit last year after the outbreak of NATO's air war against Yugoslavia. He last visited China in January, 1998.

"I was, in fact, invited to return to China," Cohen said. "I indicated that I would do so at a mutually convenient time." He was not more specific, but aides have said they believe Cohen might go to China around April.

A former head of military intelligence, Xiong is deputy chief of the general staff of the People's Liberation Army. He is one of China's most influential generals and is known for hard-line views on the United States. He is a member of the ruling Communist Party's committee that sets policy toward Taiwan.

Need Better Grades?
I know what it is like to struggle in college. I flunked out of college three times due to excessive partying and my goal to earn a college degree seemed hopeless. Then I committed my life to Jesus Christ and I became a new person. I went back to college and graduated with honors. You are invited to visit Word of Faith Family Church any Sunday morning at 10:00 a.m. We currently meet at the Ramada Plaza Hotel Ballroom at 17th and Anderson. HISTORY UNDERCOVER

'YOU THINK KIDS WERE INVOLVED IN THE UNDERGROUND RAILROAD? YOU BETTER BELIEVE IT.' — RICHARD PITTS

A mock presentation was performed by the Wonder Workshop's Underground Railroad tour Saturday night to show how life was for slaves and conductors on the historical Underground Railroad. Richard Pitts, co-founder of the Manhattan based Wonder Workshop, played the part of a scared slave searching for freedom.

Wonder Workshop re-enacts Underground Railroad

Richard Pitts, co-founder of the Manhattan based Wonder Workshop, didn't look as if he were giving a tour and he sure didn't look like he was teaching children lessons about the history of the Underground Railroad. No, Pitts looked like he was actually on the Underground Railroad.

Dressed in rags and running from Rebel soldiers, Pitts played the part of a scared slave searching for freedom.

Pitts and Civil War re-enactors acted in a mock presentation during the Wonder Workshop's Underground Railroad tour Saturday night to show children how life was for slaves and conductors on the historical Underground Railroad.

"There's no way we can experience how it was," Pitts said. "It's hard to get information about the Underground Railroad, because it was so secret. We have to set it up to show exactly how hard it was. The slaves were reduced to animals, not people."

Fifteen children and eight adults embarked on the four-hour tour visiting four sites that were an instrumental part of the historical railroad in the area.

The Wonder Workshop, an interactive children's museum that has after-school programs in three locations teaching more than 250 grade school children, has organized 20 Underground Railroad tours in three years.

Richard Pitts, co-founder of the Manhattan-based Wonder Workshop, explains how the Beecher Bible and Rifle Church, located in Wabaunsee, played a role as one of the stops on the Underground Railroad.

Pitts began the tour in 1997, but did not give any tours in 1999 before bringing it back this year.

Rams top Titans by 1 yard, 23-16

By DAVE GOLDBERG
The Associated Press

ATLANTA — The St. Louis Rams rediscovered their offensive firepower just in time, and the Tennessee Titans came up just 1 yard short.

Kurt Warner's 73-yard touchdown pass to Isaac Bruce with 1:54 left gave the Rams their first Super Bowl win Sunday, 23-16.

The TD capped an improbable turnaround for St. Louis, which was 3-13 a year ago and 13-3 this season as it scored 526 points, third best in NFL history.

But Steve McNair and Eddie George almost led Tennessee to another miracle finish, rallying them from a 16-0 deficit.

On the game's final play with six seconds left, McNair's pass was caught by Kevin Dyson at the Rams' 5. He scrambled for the end zone only to be stopped just short by Mike Jones, as Dyson's outstretched arm held the ball toward the goal line in vain.

"I always believed in myself, and had a whole bunch of people who believed in me," said Warner, the Super Bowl MVP who did a victory lap around the Georgia Dome. "We're the world champions! How about the Rams!"

Warner, a former Arena League and NFL Europe quarterback, finished 24-of-45 for 414 yards and two touchdowns.

The Rams dominated for much of the game but had to settle for three field goals to take a 9-0 lead before finally scoring a touchdown.

St. Louis seemed to have put the game away when Warner threw a 9-yard pass to Torry Holt with 3:59 left in the third quarter to take a 16-0 lead.

Delts face possible hazing allegations

By JOSEPH HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

The Delta Tau Delta fraternity faces allegations of violating the Greek Affairs anti-hazing policy.

In a statement released Friday, Interfraternity Council President Mike Goodpasture said the IFC Board of Directors had received an informal complaint against the fraternity. A formal hearing is scheduled for 4 p.m. Feb. 11 in the K-State Student Union Director's Conference Room.

Goodpasture declined to release specific information about the alleged incident in order to maintain the integrity of the case.

Delt President Jeff McKasson said the Delts were compiling their defense now, in preparation for the case.

"We are conducting an internal investigation right now," McKasson said. "I'm just trying to work this out internally, then deal with it when it comes to trial."

According to the K-State Greek Affairs anti-hazing policy, hazing is "any instance of physical abuse, psychological abuse or improper obligations, requirements or time restrictions associated with or involving new members or their activities."

McKasson said the preparation was moving along well, but declined to comment further on the investigation. He said the Delts are a haze-free environment, but declined to make any further statements about their stance on the issue.

In a separate incident on Dec. 11, 1998, a Delt freshman, Cliff Lang, fell over a balcony railing at the house, resulting in a fractured skull and bleeding on his brain. Greek Affairs' adviser Barb Robel declined to conduct an investigation into the incident after talking to Adam Nigg, the fraternity president at the time.

Nigg said alcohol played a part in the accident, but he said the party was within IFC rules. He said Lang did consume some alcohol at the Delt house, but in his own room and not at

Student financial-aid rates not keeping up with increased tuition

Classes could be eliminated due to recent budget cuts

By TIM RICHARDSON
The Associated Press

Administrators at K-State are wondering whether they will have to scrap some class sections because of budget cuts.

Deans of the university's nine colleges have warned department heads to roll back spending, and Provost James Coffman said K-State will rank the importance of its class offerings if it has to eliminate sections of some courses. Coffman is uncertain what courses could be affected.

"We knew there was a likelihood last fall," he said. "We had a contingency plan, and we believe we have the basics in place to get through this in the most effective way possible."

When the Legislature approved cuts in the current state budget, it trimmed $2.2 million from K-State's budget.

The picture is better for the state's 2001 budget year, which begins July 1. Gov. Bill Graves proposed $21.2 million in extra spending for the higher education system, including enough money to give university faculty average pay raises of 5.9 percent.

"We are going to get to 2001 and get through 2000," said Sue Peterson, assistant to K-State President Jon Wefald. "It won't be

Sen. Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, is concerned with the fate of higher education in Kansas.

Hensley, Senate minority leader, along with other Kansas legislators, voiced some of these concerns Friday regarding the recent tuition increases passed by the Kansas Board of Regents.

In response to a budget shortfall, the regents voted unanimously in December to increase tuition $3.20 per credit hour at K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University. This was in addition to an increase passed seven months earlier of 2.5 percent per credit hour for all six regents' universities.

These increases do not include the $1 per-credit-hour increase that will go toward funding Hale Library.

Some are worried that rising tuition rates coupled with a comparatively small amount of financial aid available will hurt lower and middle-class families.

"Student aid has not kept up with the tuition rates," Hensley said. "My concern is — are we in fact pricing students out of a regents education?"

Family income also lags behind tuition increases, Sen. Janis Lee, D-Kensington, said. In the past six years, tuition has increased by 33 percent. In the 1990s, upper-class families in Kansas saw income increases of about 15 percent, while the income of middle-class families rose two percent. Income of lower-class families remained unchanged in the last decade. These numbers present an alarming trend that should be confronted in order to preserve a quality educational system in Kansas, said Lee, Senate assistant minority leader.

To maintain that quality education, the regents felt it necessary to raise tuition twice in half a year, Bill Docking, regents chairman of the board, said.

After learning of the 1-percent across-the-board budget cut issued by Gov. Bill Graves late last year, the regents became aware of the economic woes facing the state and had no choice but to abruptly act on them, Docking said.

K-State Student Body President Jason Heinrich and K-State-Salina President Jon Watkins both attended a meeting at the Statehouse on Friday regarding the recent tuition increases passed by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Student leaders said they felt shut out of the decision and they were not given an equal voice in the matter. Student Body President Jason

Peace meetings between Israel, Palestine positive

DAVOS, Switzerland — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, in Switzerland for an economic conference, sponsored meetings Sunday to promote peace between Israel and the Palestinians. Afterward, she told conference delegates the process is as difficult as slogging through the Alpine snow.

Albright met in a ski resort with Egypt's foreign minister, Amr Moussa, and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak talked in Cairo to President Hosni Mubarak.

Albright also met with Barak's negotiating partner, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Nabil Shaath, the Palestinian planning minister, said the Albright-Arafat meeting was very positive.

"There is a feeling that the United States is really continuing to be engaged to push the process forward," he said.

In Cairo, after meeting with Mubarak, Barak said he expects the Palestinians to honor their commitments and promised that his government is turning over more West Bank land to Palestinian control on schedule, in 10 days.

Former Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, after a separate meeting with Albright on Sunday, said negotiations in the region basically involve a chain of crises.

He said, "All parties are deeply interested to reach as much agreement as we can as soon as possible."

The United States considers Egypt, the first Arab country to come to terms with Israel, a bridge for Israel both to the Palestinians and to moderate Arab governments.

Albright is trying to keep hopes alive for a framework Israeli-Palestinian accord by Feb. 13, a deadline set by Arafat and Barak with President Clinton's encouragement. Negotiations to that end are resuming in Jerusalem.

Air Force chaplain finds mission at K-State

By Jennifer Hotchkiss
Kansas State Collegian

Air Force Chaplain Frank Lowe is studying pluralism and diversity in religion and communications at K-State on special assignment. He has served overseas and will continue his service when he gets out of school.

Justin Hayworth/ Collegian

Frank Lowe, for the most part, is on the same mission as other K-State students. He wants to graduate and earn a degree.

Unlike other students, he has two additional missions to fulfill while he's here — one for God and one for the U.S. Air Force.

Lowe is a 43-year-old ordained Catholic priest on an Air Force Institute Technology assignment.

"I still remember the first day he walked into class wearing his clerical dress," Mark Crouser, graduate student in journalism and mass communications, said. "And then the next week he came to class in his greens. He looked like he was straight out of 'Top Gun.'"

Lowe said he never imagined he would portray that image when he graduated from high school two months after the final evacuation of Vietnam. He thought anyone who went into the military was an idiot. Even though his father was a military man, Lowe did not want anything to do with it.

Instead, he went to Long Beach State and later pursued a master's of divinity in theology at St. Patrick's Seminary in northern California. During summer vacations, he worked with chaplains in the Air Force chaplain candidate program.

"I still had no love for the military," Lowe said. "I just needed a summer job."

After being ordained a priest in Riverside, Calif., in December 1985, Lowe said he felt the Lord was calling him to be an active-duty chaplain in the Air Force.

"My father, a prisoner of war in WWII, started as an agnostic and became a believer due to chaplains in his prison camp," Lowe said. "My father said in those prison camps you are stripped of everything but your character. I felt the Lord was leading me in that direction."

For Lowe, persistence paid off. After asking his bishop for permission to go on active duty several times, Lowe's bishop finally gave in. The bishop was reluctant to let him go because of an acute shortage of priests in southern California.

In 1993, Lowe left California for Grand Forks Air Force Base in North Dakota. Throughout the next six years, he traveled from North Dakota to the United Kingdom to Saudi Arabia to Montgomery, Ala., and finally to Manhattan.

Each year, the Air Force provides opportunities for active duty officers to obtain advanced degrees in areas the Air Force needs, said Maj. Steve Dorfman, assistant professor of aerospace studies.

Lowe was chosen from a highly competitive field of chaplains to pursue an advanced degree in communications. He is studying the relationship between pluralism or diversity and religious accommodation.

"The chaplain service is pluralistic," Lowe said. "You have to be able to work with other religions in the military. As a chaplain, my job is to provide the free exercise of religion for those in uniform. I do this by providing worship opportunities for all religions and making sure that nobody's religious freedoms are infringed upon."

The Air Force believes advanced education will enable Lowe to better achieve these goals, Dorfman said.

"This assignment will broaden Chaplain Lowe's whole-person concept," he said. "It will open his mind to new ideas and concepts that tend to influence how he will act later on in life. He can also offer his experiences to help others."

K-State is one of four schools in the nation with a chaplain on assignment. Depending upon the degree, location of the school, strength of the program and cost benefit to the Air Force, colleges are screened, reviewed and recommended to qualified officers.

Lowe said this assignment has challenged him intellectually and emotionally. The opportunity to learn more about communication via documents, issues and Web sites will benefit the Air Force.

"The Air Force is paying Lowe's full tuition and books, as well as providing him with the same salary and benefits while he's in school," Dorfman said. "However, when Lowe is done with school, he will owe the military two years of service in return for his education."

Lowe will leave K-State in May for his next assignment. Saying goodbye is the hardest part of his job, he said. Because he is single, he said the process is much easier. After his fourth move in the past six years, Lowe said he is used to getting to know people and then telling them goodbye.

Rainer Grosse, graduate student in journalism and mass communications from Germany, said he's learned a lot from Lowe.

"He knows what life is in reality," Grosse said. "He understands other points of view, but he still stands by his own opinion. He realizes the importance of other people's ideas."

Dorfman said Lowe is good exposure for the military.

"Most graduate students aren't used to having class with military officers," Dorfman said. "Lowe exposes the civilian community to the military program through his presence in the classroom. He can show students that the military are humans just like everyone else with important viewpoints to offer. What could be a more ethical example of that than a chaplain?"

If the first Virtual Career Fair is a success, Paula Peleska, area assistant to Experiential Learning, said another aspect of K-State students' lives will be affected by technology.

The Virtual Career Fair, which takes place today through Friday, is a new way for K-State students to find a summer co-op position or internship.

"It will be very beneficial to the students. They no longer have to work around their classes," Peleska said.

Cameron McGown, sophomore in civil engineering, said the career fair is an easy way to fill his summer plans. He said the placing his résumé on the Internet was uncomplicated.

"It's a good way to get exposure without much effort," McGown said.

Peleska said students who are interested can put their résumés online during the week. She said 105 companies have committed to the career fair.

Many companies were pleased with K-State's decision to have the fair, Peleska said.

"We don't have a spring career fair," she said. "Many companies are hoping to recruit for full-time positions and internships in the spring, this gives them the opportunity."

Peleska said companies will contact students for interviews either over the phone or for an interview on campus.

McGown said he took an internship last year but is looking for a different experience. He said the Virtual Career Fair will be more beneficial than the career fair last fall.

"I went to the career fair this fall, but companies don't remember everyone they see," McGown said.

"I asked the cellular guy how I could save on long distance. He suggested saying good-bye sooner. I said, OK, good-bye."

Greek Affairs should admit mistakes, make changes

K-State needs to re-examine its greek system.

While K-State's system is recognized because of its traditional excellence, there are still obvious flaws. While the most recent hazing allegation is just that — an allegation — the recent string of hazings show there is room for improvement.

Instead of settling for the system that excels compared to others, Barb Robel and Greek Affairs should strive to move forward and make K-State's greek system the absolute best it can be.

In an unprecedented move, Dartmouth College recently moved from the traditional greek system to one in which its single-sex fraternities and sororities are replaced with organizations composed of males and females.

Dartmouth's plan calls for a re-examining of organizational practices, selection and initiation practices, residence and membership requirements and physical standards for facilities.

With this in mind, it would be in the best interest of Greek Affairs to step back and take a long look at its way of life as well. While such a turnover would be unlikely and most likely undesirable, the re-examination is necessary.

Granted, fraternities and sororities do a lot of good for the university and community. However, while Greek Affairs acknowledges what it does right, it is hesitant to admit there are some wrongs.

It is time for it to acknowledge that wrongs do occur and not act ignorant of the idea.

Instead of saying no hazing occurs, it is time to be brave and say, yes, hazing goes on, but we are doing our best to stop it.

Stepping up and saying something as profound as that would separate K-State from the rest of the nation, and it would show that K-State is making strides and attempting to move forward in the 21st century.

Greek Affairs always says its system is one of the best in the nation. Well, if in fact it is, why not do whatever possible to remain the best?

This idea should not be limited to the greek system. Scholarship houses and residence halls should also strive to better themselves in any way possible.

▶ OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

If that means Greek Affairs has to suck it up and admit there are flaws in its system in order to move past the stereotypes and improve on its already lofty reputation, it is time to do so.

RELIGIOUS *In*tolerance

Religious freedom in America fades in tide of reverse discrimination

SCOTT RONEY

It all began innocently enough.

Ron Greer, pastor of a small evangelical church in Madison, Wis., and father of three sons, worked as a firefighter for the city of Madison to supplement his meager income as a pastor. One day at work, a fellow firefighter asked him what his opinion was of homosexuality. Greer responded by handing him a Gospel tract that, among other things, referred to homosexuality as a sin. When word of this reached Madison's fire chief, who happens to be a lesbian, she suspended him without pay for 2 1/2 months and then fired him, despite his 18 years of service with the department.

Just for expressing his religious convictions to a fellow employee.

That was just the beginning. While his church was having a meeting, hundreds of activists and their allies had a protest outside. More than 100 protesters stormed the building, dumping condoms on the altar, throwing rocks, urinating on the floor and screaming obscenities at the parishioners. Greer responded by asking them to join the worship service, but police had to escort him out of the building. Afterwards, a reporter covering the mayhem asked him how he had kept his cool in the face of such hate. Greer replied, "I have no more reason to be angry with them than I would with a blind man who stepped on my foot."

In response to this, a group of University of Wisconsin students called the Lesbian Avengers broke into Greer's home in the middle of the night and vandalized it, spray-painting graphic sexual references on the walls, then publicly claimed responsibility for the act.

Wisconsin state legislators, county officials, city council members and local newspapers have attacked and vilified Greer for his hateful behavior. He now is engaged in an expensive legal battle to get back his job and be cleared of any wrongdoing. He has received encouragement and public support from Reggie White, Alan Keyes, Charles Colson of Prison Fellowship Ministries and James Dobson of Focus on the Family. But the city of Madison has thrown all its power and funding into the effort to squelch Greer's rights.

My point is not to stereotype all gays or gay activists as behaving in this manner. Nor is it to discuss whether Greer's views are correct. Rather, I am reporting this case for two reasons.

First, I want to bring this vendetta to public attention in the hope that somehow I can do my part to help correct the injustice that Greer has suffered. Those who wish to support his legal battle, as I have, can mail checks to the Ron Greer Defense Fund, 10300 W. Lincoln Ave. Lower Level, West Allis, Wis. 53227.

Second, and even more serious, is what it bodes for the rest of us, regardless of our religious or political convictions. It demonstrates the true agenda of those who claim to act out of tolerance. In reality, what they mean is absolute and unswerving conformity to what they deem politically correct. It is frightening that in the United States, a man can be fired from his job, threatened and have his home attacked merely for expressing his views.

You expect to hear about something like this happening in a Communist country, but it is happening right here in our nation. If Greer can have his rights trampled on for failing to conform to the beliefs dictated by Madison's officials, who will be next?

HAI JENG/COLLEGIAN

The American Center for Law and Justice, a public-interest legal foundation that fights to protect religious freedom, reports a similarly disturbing case. In Denver, a couple was issued a cease-and-desist order by the Denver Zoning Administration to stop having small prayer meetings in their home.

They were told, in writing, that if they refused they would be subject to fines and would have to submit to government inspections of their home. You hear of house churches being raided in communist China, but until now I had never thought of Denver as a totalitarian municipality.

According to Jay Sekulow, Chief Counsel for the ACLJ, David and Diane Reiter were told that a book club meeting would have been OK, but not a prayer meeting. Ironically, a few miles away in Littleton, a witch was allowed to give a presentation to Columbine High School students a few years ago.

Meanwhile, in Stephenville, Texas, students at the high school have undertaken a brave act of civil disobedience by voluntarily praying before football games as they have done for decades. According to WORLD magazine (11/13/99), a circuit judge recently ruled there could be no prayer on the school grounds. The ACLU is fighting to censor students from saying the name "Jesus" during any pregame remarks.

Wake up, America. Stand up for your rights and the rights of others. We still have religious freedom in this country, but it is fading fast. Those who wish to impose their so-called tolerance on all citizens are fighting vigorously to destroy what millions of Americans have given their lives for.

Don't let your freedom slip away.

Society, press place too much importance on celebrities; I-29 accident undercovered

KATIE SUTTON

What determines the worth and importance of people's life? Is it their fame and fortune, or the fact that they were given life in the first place?

How about when a person dies? Is the death of an average person any less important that the death of a famous person? I hope most of you answered no.

So, what's more important — 10 people dying in a fiery 24-vehicle wreck, or a man becoming paralyzed from the waist down? Now, what if that man was a star linebacker for the Kansas City Chiefs?

Two big things happened last week near Kansas City, Mo. First, 10 people died in a 24-vehicle wreck when a semi jackknifed on I-29. Just a little bit south of that, Derrick Thomas, linebacker for the Kansas City Chiefs, was also in a car accident. Thomas was sent to the hospital alive, but there was speculation that he seriously injured his back — a big problem for a football star.

The first time I gained knowledge about either wreck was due to a headline in the newspaper stating that 10 people had died in a wreck on I-29 north of Kansas City.

I began to read the short story and was somewhat irked when I found that almost half of the story was about Thomas's accident. Then I was more irritated to find another full-length article about Thomas.

Let me clear one thing up before I go further. I am not a football-hating girl who thinks anything football related should be banned from the world. I am aware that Thomas is important to a lot of people because of his talent and the integral role he plays on his team.

What I am asking, however, is what makes him so much more important that he can get two stories in the news, whereas a huge wreck that killed equally innocent people does not even warrant its own article in the newspaper?

The over-importance given to Thomas' accident displayed itself even more in the fact that there were people who didn't even know about the other wreck. They did know about Thomas, which means they probably read a newspaper, but in the midst of the Thomas travesty, how could anyone be expected to concentrate on anything else?

I understand that people want to read about celebrities more than the average person walking down the street, but the fact remains that the 24-vehicle wreck itself was more newsworthy with one death than Thomas' paralyzation. I believe this because Thomas is still alive, and 10 others are not.

I am disappointed in the newspapers and somewhat in society. While the newspaper business is a money-making device that needs, to an extent, to give readers what they want, newspapers also have a responsibility to inform their subscribers of important news. I would say that 10 people dying is more important than a man who is still alive, though might not play football anymore.

I am slightly disappointed in society for placing so much importance on celebrities when people's lives have been taken and devastated to irreparable lengths. Think about it this way — what if it had been your wife, husband, child, parent, significant other or anyone else close to you? Would a man's football career be top news then?

I ask this because every person who died in that wreck is important to someone. Thomas' family still can talk to him and see him. They still have him in their physical lives.

To give the papers credit, they did run a full, single-purposed article on the accident two days after it happened. And, it turns out that Thomas' injuries are not as severe as doctors had originally thought.

He might even be walking before too long. Too bad 10 others cannot, and no one really cares. They're not famous, you know.

HAZING

the house's sanctioned party.

No charges were brought against the house in the incident.

Several K-State greek organizations have faced penalties recently for violating the anti-hazing policy.

In April of 1998, Kappa Alpha Psi, a traditionally black fraternity not under the jurisdiction of the IFC, was expelled from campus after an apparent hazing incident left one member in intensive care.

The Delta Delta Delta sorority was put on social probation until this month for violations of the policy in October 1998.

The Acacia fraternity was banned from campus for five years after a hazing incident in April.

Charges of violations of the Greek Affairs substance abuse policy and human rights code were brought against Phi Gamma Delta in December. The results of the case were not released by Greek Affairs.

In his statement, Goodpasture said he would be available for comment after the Feb. 11 hearing.

TUITION

Heinrich and KU Student Body President Korb Maxwell both said the timing of the issue raised some important questions.

"The actions of the board were inexcusable. It served to shut students out of the decision," Heinrich wrote in a letter to Hensley. "Steps should be taken to ensure this doesn't happen again."

Maxwell wrote in his letter that students purposely were left out of the decision, accusing the regents and governor of striking a political deal, referring to the financial backing of Senate Bill 345, which the governor originally had been wary to fund given the current state of the economy.

Senate Bill 345 will appropriate $70 million to regents universities, community colleges and technical colleges over a span of four years. K-State will receive $20 million and plans to spend the majority of its share on raising faculty salaries.

Although criticized for making such an important decision so hastily, Docking said the board was left with no choice, but it is not proud of the process behind the second increase.

"No one on this board wanted to increase tuition," he said. "To preserve quality of education, we knew it was the right thing to do."

The decision had to be made quickly because the increase had to be certified with the federal government for student financial aid.

Docking denied that any deal was made between the board and the governor in relation to a tuition increase and Senate Bill 345.

"There was no deal," he said. "I held my breath until Jan. 10."

"The absolute disaster would have been if we had raised tuition and the governor had not supported Senate Bill 345."

While faculty salaries continue to lag comparatively behind those of its peer institutions, the board passed a salary increase for K-State President Jon Wefald of 10.9 percent last summer. University presidents in Kansas received raises between 10 and 16 percent last summer. Faculty salaries will be raised by approximately five percent.

"The salary increases were far from being consistent with presidents and faculty," Hensley said.

RAILROAD

Saturday was the first time the Wonder Workshop organized the tour at night and presented a re-enactment.

Pitts started the Underground Railroad to give children the opportunity to learn about their past, an opportunity he did not have.

"No one ever taught me about my history when I was growing up," Pitts said. "It's great being able to learn about people and share what I have picked up. There's a lot of learning back and forth."

The mock railroad made its first stop at the Beecher Bible and Rifle Church, organized in 1852 in Wabaunsee, and ended with the Civil War re-enactment at Chris Barr's cabin, built in 1863 in Zeandale.

Along the way, Pitts taught children and their parents about the abolitionist movement in Kansas and the real life stories of people like Capt. William Mitchell, a Civil War veteran and leader of the Underground Railroad in Wabaunsee.

"You think kids were involved in the Underground Railroad? You better believe it," Pitts said to 15 attentive children. "They're filing things away in their memory banks. That's what learning does."

Diana Cauldwell said she learned a lot about the diversity of the people who lived in Wabaunsee in the 1800s.

"I'm really impressed with the history and to know how diverse this area really was," she said. "This is a part of our history, and it's important to learn about it."

Bob Atchinson went on the tour with his wife and daughter. He said learning about the history of the Underground Railroad gives Kansans the chance to learn about cultures they aren't exposed to.

"A lot of people in Kansas aren't exposed to African-Americans," he said. "We aren't very diverse. It's great to have something close to the community to see what was going on back then."

After visiting the church, the tour stopped at the Wabaunsee Township Cemetery, one of the oldest in Kansas, to view the graves of sixty Civil War veterans and abolitionists who were involved in the Underground Railroad.

The tour participants then walked in Mitchell's former cabin in Wamego, where slaves once hid in a secret compartment before continuing on the railroad.

Finally, the voyage headed to Zeandale and Barr's cabin for the mock re-enactment.

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

Civil War re-enactors from the 3rd Kansas Light Artillery teamed with Pitts to act out how life would be on the Underground Railroad. The re-enactors put on a skit in which a rebel soldier is killed by two Union soldiers protecting a slave fleeing to the north.

Civil War re-enactors from the 3rd Kansas Light Artillery teamed with Pitts to act out how life would be on the Underground Railroad. The re-enactors dressed in Union soldier uniforms and used authentic muskets, while Pitts pretended to seek shelter in the cabin.

"It really brings the history to life," said James Snyder, a Civil War re-enactor and a professor of theology at the Manhattan Christian College. "Sometimes I feel like I'm actually there. We want to keep the memory alive. I think it's very effective"

The tour costs $10 per adult and $5 per children. The Wonder Workshop will be giving the tour every Saturday in February from 1 to 4 p.m. in honor of Black History Month.

BUDGET

without pain, but we will get to 2001 and hopefully get that increase."

As for the cuts in the current budget, Peterson said faculty members could decrease their phone use and make fewer copies to save money. She said the budget cuts also could mean increased workloads for some faculty and staff.

"I think it will be more an administrative thing, because you are so far into the fiscal year that it won't be noticed as much by students," she said. "It may be the little things that won't be real noticeable to students."

But the cuts may affect more than the little things at the College of Business Administration.

Dean Yar Ebadi said the cuts could make trying to enroll in the college difficult. The college, which has seen 500 new students in the past four years, has an enrollment of nearly 3,000.

"Several classes are full and there are students on waiting lists," Ebadi said.

RAMS

But suddenly the Titans' offense came to life, and the St. Louis defense began to wear down behind the battering of George and short passes from McNair.

Tennessee scored on its next two possessions, both on 1-yard runs by George to make it 16-13 with 7:21 left. It would have been 16-14, but the Titans chose to go for two points on their first TD and failed.

Al Del Greco's 43-yard field goal tied it with 2:12 left. Then the Rams' quick strike for a touchdown set up one of the most exciting finishes in Super Bowl history. The Titans, however, just didn't have enough at the very end.

"We've been doing this off and on during the year. We knew we had an opportunity to go on in and score," McNair said of the game's final play on Dyson's near-touchdown lunge. "We said on the sideline when they scored that the only fault they did was scoring too quick. We fell just short."

Angie Finkes pulls in a rebound over Nebraska's Nicole Kubik in the first half of their game Sunday afternoon. The Cornhuskers won the game 68-61.

Wildcat fall to Huskers marks 4th straight loss

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a different team but the same story for the K-State women's basketball team, as the Wildcats were defeated 68-61 at Bramlage Coliseum Sunday afternoon. K-State now has lost four games in a row.

Once again, for the third time in four games, the Cats came close to defeating a tough opponent but fell short during the game's closing minutes.

With 7:35 left in the game, K-State led 50-48, but a Nebraska guard caught on fire, scoring 11 points in the last 7:21. Nebraska's ability, and the Cats' inability, to count on a go-to player was the difference in the game.

"I really think we struggled with the very thing that Nebraska brought to the floor," head coach Deb Patterson said. "That Nicole Kubik player, that go-to, step-out, I'm going to drain these big shots and break your back player.

"It appears to me that the end-of-game scenarios, it really is coming down to a made shot here versus a miss or a go-to player or someone just stepping up and making a play," Patterson said. "We've struggled finding someone who can assume that role in the waning minutes of the ball game."

A primary factor in the Cats' second-half struggles was Nebraska's ability to make shots. Kubik, who only had 7 points at halftime, exploded for 19 in the second half to finish with 26. Senior forward Charlie Rogers scored 10 points in the second half despite feeling ill.

For the game, the Huskers shot 51.9 percent from the floor and 58.3 percent from behind the arc.

"I just think we were playing really bad defense," senior forward Angie Finkes said. "We were giving them open looks that we shouldn't have been giving, and we got really soft in the second half."

While the Huskers were shooting the lights out, the Cats were erratic from the floor, shooting 30 percent overall and 21.7 percent from three-point land. Sophomore guard Kristin Rethman, who was shooting 40 percent from the field on the season, was just 1-7 against Nebraska.

"We knew that the majority of their shots come from three-point land, and our whole goal was not to let them have too many looks at the basket," Kubik said.

Junior guard Kim Woodlee said the Cats had gotten good looks at the basket but had just failed to finish the plays.

"We had good looks — we just missed our shots," Woodlee, who was 3-10 from the perimeter, said.

On offense, the Cats were able to put together spurts of scoring, but they would also often go several minutes without a point, allowing opponents to catch back up.

Finkes, who scored 14 points, said this inconsistency has plagued the Cats all year.

"I think that's our demon right now," Finkes said. "We're not really a team that's going to blow anybody out. What we need to understand is when those teams make those runs, we need to get our composure, get ourselves back in control and get back in the game."

Crowd support

Sunday's attendance of 7,680 was the fourth largest in school history and the third largest this year.

Fabulous Firsova

During one 4:32 stretch in the second half, center Olga Firsova outscored the entire Nebraska squad 8-6. Her second basket of the run was highlight-reel material. Firsova went coast-to-coast after receiving an in-bounds pass and laid the ball up past a defender.

Sharp shooting

Nebraska, which shot 51.9 percent from the floor, was the first opponent to break the 50 percent barrier against the Cats. Nicole Kubik scored a season-high 26 points, and Charlie Rogers, despite suffering from flu-like symptoms the last three days, registered a double-double with 12 points and 13 rebounds.

Ahead on the schedule

The Cats will stay at home when they face Missouri at 1 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

Morrison's play shines when facing Huskers

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LINCOLN, Neb. — The number six represented many facets of the K-State Wildcats' 81-72 loss Saturday night to the Nebraska Cornhuskers at the Bob Devaney Sports Center.

For starters, six refers to the number of Huskers who scored in double figures. Six also was the number of minutes into the second half that K-State had the lead. Finally, six is the number of consecutive losses the Wildcats have suffered.

For both teams, the difference in the game was the first- and second-half performances.

The game marks the second time this season that K-State (8-10, 1-6) lost after leading at halftime. The other was Jan. 4, to Long Beach State.

"Down the stretch, our shots didn't fall like we wanted them to, but the game was always there," senior forward Tony Kitt said.

After the game seesawed for the first 10 minutes of the second half, Nebraska (10-10, 3-4) used a 12-4 run that gave it the lead for good.

With 10:45 to play and after K-State had led the whole game, five different Huskers had a hand in the decisive scoring charge, with junior forward Steffon Bradford's 5 points leading the way.

As a whole, in the second half Nebraska junior point guard Danny Walker supplied most of the points, scoring 10 of his team-high 16.

Kitt, who led K-State with 19 points and 11 rebounds — his sixth double-double of the season — said the second-half differences was simple: Nebraska was more confident.

"I can't really make any excuses," Kitt said. "They got the job done — I didn't. I think they emphasized when they went in at halftime that they had to get their post game going, and maybe it would open up everything else.

"I can't speak for the team, but I know my defense wasn't particularly good in the second half. Those guys came with a lot more confidence and intensity in the second half."

The Husker inside attack was led by 6-foot-11-inch junior center Kimani Ffriend and Bradford, who scored 13 and 12 points, respectively.

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

K-State's Tony Kitt, left, puts a shot up over Nebraska's Kimani Ffriend in the second half of Saturday's game in Lincoln, Neb. The Wildcats blew an eight-point first-half lead to lose 81-72.

Another factor in the Wildcats' loss was the difference in free throws. K-State went to the line about as often as a K-State Big 12 Conference road victory, which has not happened since the Wildcats' 67-62 triumph last February over Iowa State.

The Cats made 7-of-12 free throws, compared with the Huskers' 28 of 41.

"I've never coached a team that has had this disproportional amount of free throws," head coach Tom Asbury said.

Early in the first half, both Nebraska and K-State played like teams that were averaging nearly 20 turnovers a game this season, committing a combined total of 17 of the 28 overall.

Though ugly, the first half was entertaining for a number of reasons.

Junior point guard Galen Morrison lit up the Huskers for the second time this year. Morrison, whose seven three-pointers Jan. 8 against Nebraska tied him for the third-highest number of three-pointers made in a single game, was 4-for-4 in the first half Saturday for 12 points. For the game, Morrison was 5-of-7 from beyond the arc, where he has thrived this season, hitting 46 percent.

Morrison did not start the game because of disciplinary reasons tied to his remarks after Wednesday's loss to Oklahoma State. Morrison had expressed harsh feelings toward the K-State coaching staff in the postgame interviews.

The first half proved to be close but was all K-State. The Cats did not surrender the lead in the half, but played it close.

After leading, 26-18, with 6:49 left in the half, the Huskers made a run, four times climbing to within 2 points or fewer of the lead before the half ended with K-State leading, 37-34.

K-State next plays Wednesday at Iowa State, whose Cyclones are coming off an upset Saturday of No. 12 Kansas.

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If only K-State could make Galen Morrison believe he was playing Nebraska every night.

Morrison, a junior and an Omaha native, has enjoyed stellar performances against the Cornhuskers both times he faced them this season.

Saturday in Lincoln, Neb., Morrison finished with 17 points, hitting 6-of-10 from the field and 5-of-7 three-point tries.

The junior hit all four of his first-half three-point attempts, leading all scorers with 12 points in just 10 minutes of action.

"He hit some tough shots, and he's called on to do that," K-State head coach Tom Asbury said. "But he's got great range, and he can shoot with a hand up.

"He might have taken one questionable shot, but he went six for 10 (overall) and five for seven on his threes, so you certainly have to say that he didn't take a bunch of bad shots — or he made a bunch of bad shots, one or the other."

His five three-pointers against the Huskers moved him into 10th place for three-pointers made in a season. With 52 this year, Morrison surpassed the 48 recorded by Brian Henson (1993) and Elliot Hatcher (1996).

Morrison had similar success when Nebraska played at Manhattan on Jan. 8.

In the Big 12 Conference opener, Morrison led the Wildcats' 97-79 thrashing of the Huskers, a game in which K-State led 52-27 at halftime.

Morrison recorded a career-high 19 points in the first half and finished the game with 27 on 10-of-13 shooting from the field and seven of nine from three-point range.

His seven three-pointers tie him for third on K-State's single-game charts with Will Scott (1988) and Askia Jones (1992).

Following the earlier victory over the Huskers, Morrison was selected Big 12 Player of the Week.

Asbury said he has no answer for why Morrison has success against Nebraska.

"You need to go ask (Nebraska head coach) Danny (Nee) that," he said. "I have no idea. I don't worry about what they do — I've got enough worries."

Saturday, Asbury chose to not start the 6-foot Morrison for disciplinary reasons for comments he made after K-State's 71-56 loss last Wednesday to Oklahoma State. Morrison didn't enter the game until the 15:35 mark of the first half.

Morrison, after a 21-point performance against the Cowboys, unquestionably was frustrated with the Wildcats' coaching staff.

"Coaches, plain and simple. Coaches," Morrison said after the game. "I'm just getting fed up with a lot of stuff. I don't know what the problem is.

"I don't like people saying after games that we're losing, that I'm pointing fingers and saying that we're losing because of other people. After we lose, I just sit there by myself thinking what I could have done to help us win the game."

Before Saturday's game, Morrison released a statement regarding those comments.

"I would like to say I'm sorry for the comments that I made after the Oklahoma State game," Morrison said. "The things I said were out of frustration and should have been kept behind closed doors.

Kitt seeing double

Senior forward Tony Kitt recorded his sixth double-double of the season and the 11th of his career with 19 points and 11 rebounds against the Cornhuskers. He has rebounded in double figures in the Wildcats' past five games.

Losing the lead

The Nebraska game was only the second time this season that K-State has lost after leading at halftime. The only other defeat came Jan. 4 to Long Beach State. The Wildcats are 5-2 this season when leading at the half.

Too close for comfort

Nine of the past 12 K-State/Nebraska games have been decided by 10 points or fewer.

Outside threat

Junior point guard Galen Morrison's five three-pointers against Nebraska moved him into 10th place all-time for three-pointers in a season. Morrison's 52 this year surpassed the mark of 48 held by Brian Henson (1993) and Elliot Hatcher (1996).

Up next

K-State will travel Wednesday to Ames, Iowa, to take on Iowa State (18-3 overall, 6-1 Big 12). The Cyclones are tied with Texas for the conference lead after a 74-66 upset Saturday over No. 12 Kansas.

Channel improvements under consideration

BY GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plans to update television services around campus are being followed through by the Office of Telecommunications.

"Our underlying reason is for education and providing the best possible services for the least amounts of money," Director of Telecommunications Fred Damkroger said. "We provide 70 channels or so and are still considering expanding to more."

In the residence halls, students are able to purchase Wildcat Cable Television. Jerry Marrow, cable television administrator, said it is cable similar to the services of local providers with the addition of six channels of K-State programming that are not accessible through other cable companies.

"We have all residence halls wired and are expanding to selected academic buildings," Marrow said. "We are growing on a daily basis, the most recent addition being Kedzie Hall."

"Our underlying reason is for education and providing the best possible services for the least amounts of money."

— Fred Damkroger, telecommunications director

The six K-State channels provide students with class reviews, special interest programming, Landon Lecture broadcasts and a campus bulletin board.

"I used the test-review channel once for a chemistry test review. It was really helpful for that class," Dan Huntington, sophomore in accounting, said. "I think developing other programs for the channels would be beneficial for students."

There are discussions taking place on other uses for the channels to assist students in the learning process, Damkroger said.

"Our intentions are for educational purposes," he said. "We are working to do other things with the channels, for example, to take a class like science technology and record the lecture, then play them again at night for students who may have missed something."

Damkroger said a committee is being formed to gather information about the level of interest and some possibilities for programming of the six channels.

"We are gathering educators for a committee by sending out notification, saying here's what we are able to do and asking them if they are interested and what they want to do," Damkroger said.

Marrow said they are hoping the educators will give them more ideas of how the system can be applied for educational purposes.

"We are building the infrastructure to make all this possible," Marrow said. "The committee will have to decide how to actually use it."

With the cable wiring throughout campus, the system is intended to link all of the different buildings like science classrooms and residence hall rooms together through television, Marrow said.

"Telecommunications does the physical part. Our plan is to take content from any building on campus and view it from any other building on campus," Damkroger said.

Killing sparks feminist debate

BY SELCAN HACAOGLU
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey — Even in death, Konca Kuris was denied her last wish — that women be allowed to pray alongside men. It was a desire that cost the religious feminist her life at the hands of Islamic radicals.

Police dug up Kuris' naked body from the basement of a hideout used by Islamic militants who videotaped weeks of abuse they inflicted before suffocating her. Dozens of male victims also have been found and a second female victim was discovered Friday.

The killings have horrified the country, but Kuris' slaying also has focused attention on the role of women in Islam, a flashpoint that was underscored when male relatives at her funeral last week refused to allow her eldest daughter to pray beside her coffin.

"Who are the real Muslims, those who have killed Konca or those who go to mosque together, women and men?" asked Necati Dogru, a columnist for the newspaper Sabah.

"One more person paid with her life for being different and searching for her own voice," Sibel Eraslan, a female commentator, wrote in the Islamic newspaper Akit.

But at Ankara's main Kocatepe mosque, worshiper Nese Ince spoke out against Kuris' feminist brand of Islam. "I don't want the Islam that I have believed in for years to be changed," she said.

Kuris at first was a member of the militant group Hezbollah, which seeks to establish an Islamic state in southeastern Turkey and which is not related to the Lebanese militia of the same name.

Kansas known worldwide for evolution decision, not 'Wizard of Oz'

BY ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marion Gray was traveling in Germany, where usually, Kansas would be a foreign word. But to his surprise, many people were recognizing the state he was from because of continued coverage of the Kansas State Board of Education's decision to leave the teaching of evolution up to teachers.

Gray, Faculty Senate president, said other faculty members have shared the same experience while traveling internationally.

Now evolution — not Dorothy and Toto — seems to be the leading way to recognize the state of Kansas.

Reports of the National Center for Science Education, a national science journal, dedicated an entire issue to Kansas and the Board of Education's decision.

The issue reported on the board's decision, how it came about and responses to the decision from around the nation, including K- State's Faculty Senate resolution to support efforts to reverse the board's decision.

Gray said the science journal's devoting a whole issue to Kansas is embarrassing.

"This is one more example of how Kansas has made itself infamous," he said.

Gray said the board does not realize how its decision not only effects public schools in Kansas but also affects the universities.

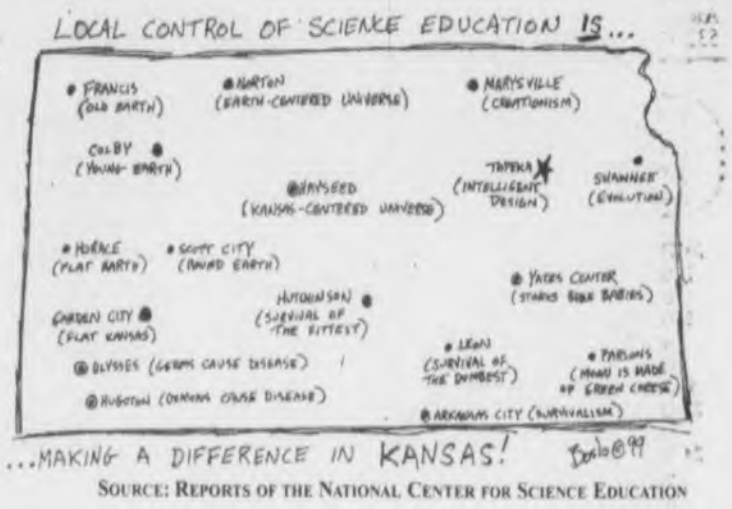
Gary Conrad, distinguished professor of biology, said before the board's decision, he was on a committee that sent out letters to people all over the country who were in positions to recommend possible candidates for K-State to hire. The next week, the school board announced its decision to leave out the teaching of evolution in the science standards.

Shortly after, Conrad said he received a letter in the mail from Maxine Singer, president of the Carnegie Institute in Washington.

"She's everything but a Nobel Prize winner," he said.

In her letter, she wrote that she had spent an enormous amount of time with members of the Kansas Board of Education explaining to them the importance of evolution, and in light of everything that had happened with the school board's decision, she couldn't in clear conscience recommend someone take a job at K-State.

Conrad said this illustrates the effect of the board's decision on the state of Kansas.



He said professors do not want to teach at a place where students will not be familiar with modern science or evolution.

"Who in their right mind would want to come to Kansas with a family where their children will be taught the equivalent of a primitive education?" he said.

Although all the attention on Kansas, like the science journal's dedicating a full issue to Kansas, is embarrassing, Gray said he is pleased people are responding in this way, because it makes people think about the issue in a thoughtful and broader context.

"If it raises concern and awareness, that's good," Gray said.

Gray said he hopes that Kansans who have not considered school board elections important in the past will take them more seriously and turn out to vote.

SOURCE: REPORTS OF THE NATIONAL CENTER FOR SCIENCE EDUCATION

However, soon Kansans might not be able to decide on board members. Recently, House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, proposed that the Board of Education be eliminated and replaced with a secretary of education appointed by the governor to oversee Kansas public schools.

The proposal was supported by the House Education Chairman Ralph Tanner, R-Baldwin City, and House Education Ranking Member Henry Helgerson, D-Wichita.

Woody Harrelson, Lolita Davidovich and Antonio Banderas star in "Play it to the Bone."

Clever dialogue not enough in 'Play it to the Bone'

By KELLY FURNAS
Kansas State Collegian

There are more things right than wrong with "Play it to the Bone," yet the movie still does not deserve recommendation.

The movie has spectacular dialogue and smart scene setting; it just has no story. In fact, I have difficulty coming up with a summary of the plot.

Let me take a crack at it.

Two boxers (Antonio Banderas and Woody Harrelson) drive to Las Vegas to fight each other. When they get there, they fight.

That's it.

Seriously, the movie has no discernible character development, no overriding moral and no real plot twists (although it's commendable the screenwriter didn't make the characters get lost or some other silly development). Even the ending leaves the viewer hanging and disappointed.

It's sad, too, because the exposition of the story is so well-crafted — the two boxers are good friends and only can reach a title bout by defeating each other. Add to the mix the fact both boxers are fighting their own pasts and are traveling to Las Vegas with the girl (Lolita Davidovich) with whom they both have been involved.

Unfortunately, the plot does little with the potentially powerful setup. While the impending fight lazily tests the friendship of the boxers, the friendship is so casual and nonchalant, it seems like no big deal. Instead of some resolution to the emotional pasts of the boxers, the movie just treats those stories like nothing more than chances for flashbacks.

"Play it to the Bone"
Showing: Seth Childs Theaters at 7:15, 9:55 p.m.

Indeed, the movie does not finish strong. In fact, it almost seems like two separate movies were made — the first half has terrific, even emotional dialogue as the boxers and Davidovich's character make the trip to Las Vegas. Once there, however, the film turns sour, with uncharacteristic scene splitting and fast-paced music. The final fight scene also is filled with many strange metaphors that seem to come out of nowhere.

Director and writer Ron Shelton ("Bull Durham," "White Men Can't Jump" and a dozen other sports movies) really needed to set one tone for this movie and carry it all of the way through.

In terms of acting, Harrelson and Banderas do acceptable jobs. Tom Sizemore is more obnoxious than necessary in his performance as a boxing promoter. The best performance comes from Davidovich, who shows calm and caring in her role as the boxers' former girlfriend.

But even Davidovich's character is deprived of any growth. As with the rest of the movie, the author should be credited with keeping Davidovich's character from becoming predictable, but even predictable plot and character development is better than none.

Despite big names, 'Any Given Sunday' movie soundtrack not worth listening to musicreview

By JUSTIN HAYWORTH

Various artists
"Music from the Motion Picture: Any Given Sunday"

Don't let the big names and movie hype fool you: the "Any Given Sunday" soundtrack is less than spectacular.

The dark and dramatic soundtrack, filled with tracks from some of music's hardest hitters, such as LL Cool J, DMX, Kid Rock and Hole, is a less-than-perfect fit for the hard-hitting, action-packed football movie.

Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott starts the compact disc with a smoother style than she might be known for from her previous releases. Her soft rhythm-and-blues lyrics laced over a track with dramatic orchestra music in the background really suits her. The background leaves the song sounding a bit too cheesy for a hard-hitting soundtrack.

She is followed by Capone-N-Noreaga, who spit its normal hardcore lyrics over yet another soft, overly dramatic piece of background music.

These soft and overly dramatic background cuts plague the first few songs of the soundtrack. LL Cool J's track "Shut 'em Down" starts to pick up the pace and get the soundtrack moving toward its hardest hitters, Kid Rock and DMX.

Kid Rock delivers a purely hardcore song the only way he knows how, filled with strong profanity. He is followed up by Hole, which helps to keep the adrenaline flowing.

DMX adds his pure grit to the soundtrack with a song that lasts just a little more than a minute.

Despite a full contingent of hard core hip-hop, it really is the rock tracks from Kid Rock, Godsmack, P.O.D. and Overseer that bring out the pure adrenaline and bone-crunching nature of the gridiron.

Overall, it's just not what I'd expect for a hardcore football movie, but then again, when your football stars are Jamie Foxx and LL Cool J, it probably fits. Though the soundtrack does provide a good deal of entertaining songs, this soundtrack is not recommended for those looking to pump up a crowd.

D'Angelo returns to recording with original blend in 'Voodoo'

By DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

D'Angelo
"Voodoo"

The wait finally is over.

Almost five years after the release of D'Angelo's hugely popular "Brown Sugar," fans finally have another taste of his magic in "Voodoo."

Infused with hip-hop beats and soulful funk, "Voodoo" blends the best traits of classic rhythm-and-blues with D'Angelo's modern brand of sensuality and ease.

This 14-track album flows from cut to cut with an easy sense of purpose. He creates an infectious sensuality with the keyboards, smooth guitar, horns and mellow percussion prominent in each track. From "Left & Right," a groove that features the rap stylings of Redman and Method Man, to his cover of the 1974 Roberta Flack hit "Feel Like Makin' Love," this artist once again has thrown convention successfully out the window to contribute another genuine original to the R&B genre.

He manages to incorporate the flavor of Latin influence in "Spanish Joint" without becoming a top-40 cliche because the tune melds so beautifully with the other tracks. He also is able to include some rap without distracting from the mellow mood of the entire album. Though "Left & Right," with its decidedly male-oriented sexual message, takes away from the overall sensuality for some of us ladies, it is simply not out of place on this record.

Everything that's good about "Voodoo" is what's bad about today's carbon-copy pop music. This album has not been created for air play — it's like listening to a really hot jam session. Though it's essentially more of the same from D'Angelo, those who fell in love with "Brown Sugar" will not be bored with "Voodoo." He simply has a unique style and a strong sense of what works for him. His talent shines brilliantly in this second release.

If it takes five years for D'Angelo to come forth with his next creation, it will be well worth the wait. "Voodoo" certainly is.

Teen smoking down in 1999 according to federal report

BY RUSS BYNUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — Smoking among high schoolers dropped in 1999 for the first time since the government began keeping track at the start of the decade. But nearly one in 10 children already are smoking cigarettes in middle school.

A nationwide survey of 7,529 high schoolers in September and October found that 28.4 percent reported using tobacco products in the preceding month, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said Thursday.

In 1997, the last time the CDC looked at high school smoking, 36.4 percent of students said they had smoked in the last month. At the time, teen smoking was on the rise, from 34.8 percent in 1995 and 27.5 percent in 1991, the first year the CDC started keeping track.

The CDC said it had expected teen smoking rates to drop — just not by so much. The agency said differences between the 1999 survey and earlier studies may have distorted the decline.

"We may have peaked in terms of smoking rates among high school students," said Michael Eriksen, director of the CDC's Office on Smoking and Health.

The drop in smoking rates had been expected because tobacco companies raised cigarette prices about 45 cents a pack last year to help pay for the $206 billion national settlement.

As part of the settlement, billboard ads for cigarettes were banned and the tobacco industry was barred from running advertisements with cartoon characters such as Joe Camel that anti-smoking activists say are aimed at youngsters. In many places, cigarette billboards have been replaced by signs with anti-smoking messages.

For the first time ever, the CDC also surveyed middle school students about smoking.

Nine percent of the students in grades six through eight said they had smoked cigarettes. Nearly 13 percent said they had used some tobacco product — including chewing tobacco, pipes and cigars.

Report says Catholic priests dying of AIDS at higher rate than rest of general population

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — AIDS has become a serious problem among Roman Catholic priests and has caused the deaths of hundreds of priests across the United States, The Kansas City Star reported in its Sunday editions.

The newspaper said the actual number of AIDS deaths is difficult to determine because of the sensitivity and secrecy surrounding the disease but that the death rate from AIDS appears to be at least four times that of the rate for the general U.S. population.

In the first installment of a three-part series, The Star said experts and examination of death certificates indicated several hundred priests have died of AIDS-related illnesses since the mid-1980s. Hundreds more are living with HIV, the virus that causes the disease, the newspaper said.

Catholic cardinals in the United States and high-ranking church officials in the Vatican declined requests to discuss the newspaper's findings, The Star reported. The Vatican referred questions to local bishops.

The Star began its research into AIDS in the priesthood four years ago. It received 801 responses — a 27-percent rate — to questionnaires that were sent last fall to 3,000 of the 46,000 priests in the United States. The margin of error of the survey was 3.5 percent.

Six of 10 priests responding said they knew of at least one priest who had died of an AIDS-related illness; one-third knew a priest living with AIDS. Three-fourths said the church needed to provide more education to seminarians on sexual issues.

And, asked about their sexual orientation, 75 percent said they were heterosexual, 15 percent said they were homosexual and 5 percent said they were bisexual.

Kenya Airway jet crashes into sea after take-off with 169 passengers, 10 crew members Sunday

■ 6 or 7 survivors found floating in wreckage, taken to area hospital.

BY TIM SULLIVAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast — A Kenya Airways jet carrying 169 passengers and 10 crew members crashed into the sea Sunday night, shortly after taking off from Abidjan. Airport officials said at least seven people survived.

The plane, an Airbus 310, took off at 9:08 p.m. and crashed just one minute later, said George Dapre Yao, the head of air traffic at Abidjan's Felix Houphouet-Boigny Airport.

Kenya Airways Flight 431, which was en route to Lagos, Nigeria, carried 167 adult passengers and two children, Yao said. Kenya Airways officials said the plane's final destination was Nairobi, Kenya.

Six or seven survivors were found early Monday floating in the wreckage off Abidjan and were being taken to an area hospital, said Raymond Kesse, an official with the Ivorian Red Cross.

Earlier, another survivor, a Frenchman, was brought to the same hospital with cuts and bruises.

"He was a good swimmer. That's how he managed to survive," said Dr. Tanoh Koutoua, who treated the unidentified man.

Witnesses said the plane never appeared to get sufficient altitude as it crossed over the airport's wall and headed out over the ocean, just a few hundred yards away.

"I saw it take off," said an itinerant trader who identified himself as Alogouleta. "After it went over the wall, it was still very low. Then it hit the water. I heard the sound two times," as the plane slammed into the ocean.

He said he heard no explosion, saw no flames, and that the plane did not veer as it flew overhead.

Emergency officials — firefighters, police officers, soldiers and divers — were combing the beach near the crash scene late Sunday night, about 1 mile east of the airport, looking for survivors and corpses. Police boats cruised the Atlantic off the beach, and a helicopter chattered noisily overhead, scanning the dark ocean with a bright searchlight.

"After it went over the wall, it was still very low. Then it the water. I heard the sound two times," as the plane slammed into the ocean.

— Alogouleta, itinerant trader

Dozens of people, who live nearby or were praying in churches along the beach road, heard the plane slam into the water.

A few immediately jumped into the water, hoping to get to survivors, but quickly were driven back by the harsh surf that slams noisily into the white sand beach.

A few times late Sunday, cheers rippled through the crowds, and people rushed to the water's edge after hearing reports that survivors had been found. Those reports turned out to be false.

Anne Yeze was worshiping at the Celestial Christian Church when the plane crashed into the water nearby.

"We were praying, and we heard a noise, like something hitting the water," she said. The parishioners rushed outside, but couldn't see the crash. They then called the airport.

An official at the airport's control tower said French military firefighters, who are stationed at a French military base next to the airport, also had been dispatched to the scene.

The French Foreign Ministry in Paris confirmed that a Marine infantry battalion was taking part in the rescue operation.

The weather was clear in Abidjan at the time of the crash.

The control tower official said wreckage of the plane could not be seen, but the area where the plane had crashed was visible from the tower.

Sororities' co-sponsorships now must be dry

■ Panhellenic Council adopted requirements.

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

Sororities at K-State no longer can co-sponsor functions in fraternities that are not dry, said Kellie McClellan, Panhellenic Council president and senior in public relations.

The resolution was adopted Nov. 29 at the last Panhellenic Council meeting of the fall semester. It was almost adopted by a majority vote, McClellan said.

"I think it is great that the Panhellenic Council is pro-active and willing to change," said Sara Tirrell, Pi Beta Phi president and senior in pre-medicine.

The resolution formally states, "At the beginning of the spring term of the year 2000, Kansas State University Panhellenic Council's collegiate chapters will co-sponsor functions in men's facilities such as houses, residence halls or lodges if and only if those facilities are alcohol free."

McClellan said the issue began with the Chi Omega national sorority. Chi Omega was the first sorority to adopt the resolution within the Panhellenic Council.

"I think passing the resolution early speaks well for the K-State sorority system," Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

The National Panhellenic Council voted to implement the resolution in support of dry fraternities, McClellan said.

Tom Balzer, project coordinator for alcohol-free housing for Phi Delta Theta, said the National Panhellenic Council resolution was adopted by its organizations because of growing concern over the safety and well-being of their members.

"They saw the actions of those men's organizations who are adopting alcohol-free housing as a positive step," Balzer said.

K-State has six dry houses and 16 non-dry houses, said Mike Goodpasture, Interfraternity Council president and senior in physical science.

"In my opinion, the resolution is good," Goodpasture said. "It is beneficial to a chapter to go dry. There are plenty of studies after they go dry showing positive results."

Many fraternities are being pressured to go dry, said Alli Walbridge, president of Chi Omega and junior in human resource management.

"This is to encourage those who want to go dry," Walbridge said. "It's just the way society is going today, trying to keep people safe."

Although sororities cannot co-sponsor a function in a non-dry house, they can move the activity to a third-party vendor, McClellan said.

"This gives fraternities less liability and makes it easier to regulate who is drinking and who is not," Tirrell said. "It will be great. It will make us be more creative in functions."

The only problem Walbridge sees with the third-party vendor is the costs involved.

"This will be a challenge for social chairs, where to have parties and what to do," Walbridge said.

K-State adapts for new criteria for admission

By JOSH BRIGGS
Kansas State Collegian

It's not yet known what effect qualified admissions will have on the student body population at K-State, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

Starting in fall 2001, high school students must achieve a 21 in the American College Testing Program, be in the top third of their graduating classes or complete a set of required curriculum with a 2.0 grade point average to be admitted to any state university in Kansas.

new requirements

Starting in fall 2001, high school students must meet set criteria to be accepted for admission at K-State. Students must meet at least one of the following.

- Score a 21 on the ACT.
- Rank in the top third of your graduating class.
- Complete the Kansas Precollege Curriculum with a 2.0 GPA or better.
  - 4 years of English
  - 6 semesters of natural sciences
  - 2 years of math
  - 6 semesters of social sciences
  - 2 semesters of computer technology, or proficiency exam.

Source: K-State Admissions Office

"As we look at the last three classes, approximately 90 percent of our students who have enrolled fit one of the three criteria," Bosco said. "But that's the enrolled student. We're now assessing what percent of the students who didn't enroll here would not have been admitted under the new criteria."

Bosco said one concern the new requirements have raised is the possible determent of people trying to gain admission to the University.

"The states that have moved to this have experienced significant drops in the number of students who actually try to be admitted, even though the admission criteria is somewhat minimal," Bosco said.

These changes came about through legislation four years ago, Bosco said.

"We are moving for the first time in our state's history from an open admissions university to a qualified admissions school," he said. "When we change in the fall of 2001, we will be the last school in the United States for the last state in the United States to have an open admissions university, so it's pretty significant."

Jason Wray, junior in animal science, said he doesn't care for the idea of qualified admissions.

"I think everyone should have an equal chance for an education," Wray said. "If someone wants to go to school, then they deserve the opportunity."

Economic expansion at longest in history

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Break out the champagne, cut the cake and strike up the band — it's time to celebrate the U.S. economy.

Today, the current expansion that began in March 1991 becomes the longest in American history at 107 months, beating the old mark of 106 months set during the 1960s.

The eight years and 11 months since the last recession is quite a feat considering the average expansion before 1982 did not last long enough to see its third birthday, let alone its ninth.

"If you are not cheering for this accomplishment, then you have awfully high standards," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's DRI. "This is an unprecedented economy."

It is not just length that makes the current period remarkable.

By almost any measure, these are good economic times. Unemployment is at its lowest level in 30 years — 4.1 percent — consumer confidence is at record highs and Wall Street has just wrapped up an unprecedented five straight years of returns of 20 percent or more in the S&P 500 stock list.

Long past the time most expansions are showing their age, this one seems to be getting stronger, with 1999 marking the third straight year with growth at 4 percent or more.

Normally, economic growth at those levels, combined with a dwindling supply of workers, would translate into rapidly rising wages, leading to higher inflation, but not this time. Last year, the so-called core rate of inflation, which takes out volatile energy

Teresa Gentry, senior in elementary education and a student teacher at Ogden Grade School, converses with a kindergarten student. Gentry agrees that all-day kindergarten gives students more opportunities to learn.

A Head Start

STORIES BY CRISTINA JANNEY ■ PHOTOS BY EVAN SEMON

Kindergarten students' development ahead of schedule

D is for Dalmatian.

Children poise their pencils carefully to draw their D's on yellow strips of paper. The strips are stapled together to make crowns to which spotted ears are attached.

Their ears flop as the children's laughs roll about the room.

K is for kindergarten, in which all these children are a part.

But not just regular kindergarten. These children are a part of all-day kindergarten at Ogden Grade School.

All-day kindergarten allows teachers to do more activities like the one above to help build reading, writing and math skills.

"It's a wonder. If they are here longer, they can have many more experiences," Berit Carrasco, teacher, said. "A lot of these kids would be in day care or camped out in front of the TV."

Carrasco was supervising children in the other half of the class as they were gluing pennies, macaroni and beans to sheets of paper numbered one to 100. The exercise was to celebrate the 100th day of school.

Sen. Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, has recommended in a multipoint education proposal that all school districts in Kansas consider all-day kindergarten.

College of Education Dean Michael Holen said research has shown that all-day kindergarten sets the stage for children as they go through school.

"The earlier we intervene with educational opportunities, the better off they will be," Holen said.

Tests of Ogden children entering the first grade showed the students without all-day kindergarten were on average 10 months behind the average student, said Barbara Tierney, Ogden Grade School principal. After all-day kindergarten was implemented students on average were 18 months ahead of the average student in language development, she said.

Senator's proposal requires all-day class

A plan authored by the Kansas Senate president might be too costly and infringe on the authority of local school boards, according to some local voices in education.

Sen. Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, authored a multipoint education proposal called the First in Class Plan that addresses issues from school uniforms to teacher tenure.

All-day kindergarten, one aspect of Bond's proposal, is favored by some in education, but concerns are that districts would not be able to fund the increased costs.

"It is very difficult for districts to endorse this without the funding," said Joleen Hill, president of Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board.

Adding all-day kindergarten throughout the state would cost an estimated $69 million.

Bond said more funding is needed for education, and he has introduced a tax increase that would allow more funding to go to education.

TAKE note

Minimum wage. Business and labor representatives expressed their different perspectives to the Senate Commerce Committee on raising the state's minimum wage.

Their testimony Monday concluded a hearing on a bill to increase the state's hourly minimum wage from $2.65 to $5.

Any employer not covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act is exempt from having to pay the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour. Businesses not engaged in interstate commerce or having annual sales of less than $500,000 can pay their workers less than the federal minimum.

Chairwoman Alicia Salisbury, R-Topeka, said she expects the committee to take action on the bill next week.

Hal Hudson, state director of the National Federation of Independent Business, said more regulations impede business growth. He recommended getting rid of the state's minimum wage.

Man convicted of murder free after 19 years in jail

LANCASTER, Calif. — A man who spent 19 years in prison for the slaying of a Burger King manager has been released after prosecutors said they no longer were certain of his guilt.

"I feel like I'm going to fall down," said Dwayne McKinney, 39, who was carrying his Bible and $200 cash when he left California State Prison on Friday. "I'm scared. I want to fall down on the floor and thank God."

Earlier in the day, Superior Court Judge Kazuharu Makino ordered McKinney's release after District Attorney Tony Rackauckas said there was enough new evidence to believe another man committed the 1980 murder of Walter Horace Bell Jr. in Orange County.

Rackauckas prosecuted McKinney in 1982 and unsuccessfully sought a death sentence.

"I don't think we can feel confident in the conviction at this stage," Rackauckas said.

Four employees identified McKinney in court as the gunman, but at least two of those witnesses recently said they now believe another man killed Bell.

Rackauckas said he had not decided whether to file charges against another suspect.

Scientists discover drinking causes low blood pressure

DALLAS — Scientists say they have learned part of the reason why some people become lightheaded and pass out when they stand up after drinking alcohol.

Two or three beers on average is enough to impair the body's ability to maintain a steady blood pressure, according to a study believed to be the first to explain the cardiovascular effects of drinking.

The study, published Tuesday in the journal Circulation, found that people have wider blood vessels and lower blood pressure after drinking alcohol.

Those changes impair the body's ability to pump fresh blood to the brain, said Dr. Virend K. Somers, a co-author of the study. As a result, drinkers who suddenly stood up often felt lightheaded and sometimes fainted.

How alcohol causes those changes is unknown, said Somers, a cardiologist at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota. He suggested the alcohol could be blunting the nerve signal sent from the brain to the vessel, or the alcohol was preventing the blood vessel from constricting.

Dr. Richard Lange, a professor of internal medicine at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center who was not affiliated with the study, said the research was the first to define why fainting might occur after drinking.

"It's more than just being inebriated. This explains in a very mechanical fashion on how alcohol can cause someone's blood pressure to fall," Lange said.

In the 1999 study, 18 healthy men and one woman averaging age 26 were given the equivalent of two to three beers.

Each participant's blood pressure dropped after the drinks. Somers said none of the subjects passed out during the study, but several became lightheaded.

Nudist colony threatened with clothing, legislation

TOPEKA — Webb Garlinghouse has operated the Lake Edun nudist camp on 60 acres southwest of Topeka for almost two decades, despite the bare opposition of some of his neighbors.

Now, he could face naked aggression from the Legislature, which is being asked to intervene in the local controversy over his camp.

Rep. Cindy Hermes is sponsoring a bill that would give any county authority to shut down a nudist camp located within five miles of a residential area. Hermes, R-Topeka, introduced the bill last week at the urging of some constituents.

The bill doesn't identify a particular target, but Hermes confirmed it is the Lake Edun.

Garlinghouse, a Topeka businessman who has operated the camp since 1983, said he is weary of the controversy it generates, but he is determined to fight efforts to close it down.

"I intend to exercise my right to be free," Garlinghouse told The Topeka Capital-Journal.

If Hermes' bill becomes law, Garlinghouse could face up to a year in jail and a $25,000 fine if he continued to operate the camp.

Students lose credit in transfers

BY ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michael Madden had plans to attend K-State, a roommate and his associate's degree in science.

Then he found out the bad news — only 19 of his 64 hours from Barton County Community College would count toward his major at K-State.

Madden, junior in finance, said he put his life on hold for a year so he could attend Barton for one more year and take courses that would count toward his major at K-State.

Lou Kottmann, Barton County associate dean for liberal arts and sciences, said there are many reasons why a students hours won't transfer to a four-year regent college.

"Often they come in unprepared and have to take developmental courses," he said.

Kottmann said these developmental courses don't even count for credit at Barton.

Another reason for hours not transferring is that students often will go into the vocational area with no intention of ever transferring to a regent college, Kottmann said. However, students will change their mind and decide to go to a regent college.

Then they discover the classes they took will not transfer to four-year regent colleges, Kottmann said.

Kottmann said students will often take a class for fun that counts toward their associate's degree but won't count toward their majors at a four-year university. Many times, students will change their minds at the last minute about their major or what college they want to transfer to, Kottmann said.

"When they change their minds at the last minute, that can cause transfer problems," he said.

However, Madden said he didn't have to take developmental classes, he always had plans to attend K-State after he received his associate's degree and his major was always the same.

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Mike Madden, senior in finance, spent three years at Barton County Community College in Great Bend, Kan. He earned 64 credit hours, but only 19 transferred to K-State, he said.

"I was under the impression that at least 50 percent would count toward your major," he said. "I took the classes that Barton County told me to take."

Madden said going to Barton another year cost him more than just money and time.

Madden said he should be graduating in May 2000, but instead he's graduating in December 2001.

"It's costing me a year and half that I could be working," he said.

Kevin Brown, sophomore in mechanical engineering, has a similar problem, but he's not trying to transfer from another community college — he's transferring to K-State in Manhattan from K-State-Salina this fall.

"K-State will only say that it didn't apply to my degree, and that's why it didn't transfer," Brown said.

Not counting this semester, Brown said 25 out of 47 hours will count toward his major.

One course Brown took at Salina that won't transfer was statics, an engineering class. He said the class is basically the same thing at both places but have different names.

Lawrence Moeder, director of admissions at K-State, said the process of transferring hours from other colleges goes back many years.

A long time ago, the 19 community colleges sent their catalogs to K-State, and K-State's various departments evaluated the courses to see which ones would transfer to K-State.

"Any time another college changes its programs, they call us and various departments review them — the appropriate department will do the reviewing," Moeder said.

For example, if a community college would change its program in business, it would send its catalog over for K-State's business department to review.

Moeder said it's important to remember that just because a course transfers doesn't mean it will transfer to the student's major. The course might transfer just to the general education.

In Brown's case, Moeder said if there is another version of a class being offered at the Manhattan campus and it's unique to a major, K-State is going to want students to take the one offered at the Manhattan campus.

Julie Katz, business academic adviser, said students can help combat transfer problems by getting dual advising, which means they would be advised from the community college they're attending and the college they're planning to transfer to.

Moeder said K-State has a Web site students can use to help see what courses are transferable to K-State from the 19 different community colleges in Kansas and the other four-year colleges in Kansas. It is www.ksu.edu/admit/tran.html.

K-Rock drops morning show, opts for national show instead

■ Morning duo says end came too quickly to give on-air farewell to fans.

BY BRANDI HERTIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KMKF-101.5 FM terminated its local morning show and the employment of its hosts, Jason Nivens and Woody, on Jan. 25 to replace it with a nationally syndicated program. The show will be announced Monday.

"Being in broadcasting, we're in a very competitive environment," said Richard Wartell, president of Manhattan Broadcasting Company Inc. "We're always looking at how we can better program our station."

Jason Schlitz, operations manager for K-Rock, said there was not a lot of success seen with the Jason and Woody show, which he cited to inexperience.

"Both of the guys worked real hard, but both of them are really novices at radio," he said.

Schlitz said after talking to radio stations in other similarly sized college markets, such as Lincoln, Neb., and Champaigne-Urbana, Ill., which ran the show, he heard the same two things.

People told them that they should jump on the syndicated show and that they did not want to compete with a station in the area that had it, he said.

Schlitz said there was a fear that another station in the area would pick up the show before K-Rock, thereby eliminating its chance to air the show.

"We were very concerned someone would bring that in against us," Schlitz said.

Nivens and Woody were not given any advance notice of their termination, but were given several weeks of severance pay, Wartell said.

Nivens and Woody said they regret that there was no opportunity for closure.

"We had a day," Woody said. "We didn't get a chance to say goodbye."

Nivens and Woody said they won a Kansas Association of Broadcasting award in 1999, 51 days after it began.

"I heard the morning show team we had was probably the best one K-Rock has ever had," Woody said. "That was just from public telling us."

Woody said he felt like the loss of the local morning show was unfair.

"The way they told us to do our show is completely opposite from the one they just brought in," Woody said. "We were told from the get-go to shorten our breaks, that nobody wants to hear us talk, they want to hear music ... Then they go out and get a syndicated show from Washington, D.C., that doesn't play any music. All they do is talk, and they're knotheads," Woody said.

Joe Roach, assistant music director and night disc jockey, was terminated in unrelated downsizing.

"I was the most expendable," he said. "The thing that makes me sad about it is that there was no warning. If we could've had some sort of idea, we could've been looking for jobs.

"In their defense, it is common practice to do it this way," Roach said.

Woody said he plans to move to California and pursue a radio career. Roach said he is looking to stay in the area. Nivens said he has an offer to work in the Kansas City area.

"What it comes down to is we just want to thank everybody who supported us and liked us," Roach said.

Legislators should use moderation when cutting taxes

In the endless effort to slash taxes, someone always has to pick up the slack.

This time, it's K-State students.

When the state legislature approved cuts in the current state budget to counteract tax decreases, it trimmed $2.2 million from K-State's budget.

Now, K-State students are left to try to survive the mess created by cut-happy politicians.

To begin with, students will be asked to cope with an increase of about $6 per credit hour next semester and — despite paying more — they might not be able to buy as much.

K-State administrators are toying with the possibility of getting rid of some class sections to offset the shortage of funds. So, as tuition rises, classes will be cut and waiting lists will continue to get longer.

Despite these plans, K-State officials seem to be doing all they can to lessen the blow to students. They have yet to cut class sections and plan to get rid of some only after ranking their importance.

But the effort of the administrators all could be in vain. Because cuts for this semester were so dramatic, they seem to have resigned themselves to hunkering down and trying to suffer through the semester with as little damage as possible.

While the picture seems to be a little prettier for the upcoming fall semester, the financial burden of politicians who are all too happy to please their constituents will have a chance to take its toll.

Students will miss out on needed — or even just desired — classes. Tuition will rise and continue to stomp on students' already beleaguered wallets. Faculty salaries will remain pathetically low.

All because legislators want to be re-elected.

Instead of focusing on re-election, perhaps legislators should consider higher education the last place from which to cut funds. Cutting taxes is not all it's cracked up to be.

▶ OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

It is time for those legislators to realize that cutting taxes might make a good sound byte, but when it's time to pick up the slack, cutting taxes just plain bites.

manhattan monopoly

Moviegoer urges boycott of cinema due to decision to end discount at local theaters

JEFF ELLIOTT

K-State students are being robbed.

Carmike Cinemas — the only movie theater company in Manhattan, has jacked its prices up, and the theater anxiously awaits your next visit so it can gang-tackle your wallet and give you a beatdown you won't soon forget.

In case you don't know, Manhattan's fiercest monopoly has its headquarters located at Seth Childs Cinema, 2610 Farm Bureau Road.

With no other theaters in the Manhattan area with which to compete, it has taken it upon itself to bless the Manhattan community with a ticket price of $6.50 for an evening show.

The theater offers no discounts for military or senior citizens.

But hey, surely it gives students a discount — after all, its theaters basically survive because of us.

Wrong.

No student discount, either.

Prior to last fall, anyone with a student or military ID could see a movie for less than $5 — a reasonable price considering the sub-par facilities that Seth Childs and Carmike-owned Westloop 6 Theatres had to offer.

Each Friday, the Collegian runs a listing of movie times and prices for the upcoming weekend. In addition, staff movie critic Kelly Furnas reviews two to three movies per week.

How does Seth Childs Cinema show its gratitude for what is basically free advertisement for its theatres?

Seth Childs makes him pay to see each movie he reviews.

Oh, but wait — it graciously gives him $2 off each movie that he sees — if he asks for it.

Look at the bright side — at least someone in Manhattan gets a discount.

For the rest of us, all discounts were halted in a business decision made by Carmike's home office in Columbus, Ga., last November.

Coincidentally, Carmike's official rate increase came right after the completion of the Seth Childs' expansion.

It is a reasonable assumption that a factor in the rate increase was the cost of adding six additional theaters to the Seth Childs' facility.

Of course, I only can assume this because the management at Seth Childs Cinemas gave me the old, "I'm sorry, but we are unable to give any information to the press. If you would like, you can call our home office, and they will be glad to assist you" copout.

So, I called Carmike's home office in search of some real answers.

According to Suzanne Brown, a company spokesperson, "Student discounts are no longer given because second-run theaters have taken their place."

Brown is talking about the conversion of Westloop 6 Theatres into a second-run discount theater.

Now we can go see movies like "Double Jeopardy," which came out four months ago, for the bargain price of $1.50.

At this rate, I only have to wait until April or May to see a real movie, such as "The Hurricane."

What a swell deal.

When asked about its policy on movie reviewers, Brown said, "It is a company policy across all 36 states to not offer any free pass to movie reviewers."

To sum it all up: Carmike shows no appreciation for its military and senior citizen customers, and in cities such as Manhattan, where high school and college students account for a large percentage of its business, it shows no loyalty.

And Carmike wonders why its stockprice is at a whopping $7.

The only way to combat greedy corporations like Carmike Cinemas is to hurt them at the local level.

Students need to boycott.

By refusing to give Seth Childs Cinema our business, Carmike will be forced either to lower its prices or leave town.

Collegian should avoid misusing persuasion

Editor,

The press has a powerful influence on public opinion. This power should be handled with more respect and responsibility by the Collegian.

The K-State greek system, one of the strongest in the country, has become the scapegoat of the Collegian. This is unfortunate because the greek system is such a positive attribute to K-State.

It provides a healthy living and social environment for thousands of K-State students. The majority of students in leadership positions on campus are greek. Each house sponsors philanthropies that benefit the Manhattan community. The greek system is open to everyone, regardless of race, religion or financial background. The old adage that greeks buy their friends is ludicrous, considering it is less expensive to live in many greek houses than the dorms or scholarship houses.

The Collegian, however, is determined to portray the greek system as an evil, elitist organization. Take for example the allegations of hazing that were splashed across Monday's front page.

Articles about allegations, written hastily with no supporting evidence, encourage a rush to judgment and serve only to cast a negative light on those involved. What is worse is that when, more often than not, these allegations yield no evidence, the Collegian makes no effort to clarify the situation.

Such biased article content, placement and publication are not professional journalism and are not befitting such a strong publication as the Collegian.

Super Bowl, Groundhog Day sure signs spring break on way

TARYN FORT

Winter officially has arrived.

Snow is here. President Clinton has given his final State of the Union address. The Super Bowl has yet another champion. And Mr. Groundhog has an important decision awaiting him soon.

So what does all of this mean in regard to being something of an importance?

Last I checked, winter is followed by spring. Spring signals many different occasions, most importantly the rebirth of nature. But spring also means spring break will be arriving soon. And spring break is most important to many college students.

Now, I know we have yet to see Valentine's Day — or President's Day, for that matter — but those holidays pass quickly since they are a smaller amount of time. Spring break is a week. An entire week that means most students either will be seeing an abnormal amount of sun, snow or parents.

So I began wondering. How is it spring break began receiving enough recognition that educational establishments actually allow students to go off and have what some might call non-educational fun?

Spring break is considered an American cultural tradition. Much like the way college football is celebrated, spring break is wrapped up into one small week instead of an entire season.

The modern spring break simply is a reincarnation of a phenomenon that began as far back as the ancient Greeks and Romans.

Greek and Roman men and women often are credited with the invention of spring break. Twenty-somethings of both cultures (in other words, people capable of having sex) welcomed the return of spring, the season of fertility. They welcomed the season by celebrating the god of wine, Dionysus/Bacchus. Participants celebrated until irrationality set in and they found themselves in an altered state of consciousness. All of this gave much needed stress relief as well as intermingling between the two sexes.

By the early 20th century, college students had begun to partake in traditional trips to the coast or somewhere considered restorative. The break simply was to re-energize for the rest of the college semester.

As time went on and events such as the organization of female athletics was given a chance, the two sexes began spending more and more time together. The term "road trip" was coined and became a favorite pastime of both men and women.

By the '60s, Hollywood and music were huge driving powers for the young in America. Focusing on spring break as the basis for movies and songs had a great effect.

Frankie Avalon and Annette Funicello made California more appealing and realistic. Music gave notions to the locations of the college party in America. From Fort Lauderdale, Fla., to Palm Springs, Calif., everything was about finding love and the sun.

The '80s marked a great upheaval in Spring Break tradition. The hippie era supposedly had brought Spring Break down to a classless activity (many traditional spots in America refused admittance because of the misuse of property throughout the week).

The '80s signaled a change in that marketing twists and turns allowed college students the opportunity to do more than just get drunk on the beach. Activities such as snorkeling, sailing, skiing and museum-hopping became popular. Alcohol advertisements were replaced by all of the new technology such as video games and movie ads.

The '90s turned out to be a conglomeration of the entire history of spring breaks.

The resurgence of popular tourist spots of the '60s made its way into the grand picture. Florida's west coast and California again were on the top 10 places to go.

Many international spots such as Cancun and Jamaica added to the popularity. Colorado and other ski areas of the United States have a noticeable amount of college students during spring break week.

Everyone still celebrates, college-style. Clubs and bars bank on that one week during the year when they will have thousands of students in from all over to spend money. Commercials and other ad campaigns advertise tons of places to party and stay for decent amounts of money.

In addition to easy marketing, MTV now covers the entire week live, from about every hot spot in America. Those who do not get the chance to travel anywhere exotic can see it straight from the tube. Reservations are easily made online. Travel packages for students are as easy to get as the flu.

Although it might be wishful thinking in a far too advanced stage, thoughts of spring break alone will give some relief from stress.

In the midst of all this wonderful winter snow and well-taken-care-of highways, spring is coming.

Round one of exams is on the horizon. After that, and all of the studying I know you all will do, cheer yourself with thoughts of March. It is only around the corner.

Water main breaks

BY TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A water main broke early Monday morning on Campus Road, leaving the entire block without water for the rest of the day.

For George Hancock, who has lived in the neighborhood for five years, it was no big deal. Other than the occasional college party, the burst water main was the most excitement Hancock had seen for a while in the neighborhood just a few blocks from campus.

"I keep a few jugs of water in the garage for my dogs, anyway," Hancock said. "So, it's really not a big problem for me to have the water shut off for a few hours."

Delmar Fairchild, water distribution crew foreman, said the toughest part of the job was just trying to find the leak.

The crew dug through concrete, asphalt, lots of mud and water in 28 degree Fahrenheit weather to reach the six-inch pipe.

The fire-hydrant connected to the pipe was dated 1948. The 52-year-old water pipe had served its purpose, he said.

"It's just an old pipe," Fairchild said. "The change in temperature might have had something to do with it. But mostly, it was just really old."

It took the water distribution crew a couple of hours just to find the leak, which had broken about 7 a.m., Fairchild said. The burst pipe left a mix of water and mud running down the street. The city street department salted the streets to prevent the water from freezing and creating hazardous driving conditions.

Replacing the pipe would take all day, he said. But simply trying to find the leak was the toughest job.

"This is a pretty common occurrence this time of year with the cold weather," Fairchild said. "It happens a lot during the summer, too, when the pipes are pumping a lot of water."

The crew has been fixing about two leaks per week, Fairchild said. Most of the leaks usually are pretty small. This break was not a catastrophe, he said. Only one block had lost access to water.

Although this was the first time Hancock had seen a pipe break in the neighborhood, he still didn't mind the inconvenience of loosing access to running water.

"Three-quarters of the world doesn't even have running water to begin with," he said. "I don't mind loosing water for just a few hours. It's no big deal."

Manhattan Water Department Distribution crew member John Borst digs out around a water main that was leaking in the 1500 block of Campus Street on Monday morning, while Richard Pavlisko looks on.

Clinton expected to announce $30 million gun safety initiative

BY JIM ABRAMS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton's final budget proposal will include $30 million to help local communities track gun violence and promote gun safety, Housing and Urban Development Secretary Andrew Cuomo said Monday.

Cuomo said the HUD-administered program, which needs congressional approval, would fund local efforts to computerize the mapping of gun violence and chart gun-related incidents in a community.

Funding also would go toward education and outreach programs to promote gun safety, he said. The president is to announce his year 2001 budget proposal on Feb. 7

Cuomo said the spending initiative was part of a three-track administration campaign against gun violence, joining legislative efforts and possible litigation against gun manufacturers.

On the legislative front, Clinton has proposed issuing photo ID licenses for handgun purchases and has urged Congress to pass gun control legislation, stalled in last year's session, that included background checks for gun show purchases and child safety locks. He has also proposed $280 million in funds to hire 500 new Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents and 1,000 new prosecutors.

In addition, the administration has threatened a new national class-action lawsuit to be filed through HUD's public housing projects against gunmakers.

Cuomo said the lawsuit would go forward if the manufacturers do not settle suits filed by 28 cities charging the makers with negligently allowing firearms to fall into the hands of criminals.

He said a meeting with the manufacturers scheduled for Jan. 28 in Las Vegas fell through when some companies voiced objections, and the parties are now dealing individually with the gunmakers.

Cuomo said public housing projects, often in urban areas with higher crime rates, are particularly vulnerable to gun violence, which kills some 30,000 people a year.

"The problem has become so widespread, and it is such a concern of the American people, and it was such a disappointment when nothing was done last year that this Congress cannot afford not to address it," Cuomo said.

Candidates make picture-perfect pitches on eve of primary

BY RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASHUA, N.H. — The presidential candidates shoveled snow, flipped pancakes and trudged through the slushy streets of New Hampshire on Monday, waging handshake-to-handshake combat to the finish of their hard-fought primary races.

With the field puzzling over ways to get supporters to voting booths, Sen. John McCain joked that he had the answer.

"Death threats," the Arizona Republican said. "If they don't go out, and don't vote for McCain, then don't start your car for the next week."

Kidding aside, the stakes were high for McCain, who badly needs a victory in his nomination fight with better-financed George W. Bush. Bush is seeking a come-from-behind victory here to burnish his front-running national campaign, while staunch conservatives Steve Forbes, Alan Keyes and Gary Bauer are trying to show they still have a chance.

"I'm confident of victory," McCain said, turning five outdoor rallies into virtual victory laps around the state as polls gave him a slight edge.

"I like my chances a lot," said Bush, who went from photo op to photo op as his aides said momentum was on his side, even if time wasn't.

Democrats Al Gore and Bill Bradley were locked in a race that could determine the staying power of Bradley's insurgent campaign.

"We're closing fast," Bradley declared, as polls showed the former New Jersey senator trailing Gore but posing a threat in their bitterly fought race. As the day wore on, Bradley and his campaign grew more reflective as he talked about his 30 years of traveling the country.

"Now it's up to you if my public service will be fulfilled," Bradley said at a Manchester rally. Bradley has enough money to weather a New Hampshire loss more easily than McCain.

Gore was out before dawn, shaking hands in the pelting freezing rain outside the Lockheed Sanders plant. Later he met at a nursing home with senior citizens, most of them in wheelchairs, to renew his claim that Bradley's health care plan would replace their Medicaid with $150-a-month vouchers. Bradley maintains, however, that his health care plan would leave in place federal aid that states now get from Medicaid for nursing home care.

Bradley paid $15.99 for a red snow shovel then cleared the sidewalk in front of Aubuchon Hardware in Concord.

"Hope you can help me tomorrow," he told clerk Ruthie Johnson.

Forbes was the only candidate to pass up a picture, refusing to dip his hands into a lobster tank at Fred Daley's fish store in Exeter. "I'll wait for the final product," he said.

Weekend track meet earns trophy

■ K-State tops KU, Missouri to take home traveling prize.

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track and field team beat up on its rivals over the weekend.

As a result, it will keep the traveling trophy for another year.

Saturday, the Cats won 16 events overall in a triangular meet with KU and Missouri. K-State head track and field coach Cliff Rovelto said the team performed well.

"I thought we had a very good meet overall — the women had a great meet," Rovelto said. "Anna Whitham and Amy Mortimer in particular — Anna improved her shot and weight marks."

Whitham threw 62 feet, 9 1/2 inches in the weight throw and 48 feet, 5 1/4 inches in the shot put. The two marks helped her to win both events. Rovelto said Mortimer, a freshman, had a breakout meet. She ran a 9:22.18 in the 3000 meters. The time not only helped her to win the meet, but it also was a NCAA automatic qualifying performance.

In what was Mortimer's first race of the season, she became the first K-State athlete to qualify for nationals.

As a team, K-State scored 259 points, defeating KU, which finished second with 223 points, and Missouri, which gained 212 points. Rovelto said outside of the conference meet and nationals, this is an important meet for the Wildcats.

"It is not anywhere near as important as the conference and the national meets," Rovelto said. "I don't know how long we have had the meet, but I'd say we have won it 10 of the last 12 years. We want to make sure that people can see the trophy in there, no matter how ugly it is."

The Cats' other men's event winners were Aaron Lockett, who won the 60-meter dash with a time of 6.77 seconds; Justin Robinson, who won the high jump with a mark of 6 feet, 6 3/4 inches; and Tamel Sisney, who won the weight throw with a mark of 64 feet, 4 inches.

On the women's side, Korene Hinds won the 800 meters with a time of 2:11.10, and Bromeka Holmes won the 400 meters at 58.09. In the triple jump, Christine Ingram won the event with a mark of 38 feet, 8 3/4 inches.

Despite the victory, Rovelto said the meet helps little in recruiting. He said that in a sport where a team typically has limited scholarships, the money becomes important.

"It's not as important in this sport as much as others," Rovelto said. "The reality is it has more to do with the size of the scholarship than anything else."

Tennis team beats SWMU

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State (2-2) evened its spring tennis record with a 9-0 sweep of Southwest Missouri State (0-2) on Saturday in Springfield, Mo.

The win was the Wildcats' sixth straight victory over the Bears, although just the second in five tries at the Cooper Tennis Complex.

"Southwest Missouri State is a team that we've traditionally done pretty well against," K-State head coach Steve Bietau said. "But I would say that this is considerably stronger than I've ever seen them.

"If they don't win the Missouri Valley (Conference), they'll certainly make a good run to do that. While I don't think they're the caliber of the top Big 12 teams, they're not bad."

K-State's No. 1 player, freshman Petra Sedlmajerova (Usti Nad Labem, Czech Republic), kept her unbeaten singles record alive with a 6-1, 6-0, defeat of Southwest Missouri State's Cassandra Godfrey to lead the Cats to the road victory.

"Petra played pretty well," Bietau said. "She played inside the baseline a little bit more, which adds a dimension of pressure to the other player that is tough for them to deal with."

After three definitive K-State wins in doubles competition set the stage in opening up a 3-0 lead, singles action got tight with three matches splitting sets.

However, instead of playing the decisive third set in those matches, the two teams used a new procedure that calls for a 10-point tiebreaker to decide the match. This trial method was implemented early in the season in attempts to considerably reduce the match lengths and speed up the game on the court.

"It's an experimental format," Bietau said. "We're looking at ways that we can shorten the matches a little bit. It gives you a little bit of time to come back if you fall behind early, and I think it's a great move for college tennis."

Sophomore Alena Jecminkova and juniors Eva Novotna' and Anna Pampoulova all used the new rule to their advantage by losing the first set but bouncing back to take the third set tiebreaker en route to the victory.

The Cats then rolled at No. 5 and 6 singles, as sophomore Kathy Chuda defeated Amy Newman, 6-3, 6-1, and junior Natalia Farmer got her first win of the year with a 6-0, 6-1, triumph over Asa Duneborn.

"To me, the real story of this match was how our players responded to close situations and a little bit of pressure," Bietau said. "They handled those situations extremely well. SMS, after being kind of shocked in the doubles, came back out with what I thought was a pretty good effort.

"(SMS) is a team that has some good players and has some real weapons, and I think over the course of the year, people are going to see that they're a lot better than 9-0 against us."

A FORCE to be reckoned with

Sophomore guard jumps into duties with vengeance, talent that turns heads

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many college athletes spend their freshman and sophomore seasons on the bench, waiting for older players to hand down the team's future.

Kristin Rethman, sophomore guard for the K-State women's basketball team, however, has seen considerable playing time early in her K-State career.

In the past two seasons, Rethman has received so much playing time because of teammates' injuries, and she has had an immediate effect.

In two K-State games this season, she has led the Cats in scoring and rebounds, and in conference play, she leads the team in three-pointers and is third in scoring, averaging 10.3 points per game.

As well as this Centralia High School product has played, it's no surprise that Coach Deb Patterson said Rethman has an even brighter future.

"She's going to be very tough to defend her third and fourth years in the program," Patterson said prior to the Nebraska game. "Even today, Kristin Rethman at practice was the bomb. I walked over to the side and said, 'wow.' Kristin looked tremendous today."

While Rethman's play as a sophomore might be a surprise to some in the basketball world, it should be no shock to those back home. In high school, Rethman averaged 19 points a game for her career and helped lead the Panthers to the state championship. She was also named an all-state 1A selection by The Topeka Capitol-Journal and an all-state, all-classes selection by Kansas Sports.

Now Rethman is a scoring threat for the Cats, and she gives credit to her hometown influences for her strong collegiate play.

"My parents were always very supportive," Rethman said. "Summer is really where it's at, tournaments and AAU. They spent a lot of money, so it's good that I got the scholarship, because now I feel like I'm giving back to them."

The Centralia coaches also helped prepare Rethman for Division I athletics.

"My high school coach played at Emporia State," Rethman said. "And he could always tell me at the next level they're going to be quicker and faster and stronger, and you're not going to be able to get away with that — you have to learn to do it the right way."

Rethman is beginning to do it the right way, Patterson said.

"Kristin, when she walked in the door, was a three-point shooter," Patterson said. "She didn't really want to handle much. You just couldn't get her to think about jump shots, getting to the hole and being aggressive."

"Now, I can't wait to watch her as time goes by," Patterson said. "Some days, though she would never think this, I'm astounded with the progress she has made."

Rethman said a preseason injury helped her to improve her ball-handling skills.

"At the beginning of this year, my pointer finger was swelled up," Rethman said, pointing to her right hand. "That was probably God's way of telling me to work on my left hand."

While Rethman is trying to become more of a slashing-type player, Patterson said her three-point shot is still the staple of her game and should not be changed.

"I don't ever want to take away her three-point shot ,because I love it," Patterson said. "I think it's quick release — I think it's money."

Despite her effective play now, however, the transition from Class 1A high school basketball to Division I was not necessarily struggle-free for Rethman since Division I offenses and defenses are more complex than their high school counterparts.

"When I first got here, it was the defense," Rethman said. "And offenses, because they give you a basic set on offense, but then it really depends on what the defense does, and you can read off of what they do and plays turn into other ,lays, and that was a little more complex than just motion."

Rethman credits the K-State coaches for showing her what she needed to improve her play.

"I was talking with Dee DeShay a long time ago about wouldn't it be great if you could go back to high school and play with the knowledge you have now," Rethman said. "Our coaching staff shows you so many little things that you wouldn't think make a difference, but they do."

Now that Rethman's skills are improving, her coaches from Centralia, also home of football great John Riggins, have been getting more attention, too.

Lewis charged with murder

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — Police charged Pro Bowl linebacker Ray Lewis with murder late Monday in the slayings of two people outside an Atlanta nightclub hours after the Super Bowl.

Lewis, middle linebacker for the Baltimore Ravens and the NFL's leading tackler this season, was arrested after a day of investigation into the slaying outside the Cobalt lounge in Atlanta's Buckhead neighborhood about 4 a.m. Monday.

Lewis was taken into custody and was expected to appear in court Tuesday morning.

Two men were stabbed during a fight that broke out just as the party was ending at the club. Witnesses said six men had fought and argued with the two victims. The men fled in a black Lincoln Navigator stretch limousine, firing at least five gunshots as they drove away.

Police found the vehicle, with New York license plates, in a parking lot behind a hotel near the shooting scene, Atlanta police spokesman John Quigley said.

Quigley and Georgia Bureau of Investigation spokesman John Bankhead both said they could not release details of the investigation.

Lewis, 24, was the only suspect named by police.

One man died at the scene and the other victim died at Grady Memorial Hospital. The Fulton County Medical Examiner's office identified the victims as Jacinta Baker, 21, and Richard Lollar, 24, both of Decatur.

Warner's devout Christianity leads him successfully through life, football

VIEWPOINT

CHRISTOPHER McLEMORE

We've heard all the stories about Kurt Warner's path to the NFL.

We've heard about his unrivaled persistence and gumption.

We've heard of his days stocking groceries at the HyVee in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, while playing Division I-AA college football.

So it's strange that throughout all of the media scrutiny one big part of Kurt Warner's life has gone overlooked — his faith.

This former University of Northern Iowa quarterback spends more time in Sunday school than he does in autograph sessions.

In an age of celebratory throat slashes, unprecedented trash talk and outlandish end-zone dance moves you'd think that a guy with such a deep humility and passion for religion would turn some heads.

Not really.

Not Warner, anyway.

You don't hear how Warner led his Iowa Barnstormer teammates to Jesus before he led them to victory.

No one talks about the Bible club he started while playing in the NFL Europe.

The media doesn't pick up on the fact that Warner's heart of a lion is really a heart devoted to God.

Regardless of your beliefs about religion, Warner is a breath of fresh air in an age of NFL disarray.

All too often we hear stories about players like Cecil "the diesel" Collins, who allegedly was caught breaking and entering into his neighbor's apartment. Or the stories of Orlando Brown, the referee attacker.

It makes you wonder how a faith like Warner can go overlooked for so long by so many.

On Sunday, Warner threw for a Super Bowl record 414 yards, and he didn't point any fingers at himself or stick his face in front of the camera. He just pointed to the heavens and found his wife and children in the sea of yellow and blue.

Sure, his teammates do a little bob-and-weave dance in the end zone after every touchdown.

Behind Warner's arm, it seems that they are dancing in the end zone on every possession. But the Super Bowl MVP doesn't bother to get involved. He just pats the helmets of his offensive linemen and jogs to the sideline to take a breather and say a silent prayer.

It takes a special kind of faith and devotion to be the back-up quarterback for a team like the Rams. Before this year, Warner had spent virtually every second of his short NFL career with a clipboard in his hands as he stood on the sidelines.

He did his job, watched game tape, and above all else, he hoped his chance finally would come.

Yeah, you've definitely got to have a strong faith in something to watch your team flounder while you wile away your time sending plays into the huddle from the sideline.

Luckily for Warner, he did have faith, and when Trent Green went down in a preseason game with a severe injury to his knee, Warner grabbed his helmet, took a few seconds to pray and jogged onto the field.

It was at that moment that the St. Louis Rams, a team that drew crowds smaller than the crowds Warner had seen during his days in college, transformed.

One man — surrounded by a group of talented teammates — filled with a sense of faith and desire, led his team through a marvelous season.

When the season was over Warner stood in the middle of the Georgia Dome, one hand holding the Vince Lombardi Championship trophy and the other pointing toward the sky.

It was a brief moment of thanks to the guiding force in his life.

His journey had been long and trying, but Sunday's victory over the Tennessee Titans was worth all of the hardship that Warner has ever endured.

A season led by God culminated with a heavenly victory.

Kurt Warner — a breath of fresh air indeed.

OGDEN

Teresa Gentry, a K-state student teacher, said she thought all-day kindergarten gave students more opportunities to learn.

"I think it prepares them so much better for first grade," she said.

One of the criticisms of all-day kindergarten is that it would wear children out.

"We're tired. They're not," Karla Fisher, teacher, said.

Fisher was a teacher before the switch to all-day kindergarten, and she said the extra time gives children more opportunities to explore.

"Their work is play time," she said.

Students also build social skills, Fisher said.

Ogden Resident Sandra Brabender's daughter, who is now 9, was in all-day kindergarten. Her daughter was an only child, and Brabender said she was concerned about her social skills.

"She got to be with kids her own age, and her social skills really took off," she said.

By the time her daughter left kindergarten, she was reading books. She knew her alphabet and had started writing.

"It was incredible the things they learned in all-day kindergarten," Brabender said.

Sharon Nations' grandson is in all-day kindergarten, and she too had been concerned about her grandson having social problems.

Nations, an Ogden resident, said now he is outspoken. He loves school and asks for paper to work on his alphabet, she said.

"I wish they had it when my children were little," Nations said.

PLAN

"I think we cut taxes too much. That is why we are feeling a pinch," he said. "We overdid it."

Bond is not running for re-election.

Ogden Grade School already has an all-day kindergarten program. The program is doing well there, but Hill said it should be up to the local school boards if the program is broadened to other schools.

The all-day kindergarten at Ogden is being funded by Title 1 money, which comes from the U.S. Department of Education for low-income children.

School uniforms is another area Hill said she thought should be left up to the local level.

"They have been successful in some places, but that is a decision that should be left up to students and parents," she said. "I am not seeing a need or desire for that."

Sarah Johnson, senior in elementary education, said uniforms take away an outlet for children's creativity.

Bond said concepts like school uniforms, all-day kindergarten and community-service programs would be programs recommended to school districts but not mandated.

However, he said he thought Spanish in schools should be mandated.

Manhattan schools offer Spanish at the elementary school level.

Johnson, who is student teaching, has fifth graders at Amanda Arnold Elementary School who study Spanish four times a week.

She said she thought Spanish was an appropriate language for students to learn because of the growing Hispanic population in the United States.

But again, there is a cost.

Holen said multilingual teachers are in high demand right now.

"If you can speak Spanish and have a teaching certificate, you can get a job anywhere in the state," he said.

Holen and Hill both questioned a requirement solely for Spanish. They said communities should be able to decide what languages they want to offer.

"I do see a benefit in students being fluent or at least somewhat fluent in foreign language," Hill said. "We are living in a global society."

Bond said students will be living and competing in a hemisphere that is largely Spanish speaking.

Bond also suggests eliminating tenure for teachers because he said it makes it difficult for school districts to get rid of incompetent teachers.

"It is a reward for longevity and not merit or exceptional teaching," he said.

Johnson said she thought tenure was an incentive for people to go into the field.

"There are other ways to keep bad teachers out of the profession," she said.

Bond's education bill also seeks to keep high school students accountable by requiring them to pass a minimum competency test to graduate high school.

"I think taxpayers expect graduates to be able to read, articulate and do simple math," he said. "A diploma should mean something."

Hill said students already are expected to live up to certain standards and competency testing was not needed.

Holen said not all students are working toward the same outcome. A student wanting to study at Harvard is going to need different skills than a student going to technical school.

"To encompass an entire high school career in a single test score is a very scary thing," he said.

the plan

The "First in Class" proposals consists of the following components.

- Phase in all-day kindergarten classes over five years.
- Require school districts to consider making students in kindergarten through grade 12 wear uniforms.
- Lengthen the school year.
- Require students to pass a competency test on basic skills before graduating from high school.
- Reward teachers financially for exceptional work. Eliminate tenure for teachers.
- Require students to be able to speak Spanish, starting in 2002.
- Require local school boards to establish community service programs by 2002.
- Direct local school boards to incorporate current events into their curricula.
- Add $1 million to a program for poor preschool students. This would expand the program by about 400 students.
- Provide schools access to current computer technology.

CRITERIA

The qualified admissions allows a 10 percent window to each institution for exceptions. That means an exception of about 300 students for K-State, Bosco said.

"We will probably have 1,000 students request exceptions," Bosco said. "We are discussing with faculty and administrators on how to determine each of those spots. It's going to be something new for K-State."

Bosco said he believes the exceptions will be based on the students' ability to be successful at K-State, and that doesn't necessarily mean being an athlete.

"It really isn't going to affect the student athlete," Bosco said. "That's a misnomer. The Division I athlete is far more prepared in high school than the typical Kansas high school student today."

K-State now is under open admissions, but under the NCAA Clearing House for student athletes, the requirements are far more stringent, and in some cases, higher than K-State's entrance requirements, Bosco said.

There is an admittance criteria for for out-of-state students, Bosco said, except the last criteria is a 2.5 instead of a 2.0 GPA.

If students fail the criteria, they can still consider the community-college route.

Students who complete 24 credit hours with a C average at a community college will be admitted to K-State, Bosco said.

"You can't just go to community college for just one semester," Bosco said. "You have to go for 24 hours. It's a full year at the community-college level."

Norm Childs, director of Cloud County Community College's Geary County campus, said the new admission standards will help raise the student population at his institution.

"We currently receive many students from K-State for various reasons," Childs said. "I believe the qualified admissions will greatly increase our enrollment because of students who don't qualify to attend a state university."

Overall, the new qualifications are positive, Bosco said.

"It gives the high school student a benchmark," Bosco said. "Once we get through the procedural hassles in the first couple of years, I believe it will run smoothly."

ECONOMY

and food products, was up just 1.9 percent, the best performance in 34 years.

President Clinton takes every opportunity to cite the soundness of the Clinton-Gore deficit reduction program as a key building block for the good economy, hoping voters will reward Democrats this fall.

Republicans are quick to note that the current recovery actually started nearly two years before Clinton took office, when Republican George Bush was president.

Bush's misfortune was that while the last recession only lasted eight months, from July 1981 until March 1991, the recovery in the early days was dubbed the "jobless recovery" because it was exceptionally sluggish, allowing Clinton to make the weak economy a key campaign issue in 1992.

Asked to apportion credit among government policy-makers for the good times, private economists generally give the lion's share of praise to Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and his colleagues.

Greenspan has already engineered one soft landing — raising interest rates seven times in 1994 and early 1995 to slow things down and keep inflation under control. He is now attempting a second soft landing.

Since last June, the Federal Reserve has raised rates three times, and is expected to do so again during its meetings this week.

"The economy is growing so fast that even the Federal Reserve hasn't been able to slow it down and that's why they will be raising rates again," said Richard Yamarone of Argus Research Corp.

Economists, in fact, are looking for as many as three more rate increases before summer, bringing the total number of credit tightening moves to seven in one year.

Class helps students navigate library

By MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There has always been a need for basic library instruction, Doug Bates, Access Services Department chair, said.

"To satisfy this need, a class was developed to provide instruction to anyone who wants to learn the basics of the library," Bates said.

This semester the class is offered at 1:30 p.m. Monday through Friday in Hale Library 408. Cliff Conrad of instructional support services teaches the class.

The class is a free service offered to anyone. It lasts 35-40 minutes, and students, faculty and staff can take the course.

Information provided in the class includes how the library is organized, the Library of Congress call numbers, Boolean logic, what resources are used to find books vs. journal articles, how to search the catalog and how to select and search databases.

"I try to make the class so that anyone can find anything," Conrad said. "They can't leave the class until they know how to find a book."

If the available times don't work for students or faculty, Conrad can meet with them at another time in the lobby of the library. He said he would explain the same things as in a regular class.

Jeneen LaSee-Willemssen, education librarian, encourages professors and instructors to send their students to the Basic Library Instruction class. Part of her work involves giving instructions on how to prepare a bibliography for assigned subject areas.

"I teach education students how to find education-related subjects and English students how to find children's literature material," LaSee-Willemssen said. "What I and many of the other bibliographers find when we teach for classes is that we must cover very basic information.

"When I know the class I am teaching has attended the Basic Library Instruction class, I can concentrate on teaching them exactly what they need to know for their assignment or project," she said.

Kim Howard and Mariah Welton, both seniors in elementary education, attended the class as a requirement for their Science Methods class.

"All I'd ever had to do was look up a few articles," Howard said. "I definitely have a better understanding of finding things now."

Howard learned she could look up whole journal articles on the computer and have them sent to her e-mail address.

Welton said she was more confident to find information now.

"I had taken tours of the library before, but I had never had any in-depth instruction," Welton said. "The instructor was very good. He made the class fun."

hale library 101

Students, faculty and staff can learn more about Hale Library in a basic introduction course offered this semester, 1:30 p.m. Monday through Friday or by appointment. The 35-40 minute classes cover three basic areas:

1. library materials: Locating library materials, including using the Library of Congress call number system, learning how call numbers are broken down in Hale and learning where services are located in the library.

2. library tools: Using the library catalog to find an author, title or subject, and learning to read display screen for location, call number and status, as well as using the basics of guided keyword searching.

3. databases: Utilizing databases and learning the conditions for using databases, including off-campus access.

Student bookstores note increased use of cards

Debit, credit cards increasing in use over greenbacks

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A cashless society could be closer than people realize. Debit cards, credit cards and checks seem to have the upper hand when it comes to making purchases.

Both Varney's Book Store and the K-State Student Union Bookstore see debit cards being used more frequently by students than by other customers.

"We have seen an increase of the usage of the Wildcat card at the bookstore and at Varney's. There is some shift," Don Becker, campus card manager, said. "Checking debit cards have increased dramatically in the last 12 to 18 months."

At the Union Bookstore, debit cards and credit cards are scanned through as the same item, but are the more popular choice over cash.

"We have seen a 20 percent increase of activity on plastic over checks," said Jack Thoman, Union Bookstore assistant director of business affairs.

However, banks are not concerned about becoming cashless anytime soon. The Federal Reserve gives money to the banks. Money is continually being printed, and the government stores extra money for emergencies.

"I can see in 100 years there being no cash, due to changes in technology. However, in the next 25 to 50 years, I still see cash as the main medium for exchange," Tom Giller of Commerce Bank said.

Some businesses, such as fast food chains, accept cash more then debit cards or credit cards. For example, Subway takes debit cards but not credit cards, because of the lack of a credit card machine. Taco Bell does not accept checks.

There are advantages to plastic, however. Credit cards help in establishing a good foundation of credit for loans. Car rentals and buying a house are best done through the means of a credit card.

Credit and debit cards can make life more convenient than scrounging around for that $20 that got lost in the wash. They also make it easier on cashiers and customers.

Debit card and credit card loss can be reported, since they are liable. It is nearly impossible to replace lost or stolen cash. Debit cards are more convenient, and do not require continual trips to the ATM for cash.

"Debit card usage is going up, and either checks or cash are going down. However it is not a significant factor," Giller said.

Suicide Web site sparks controversy among Dutch

By ANTHONY DEUTSCH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — A how-to guide of suicide methods on an anonymous Dutch-language Web site has sparked heated controversy in a nation that widely supports the right to die by physician-assisted suicide.

The new Web site provoked an outcry in parliament Monday and demands for a change in the government's lax approach to regulating the Internet.

"Our society is obsessed with the problem of death," said Bart Cusveller of the pro-life Center for Medical Ethics.

"I can imagine that someone who is seriously depressed might see this as an option," he said. "It adds to the view that suicide is normal and acceptable."

The governing Labor Party called on Prime Minister Wim Kok to take action against the site and others containing information that could pose a danger to minors.

"The fact that anyone and everyone can get access to this sort of stuff from their living rooms is the most troubling aspect of the Internet," said Willie Swildens, spokeswoman for the left-of-center Labor Party.

"Teen-agers are a particularly sensitive group, and that tragedy is what we want to avoid."

Although suicide is prohibited in the Netherlands, there is no law against providing the kind of information posted on the site, which includes macabre tips on suicide methods and compares the success rates and pitfalls of each.

Step-by-step instructions guide the reader through wrist-slashing, sleeping pills, jumping off buildings and the "reasonably painless death of carbon monoxide poisoning."

The Pink Floyd song, "Goodbye Cruel World," can be heard on the home page, along with verses from the William Butler Yeats poem, "An Irish Airman Foresees His Death."

The site is called "Thisbe's Self-destruction Site," after the ancient mythological figure Thisbe, who commits suicide in the mistaken belief that his lover, Pyramus, has been killed by a lion. She takes her own life after discovering his body.

A disclaimer by the author says it is not based on expert knowledge or intended to encourage people to kill themselves.

"I refuse to accept any responsibility for the consequences of putting to use the things I have written," he said.

Although all parties in the Dutch ruling coalition were shocked by the site, they were at odds about what to do about the site.

"It's extremely regrettable, but there are lots more like it," said Atzo Nicolai, Internet policy expert for the Liberal Party, which advocates self-regulation for the World Wide Web.

"Everybody must be free to communicate with each other on the Internet."

Kok, a strong proponent of free speech on the Web, has nevertheless come out in favor of stricter guidelines to protect minors. The only Dutch law enforcement effort devoted to Internet crimes is a team of detectives dealing with offenses such as credit card fraud and child pornography.

Besides the Dutch site, there are several others that provide suicide information, mostly focusing on prevention, although a few include advocacy of euthanasia and assisted suicide. Some news groups and mailing lists also cover the topic, with one recent discussion related to good songs to die to.

The Dutch are generally tolerant toward those who view suicide as an option for ending severe physical or emotional suffering, not just terminal illness. After more than three decades of debate, the government approved strict guidelines in the early 1990s that allow physician-assisted suicide, provided it is voluntary, thoroughly considered and backed by a second opinion.

Proposed legislation before parliament would legalize euthanasia completely. The government has gradually moved toward legalization while maintaining heavy regulatory oversight of the practice.

Lafene provides counseling, advice to those who want to stop smoking

STORIES BY CAIT PURINTON

New Year's resolutions are a big deal for some people.

This year people made vows that could save their lives.

They promised to quit smoking.

Smoking is the No. 1 preventable cause of death, and each year three million people die worldwide as a result of smoking, according to the American Cancer Society.

Lafene Health Center offers one-on-one counseling sessions on smoking awareness and cessation. The first part of the program is finding out why the client smokes. Next, a program is catered to that individual in helping them overcome obstacles.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, said some obstacles might include having a best friend who smokes, and smoking is something the client and the friend do together.

"For example, if someone smokes to handle stress, quitting during finals week is not a good idea," she said. "Waiting until after finals would be a better idea."

Another obstacle, which might be a concern to college students, is weight gain. Kennedy said two-thirds of people who quit smoking experience weight gain, but only one-third of that portion maintains it. She said weight gain can be limited by substituting smoking with physical activity and healthy foods.

"One thing about being active is smokers will realize they can breathe, which may be the reason they stopped being active," Kennedy said.

She said people who wish to quit should avoid situations that urge them to smoke and to change their daily pattern. The program offered at Lafene suggests the client pick a day to quit and prepare for it by using smoking cessation products. After the individual gets past the set day, Kennedy said they should set rewards for each day they go without a cigarette.

The client has the power to decide how long they wish to stay in the program. Kennedy said she doesn't find it disappointing when a client quits the program and returns to smoking because on average it takes up to seven tries to successfully quit.

"It's something we don't see as a failure if they don't quit smoking," Kennedy said. "They have to try several times to be successful."

On her eighth try, Erica Jordan, junior in social work, successfully quit smoking using the cold turkey method.

"I realized it was disgusting, and I realized it was going to have long-term effects on me. Being a college student, I couldn't afford it," she said. "I like the way I smell. I like that I have money and that I don't get winded as easily."

Jordan, who had been a smoker since she was 15 years old, said she tried the cold turkey method every time opposed to using smoking cessation products.

Dr. Jack Fincham, dean of the University of Kansas School of Pharmacy, said people respond differently to various methods, but people who do not use the products have a 10 percent success rate of quitting.

"You increase the success rate significantly," he said. "The point is it's really, really hard to quit without help."

He said products such as a transdermal patch and nicotine gum are proven to be beneficial in getting past cravings and withdrawal symptoms. He said after 10 weeks of using these types of products, people should be able to stop using them and be smoke free.

The patch works best for people who smoke continuously throughout the day because it is a steady release of nicotine into the body. He said people should rotate where they put the patch on their body each day.

There can be side effects to using the patch. Fincham said a small number of people who are allergic to adhesives should not use the patch because the adhesive is similar to that of a adhesive bandage.

Also, people with sleep disturbances shouldn't wear the patch for more than 16 hours, Fincham said. Since the product is a nicotine stimulant, if they wear it for more than 24 hours it might keep them awake or cause them to have more dreams than usual.

However, nicotine gum tends to be more successful for people who smoke in intense periods of the day. For example, people who smoke before and after class and at night when they are studying.

Fincham said using nicotine gum is not suppose to be used like regular gum.

"You're suppose to bite into it until there is a tingling, peppermint taste. Then park it between the cheek and the gums. Next time there's a craving, pull it out and bite again," he said. "The majority of the problems are related to people not using it the way it's suppose to be used. People are chewing it like regular gum instead of biting it slowly and waiting for the tingling."

Chewing nicotine gum like regular gum can cause upset stomach by swallowing too much of the nicotine. Drinking acidic drinks while chewing the gum also can cause upset stomach.

The cost of using smoking cessation products is comparable to smoking for someone who smokes a pack a day, Fincham said.

"It's probably a bit less. The difference is you're improving health dramatically," he said. "After a short period of time, the cost will go away because you won't be buying cigarettes again."

The patch and gum are the only two smoking cessation products that can be purchased without a prescription. Inhalers, sprays and pills are available through prescription, but Fincham said to start with the patch or gum first.

The patch and nicotine gum are safe ways to quit. Fincham said nicotine is not a cancer-causing agent. It's the agents in tobacco that can cause cancer, he said.

According to the American Cancer Society, cigarette smoke contains 4,000 chemicals, including 43 substances known to cause cancer. Some of the chemicals found in cigarette smoke are tar, cyanide, benzene, formaldehyde, methanol, acetylene and ammonia.

Low tar cigarettes are sometimes perceived to be safer than high tar cigarettes. That's not true, according to the ACS.

Information provided by the organization states people who smoke low tar cigarettes, smoke more aggressively by inhaling more deeply and smoking more.

Family and friends can help smokers quit by being supportive and encouraging, Kennedy said.

"This is difficult for people to do and provide empathy and support. Ask 'what can I do to help?'," Kennedy said. "I think it would be helpful to plan mutual activities with that person. Take their mind off it. For example, instead of going to the bars in Aggieville, where's there's smoke, go to a movie."

smoke out

People who quit smoking will begin to experience health benefits in as few as 20 minutes after their last cigarette.

- body temperature of hands and feet increases to normal

8 hours
- carbon monoxide level in blood drops to normal

- chance of heart attack decreases

48 hours
- nerve endings start regrowing
- ability to smell and taste is enhanced

2 weeks - 3 months
- circulation improves

Health QUESTION

By: Carol Kennedy
director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center

Q: How do you know when you need to go to the emergency room at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue?

A: Conditions when you should go immediately are:
1. loss of consciousness or convulsions
2. breathing difficulty, shortness of breath or allergic reaction that causes breathing difficulties
3. severe pain in the chest or abdomen
4. severe bleeding that doesn't stop with direct pressure
5. injuries with tissue or bone protruding
6. fever about 101 degrees that cannot be relieved with aspirin or Tylenol
7. symptoms compatible with meningitis (fever, headache, stiff neck)
8. lacerations that might need repair
9. animal bites
10. urinary tract infection with fever or mid-back pain

Health experts dispell myths about safety of smokeless tobacco

Some think using smokeless tobacco is safer than smoking cigarettes, but health educators disagree.

"With smoking they get a burst of it. With smokeless tobacco nicotine is continuously released so its absorbed longer," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotions at Lafene Health Center. "The use has gone up because people think it's not as much of a danger as smoking. But it is."

According to the American Cancer Society, people who use smokeless tobacco are consuming an average of 10 times the amount of cancer-causing agents than cigarette smokers.

Kennedy said using smokeless tobacco is just as chemically dependent as cigarette smoking.

For cigarette smokers, there are products on the market to aid in the cessation process.

Dr. Jack Fincham, dean of the University of Kansas School of Pharmacy, said most of those products are applicable to smokeless tobacco users.

He said as far as cessation products are concerned, the transdermal patch is not as effective as the nicotine gum for people who use smokeless tobacco.

"If you look at how people use smokeless tobacco, people who use smokeless tobacco can quit very easily using nicotine gum," he said. "There are many physicians who would suggest using the gum to stop using smokeless tobacco."

According to the ACS, benign oral lesions might occur only a few years after someone starts using smokeless tobacco.

Physical effects of using smokeless tobacco include gum disease, erosion of teeth, mouth cancer and chronic bad breath.

Cancers caused by smokeless tobacco also can spread to other areas of the body, including the throat, esophagus and larynx.

Alaska Airlines flight crashes off Southern Californian coast

By JEFF WILSON
The Associated Press

OXNARD, Calif. — An Alaska Airlines jet carrying 65 passengers and five crew members from Mexico to San Francisco crashed Monday in the Pacific Ocean after reporting mechanical difficulties.

Flight 261 from Puerto Vallarta was reported down 20 miles northwest of the Los Angeles airport about 3:45 p.m., the Federal Aviation Administration said. The Coast Guard said several bodies were recovered from the site, but there were no reports of survivors.

A Coast Guard helicopter, a Navy airplane and small boats were searching an area where pieces of wreckage rolled in swells off Point Mugu after darkness had descended on the ocean. Commercial squid boats, which have high-power lights, were illuminating the area.

Several bodies were found by 6 p.m., said Lt. Chuck Diorio at Coast Guard headquarters in Long Beach.

"Right now they are searching for survivors," Coast Guard Lt. Jeanne Reincke said.

The plane was an MD-83, part of the MD-80 series aircraft built by McDonnell Douglas, now part of Boeing, said John Thom, a spokesman for Boeing's Douglas aircraft unit. The downed plane was delivered to Alaska Airlines in 1992, Thom said.

The jet's crew had reported mechanical difficulties and asked to land at Los Angeles, said Ron Wilson, a spokesman for the San Francisco airport. The flight was scheduled to continue to Seattle after San Francisco.

"Radar indicates it fell from 17,000 feet and then was lost from radar," Wilson told KRON-TV in San Francisco.

Cynthia Emery, FAA flight operations officer in Seattle, confirmed the number of passengers and crew.

Alaska Airlines, which has a distinctive image of an Eskimo painted on the tails of its planes, has an excellent safety record. It has built itself into a western power by serving more than 40 cities in Alaska, Canada, Mexico and five Western states.

The weather was clear at the crash site, and the water typically has a temperature in the low 50s this time of year.

The National Transportation Safety Board was assembling a team of investigators in Washington, D.C., and planned to send them to the crash site late Monday night or early this morning, spokesman Pat Cariseo said.

On Sunday, a Kenya Airways flight crashed into the Atlantic Ocean shortly after take off from Abidjan, Ivory Coast. The Airbus 310 carried 10 crew members and 169 passengers. At least 10 people survived.

Last Oct. 31, EgyptAir Flight 990 plummeted into the ocean 60 miles south of the Massachusetts island of Nantucket. All 217 people aboard the Boeing 767 were killed.

Alaska Airlines, based in Seattle, operates several flights from Puerto Vallarta, a resort on Mexico's Pacific coast, to San Jose, Calif., San Francisco and other California cities.

China criticizes U.S. plan on Taiwan

By PAULINE JELINEK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — China cautioned the United States against strengthening military ties with Taiwan and harping on Beijing's human rights record, saying such actions will damage already shaky U.S.-China relations.

One statement was aimed at the proposed "Taiwan Security Enhancement Act," which the House is expected to take up as early as today. The other targeted a U.S. plan to seek censure of China at a March meeting of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

"We strongly urge the U.S. government to take effective measures to prevent this (Taiwan security) act from being adopted in the Congress and to prevent it from becoming law," Chinese Embassy spokesman Yu Shuning said Monday.

Its passage will bring about serious damage to China-U.S. relations, Yu said, because it undermines the very basis of the relationship — a U.S. commitment to recognize only one China.

"As everybody knows, throughout our relationship with the U.S., the Taiwan issue has been the most sensitive," he told reporters at the Chinese Embassy.

Passage of the act also would have serious consequences on peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait and in the Asia-Pacific region, Yu said.

"It will trigger another round of arms race and enhance the chance of military confrontation," he said.

The security act, approved 32-6 in October by the House International Relations Committee, would increase training operations and exchanges between the U.S. and Taiwanese militaries and establish lines of communications during crises. It also states that America's national interest requires that all understand the United States will protect Taiwan from outside coercion and force.

The legislation could go to the House floor for action as early as this week. It has been modified considerably from the original bill, which would have authorized he sale of specific weapons systems to Taiwan.

The legislation was an outgrowth of Chinese hostility toward democratic change in Taiwan, a strong anti-China drift in Congress and Republican criticism that the administration has sacrificed Taiwan's interests to maintain stable relations with Beijing.

Yu also repeated criticism of a U.S. plan to bring to the Human Rights Commission a resolution to censure China.

*Seriously.

I know that usually when you see an asterisk (like this * one) after the word free, it's not. But this is. We want to give you a free MacIntosh iMac computer. All you have to do is come into our new branch to register for it.

Sure, we don't really want to just give it to you. When you come to register, we'll probably start with some small talk and then tell you about our Visa Check Card, or Internet Banking. And if we find out you're graduating in May, we'll tell you about a good way to get a new car to compliment that new job of yours.

So come register for this free MacIntosh iMac computer at the new Commerce Bank branch on the south side of the Student Union's first floor. Besides a free MacIntosh iMac computer, we'll have free refreshments and, as always, free checking.

Circuit Training Area

Circuit training is not a new concept to the workout world. A circuit consists of several different weight machines or exercises. To get a circuit workout, an exerciser would go from machine to machine without any rest in between the stations. As a result, an exerciser would get not only a muscular workout, but have a cardiovascular benefit as well.

The circuit training area, located on the upper level at the Recreation Complex, is set up in much the same way, but it can be used in several different capacities. In fact, the majority of people who use the circuit training area just use the machines they like in a set and repetition format rather than a circuit workout. However, all necessary weight machines are in a compact area that allows those working out to move from machine to machine easily, whether it is for circuit purposes or regular weight lifting exercises.

The circuit training area is easy to use. A beginning, intermediate and advanced weight program has been set up to guide exercisers who would like guidelines. All programs provide a total body workout by combining several different weight stations. Color-coded signs designate the machines that correlate with the program.

The circuit training area is convenient for beginning exercisers because the machines make it necessary to use correct form. If you work out alone, then the circuit training area is for you since a spotter is not needed.

The circuit training area provides a variety of exercises and techniques to add to your workout. If you are interested in learning more about the circuit training area, stop by the Wellness Resource Center and ask one of the fitness consultants for help. Or, call 532-0456.

My Favorite Workout

A Rec regular, Steven Martinez has lifted weights the majority of his life. When he came to K-State from his hometown of Lawrence, Kan., he didn't change the habit.

A junior in Graphic Design, Martinez has two weight areas to choose from when working out at the Rec. However, he likes the circuit training area because it is easy to use and it sets up a workout routine for you.

Although Martinez enjoys coming to the Rec to stay healthy, his greatest fulfillment of working out is the camaraderie he feels by working out with his friends.

"We push ourselves for motivation," Martinez said. "It is also great being around other people who are motivated as well to get in shape."

A typical routine for Martinez is weight lifting on Monday, Wednesday and Friday working specific body parts. On Tuesday and Thursday, a hectic class schedule doesn't leave time for anything other than jogging.

Martinez has a positive workout attitude, and it spreads to others.

"Set a goal and set reasonable expectations," he said. "But most importantly, have fun with it."

Fitness Facts

It is a New Year and one of your resolutions is to be more active. Now, how do you get started? First of all, it is best to get a physician's approval, especially if you haven't exercised in awhile, are over 40, or have a medical condition. Next, identify an activity(s) you enjoy doing. You also want to make sure the activity is appropriate for attaining the goals you have set. Then, find a convenient location for the activity, be it your home or a local fitness facility. And finally, start slow. You need time for your body to adjust to the new demands placed upon it.

Nutrition Notes

If you don't have high blood pressure, do you still need to worry about your salt intake? Most people are not affected by excess sodium; their kidneys get rid of the extra. However, 30% of the American population does suffer from salt-sensitive hypertension. The American Heart Association recommends 3,000 mg a day of sodium. Be aware that many processed or ready prepared foods are high in sodium. A tip to gage if there is too much sodium in a product is to see if it has twice as much sodium as it does calories. If so, you may want to consider another brand.

Who's Who???

Need help registering for intramurals? Want to buy a facility use card? Then ask Tracey! Tracey Collier, a junior in Family Studies and Human Services, is an office assistant in the Rec business office. She helps customers, answers the phones, assists with intramural entries and does other office work.

Collier, from Topeka, Kan., was impressed with the Rec from the time she visited K-State on a campus visit.

"The Rec was three-fourths the reason I came to KSU," Collier said. "I like working in an office atmosphere and I thought, 'what better place to work than the Rec.'"

Collier graduates in May 2001. Her plans after graduation include going to graduate school and getting her masters in marriage and family therapy. Until then, Collier plans on staying at the Rec business office and working.

"I love interacting with faculty and students and also the close friendships I've made with the office staff."

You might have seen Michelle Nafziger's face around the Rec. A senior in Biology, Nafziger is an assistant building supervisor for the Rec. But that isn't the only way Nafziger is involved with the Rec. She is an avid intramural participant and loves to work out.

The Manhattan native applied to work at the Rec because she enjoys the Rec's fun and busy atmosphere. Nafziger has worked at the Rec from the minute she became a K-State student in August 1996.

"My favorite thing about being a Rec employee is all the different people I have had the opportunity to meet and the wonderful people I work with," Nafziger said.

According to Nafziger, working at the Rec has given her other opportunities. She has improved her customer service skills by handling the many patrons that come through the Rec doors. Nafziger, who graduates in May 2000, will attend KU school of nursing.
